I do hope that we, as a people, will search the Scriptures daily to see if these things are so, and remember that if we are ever born from the dead, we must first be begotten, for there can be no being born that was never begotten, either by flesh or Spirit. And if we are never begotten by the Spirit of God, we shall never be born from the dead by the Spirit. We must be born by the incorruptible seed, that liveth and abideth forever. For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass; the grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away, but the word of the Lord endureth forever. Christ declares that his word is spirit and life.

If the wicked are never begotten by the Spirit of God, how can they ever have a resurrection, i. e., be born from the dead? One great evidence that Christ was to be the first that should rise from the dead, and was the first that rose to endless life, is, that when his expiring groans rent the rocks, and opened the graves of the saints, they did not rise and come out of their graves till after his resurrection. Then they arose and came out of their graves, and went into the holy city and appeared unto many. There is no mention of any graves being opened but the saints.

I know that there are many places that the translators have put "born of God," where it would harmonize better with the Scriptures generally, to say "begotten;" and the "Bible Union" have so corrected it in the epistles of John. Why they did not so correct it in John the evangelist I do not know, but I think by the time they got to the epistles, they found that that was the true meaning or sense. May God grant us all His holy Spirit to lead us into all truth.

May God bless you all abundantly at your gathering at the anniversary. I believe He will hold up the HERALD OF LIFE, and bless its running to and fro, carrying strength and cheering to all that are looking for deliverance. We shall need it more and more as we see the day approaching. O may we all stand with gathered garments, waiting for the Master's call. I will do what I can for it.

Your sister, looking and waiting for the kingdom.

FREDERICKSBURG, Iowa, Aug., 1870.

FROM LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

DEAR BRETHREN AND SISTERS in the LORD, my thoughts are with you, and were it possible I would be present at your gathering. This cannot be; yet you are and shall be the subject of daily prayer. In June I submitted to the operation of removing a cataract from my eye; the subsequent hot weather, and so much strain on the nervous system, has brought me very low. I am now slowly recovering, with a prospet of sight again. All my restored powers I shall lay upon the altar of my God, with the full purpose to use them for the Master till he comes.

The clear, pure light of Life only in Christ is to me so increasingly precious, that I would gladly put it into the hands of every son and daughter of Adam. This I cannot do; but I can pray the Lord of the harvest to send laborers into the harvest. What a rich boon is prayer! Never before did I so fully realize its value as I did during the three weeks my sight was entirely closed. Then I knew by blessed experience that naught could separate me from the love of God in Jesus Christ our Lord.

I will do my best to pay for three copies of the HERALD OF LIFE the ensuing year, as I have the past. I hope to see the Master ere this year closes.

ST. PAUL, Minn., Aug. 1870.

Remark by the Editor.

Sister Lamb's letter was written with her own hand, and necessarily the letters and words were so imperfect that it has been difficult for us to decipher any part of it; and some of it we have been obliged to omit. For the same reason, several communications from her, previously, we regret to have been obliged to lay aside entirely. We are glad to hear from her always; but we suggest that some one should write out her thoughts for her before sending them to us. May our covenant God bless her abundantly.

FROM MRS. E. H. PECK.

BR. STORRS: The answer to questions, sent you on Friday last, has not yet been read in our Bible Class. Several persons being absent who were there last Sunday; among them, one, that I particularly wished should hear it. I thought it advisable to wait another week.

The learned Sir. I. Newton said, that he felt like a man who had walked on the seashore, and picked up a few bright pebbles, which had escaped the notice of his fellow-men, while the great ocean of truth lay all unexplored before him; and I, though unlearned, feel that I have received some light, on God's word, that has not yet reached all my fellow travellers; and that I have much—O, so much—yet to learn, is no good reason why I should not let that light shine. I have had an increased desire, of late, to do what I could for the glory of God. In His good providence He permits me to be happier now than I have ever been before; and I have more time and better opportunities to devote all the powers he has given me to His service.

Perhaps what I have now undertaken, may bring upon me persecution of some kind. I know not, but if so, shall glory in it, as it will be for Christ's sake. And if we suffer with him, we shall also reign with him.

I have had to meet cares, trials, and sore afflictions, in my journey through life, but I know not that I have suffered anything yet for Christ's sake. When afflictions came, I said to my heart,

"Thy fate is the common fate of all.
Into each life some rain must fall,
Some days must be dark and dreary."

And when I have been annoyed and tried by other people, (those numberless little, petty trials, that so chafe one's spirit, and I think, sometimes, are harder to bear than great troubles), I have not always exercised becoming meekness and forbearance. I know I have been too apt to resent what seemed to me like injustice and injury, in word and look, if not in deed. To possess our souls in patience, at all times, has been a hard lesson for some of us to learn; but I have found that one can do all things, through Christ strengthening us.

A few weeks ago, we had a Rev. Mr. King, from London, Eng. He preached for us two days. Subject of first sermon, God's husbandry: from John xv. The text—"Herein is my Father glorified that ye bear much fruit"—and verses read in connection with it, made a deep impression on my mind. They seemed to have more force and meaning than ever before.

To all the dear readers of the HERALD I would say—Let us not forget who it was that said, "Every branch in me that beareth not fruit, He taketh away." And may we all do what we can to spread the light, and thereby glorify our Father which is in heaven.

FROM LOUISA J. BEACH.

BR. STORRS: I hastily write a few lines to say. that notwithstanding my long silence, my love and sympathy for the truth and those who believe and advocate it, remains unchanged, and my interest in the prosperity of the HERALD, unabated. I have not written, simply because duty called me in another direction; and while for months I could truly say,

My heart is grieved with trials sore,
And pressed with many cares,

yet, I have not for a day lost sight of the great prize for which I have been running these many years; neither have I been destitute of the support and consolation it is the privilege of God's children to enjoy, even amid the fiery trials which are to purify and perfect these last hours of time.

The times in which we live are fraught with so much interest, that the child of faith, who walks in the light of the prophetic word, can but lift up his head and rejoice in view of speedy redemption. And while darkness, worse than that which hung over Egypt, seems to envelope the minds of the people, he has light in his dwelling,—is not in darkness either in respect to the near approach of his Master, nor to his own position and duty. No time now for doubts—neither for drowsiness or indifference; but "as children of the light and of the day, we should not sleep as do others, but watch and be sober."

In view of the perils of the hour, the unbelief of many, the apostacy of some, the shaking of every thing which can be shaken, it behooves us to "cleave unto the Lord with full purpose of heart," and seek earnestly for grace that we may remain "steadfast and unmovable" to the end.

The time for our annual gathering is at hand. I trust it will be fully attended, and that there will be no falling off in zeal nor effort to sustain our paper and publish to the world a knowledge of the speedy return of our Saviour and LIFE-GIVER to redeem his chosen ones and reign in righteousness.

I do not know as I shall be able to meet with you this year, but I pray that the presence and blessing of the Lord of Hosts may be enjoyed by you.

I will pledge you $10 for my paper, and $5 for Tracts.

NEW BRITAIN, Conn., Aug. 12, 1870.

FROM ESTHER A. BROWN.

BR. STORRS: I still love the HERALD. I take comfort in reading it, and it rejoices my heart to hear from the dear ones of like precious faith, although strangers to me, most of them, yet I love them, and feel as though I belong to the same family. Praise the Lord, I still love the truth, the precious Bible truth, that will stand when Jesus comes. I suffer some persecution when I advance the truths of the Bible; but praise the Lord, "an hundred fold in this life, with persecution, and in the world to come, life everlasting." Eternal life is worth suffering for a little while. It is only a little while that we shall have to bear the scoffs and the frowns of this world. We are not above our Master. He suffered for us while here; but, glory be to Jesus' name, He gained victory over death and the grave. Yes, he arose triumphant, and is now at the right hand of the Father, interceding for us; and He saith, he never will leave nor forsake us. What a friend we have in Jesus! Yes, glory be to heaven's king, he is soon coming. He has the keys of hell and of death; he will unlock the prison houses of our loved ones and give them eternal life; and the living saints will be changed, and be caught up together to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we ever be with the Lord. I mean to be there.

"I don't care what this world may say,
When the gen'ral roll is called I'll be there;
They may scoff and I will pray,
When the gen'ral roll is called I'll be there."

CARTHAGE, Me., July 30, 1870.

AARON MASON, Groton Junction, Mass., writes: I send $10 to pay my pledge. Notwithstanding all the trials I have passed in the loss of earthly things, I find, as I travel on, that the rich inheritance Jesus has purchased for this fallen world becomes more and more precious to me. While desolation marks the progress of events, that are hastening on the glorious consummation of our hopes, we can but rejoice that the desolations of the Man of Sin are so soon to come to an end. The admonition of our Saviour to his disciples comes to us with increasing weight, "What I say unto you, I say unto all, watch." I hope to be able to attend the coming meeting of the saints at Springfield; and there may we get increasing strength to press the "battle to the gate." Your brother, looking for the inheritance and the crown at the coming of the "JUST ONE."

MRS. JAMES FOSTER, Newburg, Me., writes: Wishing to please Him who highly approved the widow's "mite," I inclose one dollar, trusting Him for the future. Do with it what you think best for the greatest good. I am very thankful that I have the opportunity to read the HERALD OF LIFE by means of a friend. How glad I am that I am firmly established in the faith of "No eternal life out of Christ." Though I suffer as if an evil doer, and am shunned, "I fear not the world's dread frown, nor heed its scornful smiles." "A little while and the wicked shall not be." O for a general rush to enlist in the holy war, is my prayer. Your sister in Christ, longing for the coming of the LIFE-GIVER.

BR. A. BOYNTON, West Batavia, N. Y. writes: We have but a short time left to labor and suffer for our dear Lord. O may we all show our faith by our works—act consistent with these great facts. Unless we do, and begin in very deed to slacken our hold and turn our eyes off from earth, and Lot-like flee this earthly Sodom, the doom of Lot's wife will be ours. May God's Holy Spirit set home the truth of His holy word to our hearts, that we may indeed be wide awake and shining brightly amid the thick darkness which is fast enveloping the world, letting our faith and works abound, more and more, while we "wait for the Lord from heaven."

TRUTH VS. MAN'S WISDOM.

WE have substituted the above name for the Campaign Document No. 20, instead of "RICH TRACT." Some have thought, that, as all our Tracts are rich, it was "invidious" to call only one by that name. Hence it is changed as above.

CAMP-MEETING IN MAINE.

THERE will be an Advent Camp-Meeting in North Hermon, on the ground we occupied last year, commencing Sept. 5. It is five miles from Bangor. A boarding tent will be under the direction of Br. Charles Philips. Board for man and beast at a reasonable rate. Those coming with tents will find lumber and straw on the ground. Preaching brethren generally, are invited to attend our camp-meeting. We would say, This meeting is to be a free one, for all. There will be no one to dictate the preachers what they shall or shall not preach. We hope to see a large gathering of the dear saints at Camp Hermon this year. Come, brethren and sisters, filled with the Spirit and love of God; then we can labor for the perishing, and strengthen the weak.

The Master's Call.

Up and be doing! the time is brief,
And life is frail as the autumn leaf.

To God and thy better self be true,
Do with thy might what thou find'st to do.

Though the day is bright and the sun is high,
Ere long 'twill fade from the glowing sky,

While the evening shadows darkly fall:
There's a time for rest, it will come to all.

The harvest is white, and the field is wide:
And thou at thine ease may'st not abide.

The reapers are few and far between;
And Death is abroad, with his sickle keen.

O, think of the Master, worn and faint,
Whose meek lips uttered no complaint,

Who toiled for thee 'mid the noontide heat,
And sought no rest for his weary feet:

Of sorrow and death, who drank the wine,
And bore His cross to lighten thine.

Go forth and labor! A crown awaits
The faithful servant, in Christ's estates.

For a death of shame the Saviour died,
To open that inheritance wide,

That souls, redeemed from the toils of sin,
With a spotless robe might enter in.

Work with thy might! ere the day of grace
Is spent, and the night steals on apace.

The Master has given His pledge divine;

Religious Laziness.

There is not only a right way of preaching the doctrines of the Gospel, but also a right way of hearing and doing them. Not merely the head, but the heart and the hand must be orthodox. To be honest in his profession, a Christian must be diligent in his practice. Sound theology shows in common life. Truth is not so much a thing of books as of works.

It is popular to preach man's inability. It pleases men who do nothing to tell them that they can do nothing. Duty must succumb to doctrine. Men have been galvanized (the printer will please be careful not to substitute a capital C for my lower-case g in that last word) into showy machines, when they should have been Christianized into full-statured immortals, as God intends. A guilty conscience will pay a premium on excuses. A man will reduce himself to a cipher morally, while, at the same time, he toils and struggles after substantial figures as the exponents of his brain and gold and place. The Almighty and the angels may call him a Nobody; but the world at home and abroad must call him the Somebody. He watches his accounts at the bank; but he is willing that his promise to Heaven shall go to protest every day. The Lord is displeased with professing Christians who keep up incessant talk about their own weakness and triflingness in spiritual things. Paul said that, God helping him, he could do all things. And it is only such venturing, valiant men that are divinely helped. David was but a lad when Goliah, in armor, challenged the Lord's host. But, young and light as he was, he was lithe of limb and bold of heart; and he stepped out alone to meet the giant, and with sling and pebble he brought him down.

Look what mighty, brawny, courageous men are historied in the Book of the Acts. Think! It is the Acts, not the Resolutions of the Apostles. Early Christianity was largely acts. Councils were few and creeds were unknown. Modern religionism, going under the name of Christianity, is wonderfully made up of words. For it is easier to talk than to work. It is common to bewilder the poor sinner with the catechism; but it is rare to go to him in his suffering, shame, and sorrow, and lead him to Christ. Calvin, Luther, Knox, Melancthon, Zwingli, Wesley, Campbell, not by their peculiar theologies, but by their earnest lives, were strong. The great army of reformers were men of action. Not one of them designed a sect. The suffixes of 'ism, and 'arian, and 'ite have well-nigh neutralized the honor of their names. Christ to them was all in all. They sought to re-establish the original discipleship of bearing the cross and saving men.

A true follower of Jesus does not apologize at every step as he advances through new scenes and unexpected scrutinies. He does not say to the world: "If you please," "If I may be so bold," "If you have no objections." He does his duty just as he comes up to it, as a man—as God and conscience command it to be done—pleasant or unpleasant, objections or no objections. Christ gives his disciples not the spirit of weakness, but "the spirit of power and of a sound mind;" and thus qualifies them to do the work while believing in his name. He must have strong men in his church—men of thought, plan, purpose, and executive force as individuals. The church nurtures weakness into strength. It is a place —or ought to be—of perpetual growth and gain. But in many sad instances it is, rather, a hospital and graveyard all in one!

Some people are weak because they are resolved to stay weak. They are blubbering babes in bibs at threescore years and ten. These helpless and unhelpful church members are obstructions. They cast a cold shade on all that is tender and sun-asking, and hinder growth. They are like the inhabitants of Meros, who refused to come forward to the help of the Lord.

And these weak people nurse their infirmity. It gets to be a pet; and you must not express a doubt about it, or seem to notice it. When a patient is relieved from fever, and his physician is anxious that he should arise from bed, get out-of-doors a little, and take some gentle exercise; suppose that, instead of gratefully responding, he should say: "O I am so weak, doctor—so weak! I cannot rise. Just let me lie still on my back here, and I'll take all the medicine you prescribe until I get strong. I have plenty of money to pay for all your medicine and for all your time. Change the medicine; multiply the medicine; come often, doctor, and never mind the expenses." The physician would say: "You lazy fellow! You are nursing and petting yourself into an incurable invalid. Neither my medicine nor your money will ever accomplish what yourself must do. Use what strength you have, if it be but weakness. Hold fast your gains. Get up; or drowse and die!"

There are analogous cases in the church. When you say to them: "Rise up! Take a little fresh air by visiting the poor! Exercise your faith in behalf of some struggling cause by prayer and alms and time!" "No, no," they say; "that's not what's the matter. Let the preaching be changed. Let another minister be called. I have money to pay for sweeter preaching than that, and more of it. Bring on the preaching. I'll take it. Only coat it with sugar, and I'll swallow it. Never mind the expenses." But the faithful minister says: "You lounging loafer in God's house, not your money, nor any preacher's sermons, but yourself, must do something. Use your strength, if it be but weakness. Arise! awake! stir up the gift that is within you; or drowse and die, and be damned!"

Nothing but exercise in grace develops a man in grace. Every man who goes to Heaven goes there not as so much dead weight lifted up, but as a living man—a man of faith and love and power—a man winged for flight and armed for overcoming. God's witnesses in all ages have been mighty and prevailing, not weak and wavering. It is sloth, and not grace, in a man's heart that makes him whine, "I am weak," and breaks off his faith in a plaint. For when a Christian is weak then he is strong; and he uses his strength, and something is done.

The bee-hunter puts a piece of honey-comb into a box. Then he captures a bee. He covers the bee within the box. The prisoner, as soon as the fright of the capture is over, moves about, tastes the honey, and is satisfied. The prison becomes a home. Being let loose, the bee finds his way back to the old hive; and in a little time returns, bringing others on willing wing. He has told his sweet story to former associates, and he wins them one by one; and they in turn win others in companies to come along, till the bee-hunter's box is filled with a swarm of bees. If any drones have drifted in by accident, or to sponge, they are tumbled out forthwith.

So every Christian should work. Every believer who has tasted the good Word to be sweeter than honey or the honeycomb, if true to conscience and to Christ, will be out after his companions and associates of former days, busy in every place and way in bringing sinners to share the blessings of God's house until all are satisfied. As Whittier so truly says:

"Self-ease is pain: thy only rest
Is labor for a worthy end,
A toil that gains with what it yields,
And scatters to its own increase,
And hears, while sowing outward fields,
The harvest-song of inward peace."

Remarks by the Editor.

The reader must not suppose we indorse every expression in the foregoing; but it is too good a rebuke of lazy professors of religion to be lost. Let us "work while it is day; for the night cometh in which no man can work." Let doctrine and work go together, and that will give us experience, followed by "a good hope."

Who can Live?

BY M. C. HARRIMAN.

If I understand the meaning of words, scripture proves all men, in their natural state, to be dead; now, already. Why? Because the final of all men (according to God's first judgment,) was death; to turn back to dust; and, without further and special measures are taken, all must forever remain in the embrace of death.

Now, if a decree is made, that through faith a man can live again, can that decree in any way affect those who fail to exercise faith? Impossible: as much so as it was for those who were bitten by the fiery serpents in the wilderness to be affected by the brazen serpent when they failed to look upon it.

Let us look at a little of the evidence to prove men as already dead; and the starting point, or foundation is, "Dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return." This language, directed to Adam as a representative man, applies to the whole race of humanity. Paul arguing from this great point says: "By one man, sin entered into the world, and death by sin: and so (or, in consequence of one man's transgression, he being the representative of the race,) death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned, (Rom. v. 12) and were counted as dead, being under God's irrevocable penalty.

Again: 2 Cor. v. 14—"For the love of Christ constraineth us, because we thus judge, that if one died for all, then were all dead. And he died for all, that they which live, (are to live) should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them." Now it seems evident that there are some that do not come under the order of those that live, for they do not live now unto him who died for them. But if Christ died for all, did he purchase life for all, or promise it to any, except on conditions? Let us see. John vi. 40: "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son and believeth on him may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day." Chap. iii. 36: "He that believeth not the Son, shall not see life, (at the last day) but the wrath of God abideth on him." Now, what is the wrath of God? or, what is the consequence of his wrath.

Gen. iii. 17–19. "Cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns and thistles shall it bring forth to thee, and thou shalt eat the herb of the field; in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken;" (in none of this consists the final penalty of sin, nor the completion of the wrath of God; but when he says,) "for dust thou art and unto it shalt thou return;" this is final; and a God of mercy cannot inflict any farther punishment: and man remaining where the threat leaves him, remaineth forever under the wrath of God.

If Christ died for all unconditionally, then all must unconditionally receive the same free gift, which is to be raised up at the last day; and Christ says they have everlasting life. This kind of reasoning would seem better adapted to Universal salvation than to any mortal resurrection theory.

Paul argues, again, that, "If Christ be not risen, then they also that are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." 1 Cor. xv. 17. If the "also," in this connection does not prove that one class have already perished, then I would ask, what could prove it short of a positive declaration? and, also, under what law those who did not fall asleep in Christ can be made alive? Certainly no law of revelation can claim this right. God's law is fully satisfied; they had not the spirit of Christ, therefore they are none of his; and being none of his, he has no claims on them.

Again: if Christ tasted death for every man unconditionally, then if all do not receive full salvation, he loses part of that for which he died, and therefore, in part, died in vain. Then what sense is there in the words, "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life?" None at all; they are merely words without meaning. But we conclude there were conditions; and that all who comply with them will be rewarded according to the promise, while those who do not, will remain just where the penalty of the law leaves them. What other conclusion can a man honestly come to? It was death that Christ purposed to save us from; and if we are united to him we have the promise that the sting of death shall be removed. If we do not become united to him, there is no power in heaven or in earth, able to remove that sting and give us life: no power on our side to help us; we have chosen death rather than life; therefore we must be held in death forever.

"He that believeth not, is condemned already." John iii. 18. Now as man cannot be condemned until he has been judged, for condemnation is the verdict or sentence of the judgment; and if the wicked are already judged and condemned, nothing more can await them, legally, but execution; and as it is a capital punishment, death is the conclusion of the whole matter: and here, with those out of Christ life must forever cease.

There is no place in God's word where life is promised to the wicked dead, as a gift, or threatened as a punishment: and how could there possibly be, when the whole conclusion of the law, as affecting the wicked, leaves them in dust?

Paul tells us, in 1 Cor. xv., that Christ died and rose again, and the benefit resulting from his resurrection; proving, as clearly as need be, that a resurrection from death is the gift promised by God through his love to those who believe on him.

Paul seems to have a good argument. Some tell us that he is only speaking of the righteous, in this chapter. He says, plainly, How are the dead raised? The whole argument is put in the form of a reply to this question. If it exists, I would like to see the proof that all the dead, ever to be raised, are not included.

Others tell us, this epistle was not a general one, like Peter's, James' etc., but was to the Corinthians, and does not concern us. Now, if we admit this to be a fact, the same argument also proves that all of Paul's fourteen epistles concern those churches only to whom they were addressed; and with more reason still, we could prove that the largest share of the whole Bible only applied to individuals who have lived in the past, or are yet to be born. But Paul says, 1 Corth. i. 2, "Unto the church of God which is at Corinth; to them that are sanctified in Christ Jesus, called to be saints, with all that in every place call upon the name of Jesus Christ our Lord." Now this looks as though others besides those Corinthians could accept Paul's argument as conclusive, and full; and if others, why not we, and all in every place? We will claim that privilege until the light grows brighter.

Jesus says, those accounted worthy to obtain the resurrection from the dead cannot die; for they are equal to the angels, and are children of God, being children of the resurrection. Where is the argument to prove a wicked man is not a child of the resurrection, if he is made alive from the dust?

Christ came to give life to all who would believe on him. All others have wandered out of the way of understanding; and according to God's own decree, must "remain in the congregation of the dead."

Fishersfield, N. H. August, 1870.

Power of Love.—The warm sunshine and the gentle zephyr may melt the glacier which has bid defiance to the howling tempest; so the voice of kindness will touch the heart which no severity could subdue.

Christ's love is the Church's fire; thither bring my heart when it is cold, frozen, and dead; meditate on his love, and pray until you can say, "He loved me and gave himself for me."

The best system of theology without love is a corpse. To make it a power, put life into it—glowing love to God and man.

The Nutmeg State.—De Tocqueville, at a Paris dinner, once said: "Connect de coot, de little yellow spot on de map, dat make de clock pedlar, de schoolmaster, and de Senator. De first give you de time, de second tell you what to do with him, and de third make you law and civilization. Ah! gentlemen, dat leetle State you call Connect de coot is one very great miracle to me."

What to Say.—A poor minister had part of his salary taken from him. How was he to pay for his bread, butter, and children's shoes, and ever so many other things? "Write to them that you cannot live on nothing," said his wife; "write by all means." "What can I say?" he asked, much down-hearted by the sad state of things. "I tell you," said his little girl. "Say, 'Give us this day our daily bread.'"

Good Temper.—Good temper is an inestimable blessing both in the work-shop and out of it. If people thought more of its value they would be at more pains to secure it. It was a saying of the great Addison, we think, that a good temper was worth five hundred a year. The Christian workman knows how it is to be got. When not a natural gift it must be planted and watered by God in the soil of a regenerated nature.

The Church's Artillery.—Prayers are the Church's artillery. As long as Moses continued in prayer, Israel prevailed over Amalek. The supplication of Hezekiah was the means of withering the mighty host of Sennacherib. Praying believers, it has been truly said, are of more service to a place than walls of brass and ramparts of iron.

A STORY.

It was in the month of September, 1861, when the three-months men were returning home, and the later regiments forming, that my story opens. The sun was sinking down behind the horizon when Amy at last saw the brown horse, with its tall, erect rider, coming up the broad path. In a moment all her speculations were over, and she was flying down the stairs to meet this dearly loved father. As he bent over her to kiss the uplifted face, she saw that there was a grave, almost stern, light in his dark eyes, and the embrace he gave her was almost painful in its close, convulsive pressure. Wondering, she followed him to the little library, where they were accustomed to pass their evenings.

He sat silent until the tea-bell rang, and the meal usually so cheerful passed off quietly, Amy almost terrified at her father's pale face, and deep abstraction. When they returned to the library, she could bear it no longer.

"Papa," she said, softly, while her eyes filled with tears, "are you sick, or is anybody dead? Dear papa, what is the matter?"

He lifted her to his lap, and kissed her fondly before he replied; then he said gravely:

"I was thinking of our country, Amy."

"Is there bad news? Not another battle already, papa?"

"No, there is no news to-day, but there must be many battles, much terrible news to hear, before we have peace again. Many men must leave home, many fathers their children, before the old flag can wave again over the United States."

"Papa! papa!"

The words came in a quick, panting breath, almost a cry, for, far away, the child began to see light shining on the cause of her father's gravity.

"I have been to-day to a meeting of some of the prominent citizens of New York who are about to raise a fund for equipping a new regiment. Amy, they want me to take command of it."

No sound came from the child's white lips. With her eyes staring wildly, her cheeks ashy pale, she sat erect, facing her father, till suddenly, with a cry of pain, she threw her arms round his neck, sobbing bitterly and kissing him as passionately as if the threatened parting had already come. His own eyes were not dry as he pressed the little trembling figure close to his heart.

At last words came, and she poured forth her sorrow and fears.

"O papa, you will not go! You cannot go! How could I live if you were away? I could not study, read, or ride, without you. Other little girls have mothers, sisters, or brothers, but I have nobody but you. How could I bear it? And then, every battle would put you in danger, and I should know it. Every day I must watch and perhaps at last hear—you—were—killed!"

The fearful prospect drove back the tears again, and whitened her cheeks, as she gasped out the words. Sensitive, precocious, and literally living in the sunshine of her father's devoted love, the possibility of separation had never before occurred to her, and such a parting as this threatened be, overcame her entirely.

Mr. Roberts caressed and comforted her. He was almost frightened at the storm of emotion he had raised.

"Amy, my darling, my child, do not look so. I will never leave you if you are unwilling. My child, I never thought to go without your free consent. You are my first love, my first duty, and you shall answer this request. Hush! do not speak now. I am not to give any answer for a week, and then you shall dictate the note. Now, lie here, in your father's arms, and get the color back to your face."

It was a strange, sad evening, and the succeeding days were like it. From whatever point the conversation started, it was sure to come back to the momemtous question. Amy could listen calmly, knowing the answer lay with herself, while her father told her of the need of soldiers who had some experience. Every hour found them together, and in the long conversations the child realized how her father's heart was bound up in the cause, learned to see the call he deemed so imperative in its true light, learned how true patriotism is unselfish, second only to religion. In the long nights, when, from her little bed, she could listen, and hear the unceasing step pacing to and fro in her father's room, she lay silently in bitter agony trying to think of the possibility of parting.

"He wants to go, he thinks it is right, and I am keeping him. Oh, when I wanted to give something to my country, I never thought I should be asked to give my father! If he goes, I must be sent to boarding-school, where I can never see him, and must wait days for letters, and if he is killed ——" and then a flood of tears generally ended by her sobbing herself to sleep.

It was the last day of the week, and Mr. Roberts rode out alone, leaving Amy to her decision. He had noted with a failing heart, the pale cheeks and red eyes, the mute caresses so frequent and often checked by tears, but a stern sense of duty urged him to conquer this weakness, and let the child, herself, see the urgency of the call.

Watching him ride away, Amy had pictured it the parting, and, blinded by tears, turned from the window. In vain she tried to think calmly; every affection and impulse was crying out: "I cannot let him go," till she was weary with the effort to decide. As she was pacing up and down the room, her eye fell upon a little locket lying on the floor. She recognized it instantly as the one her father wore upon his watch-chain, and which held her mother's miniature. As she opened it, the calm sweet face of her dead parent, seemed sent to quiet the quick beatings of her heart, and still her grief. She sat down, still holding the picture in her hand.

"She let him go," she whispered; "she loved him as much as I do—better, because she let him go when he wished. Why do I want to keep him? Only for myself. Only because I will be miserable when he is gone. Oh! my Heavenly Father, help me to do what is right.

She was on her knees now, and the sobs broke her voice as she prayed for strength and guidance, but as her resolution gained form and power, the sobs were stilled, and the voice grew clear and sweet in its fervent petitions. She did not hear the horse stop at the door, nor her father's step, as he came into the room —did not know he was there, till a strong arm clasped her, and a manly voice added a prayer to hers—a prayer for God's care for his noble child—a petition that her Heavenly Father would fill the place of her earthly one, and keep her mind pure and loving. And as the deep Amen fell upon her ear, she could rise and say, quietly:

"Papa, you must go!"

The weeks that followed were hard to bear. The tall, erect figure, in its handsome uniform, which rode from the door every morning, sometimes did not return till late at night, and the pale little face grew very sad as long, lonely days took the place of the pleasant companionship of her whole life.

The necessary preparations for her own departure to boarding-school, filled a portion of the time, but there were many, many sad hours left for weeping and lonely pain.

At last the parting came, and she was left in a strange house, surrounded by new faces, with the certainty that her father was gone for months, perhaps years, and his last words ringing in her ears:

"Remember, Amy, that by your noble self-devotion, your true love, you have given me the purest happiness of my life— the power to serve our country in her dark hour."

She had given him. One word would have kept him at her side, but she had not spoken it. Freely, trusting in God's love to guard him, she had sent him from her, and all her sorrow and pain was full of strange comfort.

And now, when the papers bear to her the record of her father's worth, when gray-haired patriots mention with reverential affection the name of one whose loyalty stands a shining example, the little girl carries to her heart the sweet pleasure of knowing that when his country called she did not hold him back.

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures." The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE AMARANTINE CROWN.

PETER, "an elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory which is about to be revealed," exhorts his fellow elders to feed the flock of God, and to set them a holy example; and though the hope of worldly gain is not to influence their labors, yet those labors will be splendidly rewarded, for he adds, "And when the Chief Shepherd shall be manifested, ye shall receive the amarantine crown of his glory."

The value which our blessed Lord sets upon service for his sake is wonderfully great. He understands this matter as we do not. It is not simply the outflow of marvellous love to his followers that prompts his sublime promises; though that is a perennial spring sparkling in the sunlight of his countenance; but it is also the result of his perfect knowledge of the position which their labor occupies in the eternal purpose of God. Everything connected with the church and the kingdom is arranged beforehand by a wisdom that never errs and a prescience that is absolutely independent of contingency. Yet so far is this fundamental fact from neceessitating an iron absolutism which will neither tolerate opposition nor graciously smile upon co-operation, it is undoubtedly true that God has borne long with every form of rebellion, and that he has offered the most splendid rewards to loyalty. Divine sovereignty is compatible with rewardable human service; the former recognises the latter in its arrangements concerning the future; and the place of every act of loving loyalty is harmoniously adjusted in the great purpose of God. The promises made to the obedient are, in fact, a part of the great original design, and as the time of their fulfilment synchronises with the second advent of the Lord, and the resurrection of the just, it follows that the belief of the promises and the expectation of these two supreme events have a powerful influence in strengthening and confirming each other. The beauty of the fadeless amaranth delights the imagination, but the amarantine crown—"the crown of glory that fadeth not away"—which is to distinguish the faithful under shepherd, will not be his in possession until the Chief Shepherd appear. Only then will this brilliant stephanos—this chaplet of honor with its hue of royal puple—rest upon his brow.

This is the oft-repeated and uniform testimony of Scripture; and if the church had not lost sight of the fact, as she has of some others which were dear to apostolic hearts, she would not have fallen into the fourfold error of glorifying men when they die, postponing the second advent until the close of the millennium, turning the church into the kingdom of Christ, and making the resurrection of the dead an absolutely unnecessary thing.

We ought to accept the teaching of God's holy word implicitly; for as one error leads to another, we may hold as divine verities a number of things which have no better foundation than the traditions of the dark ages, or the schools of heathen philosophy. "The faith once for all delivered to the saints" is in our hands, and its great leading doctrines are not only intelligible to the devout reader, but are so full of attractive beauty, so flooded with the light of love, that there is not a hair's breadth of room left to question their divinity. If the doctrines that the Lord will return before the kingdom is set up—that there is no glorification of departed saints until resurrection—that the resurrection of the holy dead takes place at the time of the Lord's advent; and that then, and not till then, are the splendid rewards he has promised bestowed upon his faithful ones;—we say, if these doctrines do not harmonize with the modern theology of ten thousand pulpits, so much the worse for modern theology. If the principle of harmony between revelation and theology is to be established, everything in theology which is contrary to revelation must be unsparingly sacrificed. To have mercy upon an error is cruelty to men. To make the word of God responsible for all that passes as religious teaching, would be simply absurd. We long for harmony between revelation and theology; our strength and life are being spent to secure it; it is the great, pressing, urgent necessity of this day, and we confidently submit that if the under-shepherds of the Chief-Shepherd's flock would carefully read what is promised in the New Testament concerning the rewards intended for the faithful among them, that they would see the necessity, both of the pre-millennial advent of Christ and the resurrection of the righteous, if these splendid promises are ever to be fulfilled—if these magnificent rewards are ever to be bestowed.

If language has any meaning, this is the conclusion to which apostolic language on the subject shuts us up. Let Paul's testimony be taken as another evidence of these weighty truths. He expected a "crown," for he too, like a noble Christian as he was, wished to appear in the coming age among the royal sons of God; but, when? When he died? Oh, no! He did not desire to be "unclothed," for he knew nothing of the modern discovery that death carries men direct to "heavenly glory." His words are, "Henceforth, there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous Judge shall give me at that day." (2 Timothy iv. 8.) What day? The day of "the appearing and kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ." (v. 1.) But will not "sound doctrine" cover the earth before that time? No, "fables"! (v. 4.) So, now, esteemed reader, you will see why we think as we do on all these unspeakably important and solemn matters. We have no theory to defend, no church to support, no system of theology to vindicate; but we do think that if God has given us a revelation we should make it the light to our path as we journey onwards in humble and yet most joyous hope of the amarantine crown.—Editor of the Rainbow.

THE LAKE OF FIRE.

BY F. H. BURBANK.

1. Its Origin.
2. Its Location.
3. Its Duration.
4. Is it Literal or Symbolic?

1. Its Origin. When the lake of fire first has an existence we have no means of determining. Some, however, apply it as a fulfilment of Peter's prophecy of the day of the Lord, when "The elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also." But there are serious obstacles in the way of such an application of the matter, which will be duly set forth as we proceed.

2. Its Location. Doubtless the present earth is the location of the lake of fire. There is not the slightest intimation that its location is on any other planet; and, as the Scriptures declare that "the righteous shall be recompensed in the EARTH, much more the wicked and the sinner," they settle the matter beyond controversy.

3. Its Duration. We have no means of ascertaining how long the lake of fire has an existence, but one thing we do know about it, and that is, it has an existence of more than a thousand years. Some may say that this is an assumption. That we are not assuming, but rather stating a fact that is clearly set forth in the Book, we will show.

Amongst other parties cast into the lake of fire we find three of great note, viz., the Dragon, the Beast, and the False Prophet. But they are not cast in there simultaneously. The beast and false prophet were cast alive together into the lake, but the dragon was cast "into the bottomless pit." It is plainly evident from Revelation, that the binding of the dragon and his descent into the bottomless pit, occurred at the same time that the other two parties were cast into the lake of fire.

After the lapse of a thousand years, the dragon or satan is loosed from the pit, and in the course of time makes war against the saints, after which he is cast into the lake of fire where his old companions were cast. Thus we find the lake of fire exists at the commencement and after the expiration of, the thousand years.

If we define "the lake of fire" to be Peter's melted earth, then it must either be in a melted condition throughout the thousand years, or else cooled off and inhabited again during the time, and melted once more after the period named has expired. But in either case we should become involved in a net of contradictions and absurdities.

Also, whether we place the thousand years in the past or in the future, if the lake of fire is the melted earth, we involve the prophecies in regard to that period in inextricable confusion. If the thousand years are in the past, then, as the beast and false prophet were cast into the lake of fire at the commencement of the thousand years, then the earth has been in a melted condition without any of the dwellers upon the earth knowing it. If the thousand years are yet in the future, the difficulty is as great, for nations are spoken of as existing during that period, for after its expiration, the dragon gathers his armies from them for his final struggle against the saints, when he is taken and cast into the lake of fire. Truly if the earth liquified by "fervent heat" is the lake of fire, then no armies could be gathered from it or people exist upon it.

Again. At the time the beast and false prophet were cast into the lake, their followers were not cast in, but were slain by the sword of him that sat upon the horse, and the "fowls were filled with their flesh." If the lake is the melted earth, then, not only the leaders of the armies, but the armies themselves would have shared the same fate, and the fowls would have no flesh to feed on, but would be in serious danger of having their own flesh consumed by fire.

Finally. At the time the dragon was cast into the lake, his armies were devoured by fire which came down from God out of heaven. As in the preceding case, if the lake of fire is the melted earth, then the armies could not avoid the fate of the dragon, their leader. While they, on terra firma, are devoured by fire from heaven, their leader is cast into the same lake of fire where the beast and false prophet were cast alive more than a thousand years previously, and the dragon is also cast there alive to be "tormented day and night forever and ever."

After the disposal of these great beasts, the sea, death and hell deliver up the dead which are in them. If the lake is the melted earth, then we have the strange spectacle of the righteous coming up out of a lake of fire, and a dozen more ridiculous contradictions of the teachings of the Bible. Perhaps this may suffice to show the duration of the lake of fire and also to show

4. Whether it is a symbolic or literal lake of fire and brimstone.

My own conviction is, that it is a symbolic lake of fire and brimstone, and not a literal one.

Its name suggests its symbolic character. It is not a world, an ocean, a sea, or a river of fire and brimstone: it is a LAKE of fire and brimstone. It is a lake of just such fire and brimstone as came out of the mouths of the horses mentioned in Revelations 9th chapter.

The characters cast into it are not literal ones. There have never been such beasts as dragons with seven heads and ten horns with crowns upon their heads; or beasts with seven heads and ten horns and crowns upon their horns; or beasts with two horns like a lamb that spake like dragons; yet, such kind of beasts were cast into the lake of fire, and cast there alive.

Death and hell were cast into the lake. They are not personages, though death is represented in Revelations as a personage riding horseback, with hell for his footman running behind him.

Death and hell do not deliver up any other dead persons than what are written in the book of life. Daniel wrote, "And at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. And MANY OF them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake; (these) to everlasting life."

Death does not deliver "THE dead" which are in it, as our translation has it, but simply dead ones, even those that are written in the book of life. The rest are cast into the lake just as death and hell are. Special mention is made that the beast and false prophet were cast in alive there, and it is plainly intimated that the dragon was cast in alive, for he was to be tormented day and night forever and ever. Death and hell must be as much alive as the others, for one rides on a horse and the other follows on foot. So if all these are literally living personages, then the wicked dead may be literally cast alive into a literal lake of fire and brimstone.

WHAT IS THE USE?

SOMETIMES the question is asked: "What good will receiving this doctrine do me? I trust in Christ; I have received the Holy Spirit; I hope for heaven; I love the Word of God, and I desire to serve God; what the better shall I be by believing that the Lord's coming will precede the millennium, and not the millennium come and pass away before the Lord's glorious appearing?"

1. You will become, as regards your hopes, more like the saints of apostolic times. No one can deny but that the personal coming of the Lord Jesus, and the glorious resurrection day, were the objects of their hopes, rather than death, or an expectation of the grandest triumphs of the gospel in this world.

2. You will understand the Bible better as a whole, and become more deeply interested in many parts which some Christians seldom read.

3. You will learn to take right views of the present dispensation. I can only mention three points: That it is elective, and not universal; that it is spiritual, and not national; that it will end in apostasy, and not glide gradually into millennial glory.

4. You will find new and abundant motives to watchfulness and diligence. If you search out the numerous texts which refer to the coming of Christ, the resurrection of the saints, and the ending in judgment of this present age, you will see how thoroughly practical the subject is. Everywhere it is connected with warnings, exhortations, and encouragements.

5. It will be a preservative from worldliness. You will see that the world cannot be improved gradually by human means, as some say; that judgment hangs over it; that it will soon pass away, as regards its present fashion; and therefore you must come out from it, not lay up treasures in it, nor be conformed to its practices.

6. It will be an antidote to discouragements under apparent failure and deferred success. You will mourn over the triumphs of evil, the counter-workings of satan, and the failure of many hopes; but you will see all has been predicted, and you will labor on as to God, still expecting to "save some," assured that your labor will not be in vain.

7. You will be fitted and prepared for coming troubles. The Word of God, in a vast number of places, speaks of the terrible events of the last days, declaring, over and over again, that there will be a time of trouble such as never was before, nor shall be again. Surely it is a dangerous thing to cry "Peace, peace," in the face of God's awful predictions. A fearful storm may burst upon the nations suddenly, disproving all the fond prophecies of man, and burying all mere human hopes in irretrievable ruin. Let us learn to regulate our expectations by God's revelation.

To these points several more might be added. It would be easy also to crowd the page with Scriptures bearing on each. But let these answers be thought upon, and tested, carefully by Scripture, and we have no doubt as to what the result will be.

A reception of the premillennial view, as it is called, takes nothing away. It is a real friend to all sound doctrine and zealous service. Perhaps, with those large gains which have been mentioned, you may have some trifling losses; you may be shunned, pitied, looked upon as a fanatic, etc.; but these are small matters. But ought this question, "What shall I gain?" to be a leading one in this or any other point of truth? Is there not a prior one? Is it true? Doth God's word reveal it? Let this question be first put with earnest study and fervent prayer, and God will certainly answer it.

Surely we cannot be right in our views respecting prophecy, unless our very hearts can intelligently and lovingly blend the two following petitions: "Our Father—Thy kingdom come;" "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." And how can those Christians ask the Lord to come quickly, who place the millennium, with its antecedents and subsequents, between the hopes of the Church and His coming. Such cannot really pray for both.

This is not a small matter of which we speak; and we would earnestly plead with all Christians to search it out for themselves, seeking the teachings and guidance of the Spirit of truth, fearing much to neglect any of his words.—Selected.

TRUTH AND ERROR MIXED.

IT has long been held both by believers and unbelievers, that the Bible taught an endless life of misery for the wicked. But around this supposed dogma of Scripture gathered very conflicting thoughts of the human heart. Is evil to be eternal? Is such a punishment just? Is this to be the final result to we know not how many of the creatures of God? The thoughtless mind may dismiss such questions as of small moment, but no mind that thinks—that takes in, in the faintest measure, what they mean—can treat them thus. Confessed or unconfessed, the heart that thinks of the meaning of endless agony to one being—not to say myriads of beings—feels that there must be a mistake somewhere. We are now speaking of those who accept the Bible as God's word. The infidel willingly accepts the doctrine as taught in Scripture, for it gives him what he feels his best and strongest reason for rejecting Scripture as a fable. But the Christian mind feels there is a mistake somewhere!

A mistake! But where? Has the great majority of men, in reading Scripture, erred in supposing it to teach the eternity of punishment? Is Origen's view after all correct? Is there to be an end to punishment? Are all to be restored one day, in some coming far-off age? No unprejudiced reading of Scripture will see this to be its teaching. Eternal—eternal—is there written of punishment, if it be written of the life of the redeemed, and of the being of God himself.

A mistake! But where? If not in the eternity, where then? Is there nothing else we can examine but the adjective? Is there not the noun? Is there not "punishment?" Yes, this noun must engage our attention. It is a word of primary importance. We hold that the infidel and the Augustinian take the just meaning of the adjective. We differ from them on the meaning of the noun.

Is there no punishment except conscious pain? Is not the deprivation of blessing a punishment? Is not the privation of life—unfelt from the moment of its infliction—a punishment? Is it not the longest of all punishments? Yes, for it lasts for the period of life which it has taken away! Then the privation of a life that would last forever is an eternal punishment. Such is the eternal punishment of eternal death, spoken of in Scripture. It deprives the sinner of the eternal life which was man's birthright at creation, and which is restored in the gospel of Christ. Here is the whole truth. But whence the general mistake as to the meaning of the noun "punishment?" Whence the use of "eternal punishment," and "eternal torment," as convertible terms? Whence the notion of eternal life as an accompaniment of hell and its punishment? Here! A little phrase of five words, repeated in our ears from childhood to age, taught us by parent, tutor, pastor, as a first truth, the immortality of the soul.

All men must live on forever; good men and bad men are immortal. No man on whom God has bestowed existence can lose it; the degraded savage and the intellectual monster have a life like God's life; this is the dogma repeated in human ears, until the world has regarded it as an indubitable truth!

Now, if it be a truth "eternal punishment" and "eternal torment" are convertible terms. Of this there can be no doubt: if any number of persons are to be punished eternally, and if they are to live eternally, then they must exist in torment eternally. But whence the first truth of the immortality of the soul, or of man's inalienable immortality? It is worth while pursuing the idea to its source, for really upon this hinges the controversy between us and our opponents, both of the schools of Origen and Augustine. Is it from Scripture? Is there any thing about it in Scripture? Is there so much of it in Scripture as to give a color to a falsehood? Is there that modicum of truth, which mixed with its proper proportion of falsehood, gives to the compound so much of the reality of truth as renders the lie tenfold dangerous? There is. Some of this view is true! And there is that within us which gives back to the portion of truth the echo of the human heart. Plato's grand idea was not wholly a mistake.

Now, what is the deadliest poison? Not poison unmixed; that would be detected at once. It is poison mixed up with good food that most certainly works death. The poisoned loaf of bread, the poisoned cup of wine. There is bread, the staff of life, wine that cheers man's heart, but along with it, poison.

Now, what is there in Scripture about man and his immortality? A great deal. Man was made to live on forever. There is no doubt of it. He was not made subject to that law of death to which inferior creatures were. As made for immortality, man can even still, though fallen, form an idea of it, value it, long for it, feel almost as if he had a right to it, and the hereditary feeling is one of the strongest principles of our human nature. Here is one truth of Scripture ready for admixture with error.

Here is another! Sin came. Death came. But with sin and death came from the God of Life redemption from sin and death. The sin that marred creation; the death that supervenes, shall not be the destruction of the human race. There shall be, in spite of both, a future life—yea, an everlasting life like God's life for man. Myriads whom we cannot reckon—sprung from the first Adam, and redeemed by the second—shall throughout an age that has no end, enjoy the life of God. There is a future life, and that an endless one, for man. Here is another Scripture truth.

Thus we see that there is a great deal in Scripture about immortality and a future life for man. The race was made for immortality: the redeemed shall possess immortality.

But is this the view of Augustine? Does it go his length? Is it his complete view? Is there no link wanting? There is. We want yet two things. That is, for future life for the lost, and that an eternal one.

Whence is this link supplied? From Scripture? No. There is not one text in Scripture for it: there are against it hundreds. From reason? No. Reason does not supply it. Reason tells us, that if man could lose the holiness in which he was created, he might also lose his immortality. Whence, then? From a school of philosophy, which knew nothing, or next to nothing, of the history of man's creation; which knew absolutely nothing of the history of man's redemption. It had not before it these main facts on which to build its theory: it had but the sight of death and the strong longing for life. On this single fact it built its theory, and as it could see no sufficient grounds for bestowing immortality upon some and not upon others, it bestowed immortality upon all alike.

Here is the missing link, found in the temples of Egypt and the schools of Greece. But the link is broken: it could not stand the strain, and we will have nothing but the golden chain let down from heaven to earth, and which connects man's immortality with Christ, who is his life.—Selected.

REPREHENSION.

To reprehend well, is both the hardest and most necessary part of friendship.

Wherein can a friend more unfold his love, than in preventing dangers before their birth; or, in reducing a man to safety, which is travelling in the way to ruin? I grant, the manner of the application may turn the benefit into an injury; and then it both strengtheneth error, and wounds the giver. Correction is never without effect. Vice is a miry deepness; if thou strivest to help one out, and dost not, thy stirring him sinks him in the further. Fury is the madder for his chain. When thou chidest thy erring friend, do it secretly, in season, in love.

Reproof, in the presence of a multitude, makes a man take up an unjust defence, rather than manifest a just shame.

Nor can I much blame a man, though he shuns to make the vulgar his confessor; for they are the most uncharitable tell-tales that the burthened earth doth suffer. They understand nothing but the dregs of actions; and with spattering those abroad, they besmear a deserving fame. A man had better be convinced in private, than be made guilty by a proclamation.

Even concealment of a fault, argues some charity to the delinquent: and when we tell him of it in secret, it shows we wish he should amend before the world comes to know his weak places.

Next, it ought to be in season, neither when the brain is misted with arising fumes; nor when the mind is maddened with unreined passions. Certainly he is drunk himself that profanes reason so as to urge it to a drunken man. Nature unloosed in a flying speed, cannot come off with a sudden stop.

> He's mad, that checks a mother's eyes' full tide
> At her son's grave: there 'tis no time to chide:

Was the opinion of the smoothest poet. To admonish a man in the height of his passion is to call a soldier to counsel, in the midst of a battle. Let the combat slacken, and then thou mayest expect a hearing. All passions are like rapid torrents; they swell the more for meeting with a dam in their violence. He that will hear nothing in the rage and roar of his anger, will, after a pause, inquire of you. Seem you to forget him, and he will the sooner remember himself. For it often falls out, that the end of passion, is the beginning of repentance. Then will it be easy to draw back a retiring man: as a boat is rowed with less labor, when it hath both wind and tide to drive it. A word seasonably given, like a rudder, sometimes steers a man quite into another course.

A blow bestowed in the striking time, is better than ten delivered unseasonable. There are some nicks in time, which whosoever finds, may promise to himself success: as in all things, so in reproof; especially if he do it as he ought, in love. It is not good to be too severe or virulent. Kind words make rough actions plausible. The bitterness of reprehension is sweetened with the pleasingness of compellations. If ever flattery might be lawful, here is a cause that would give it admission. To be plain, argues honesty; but to be pleasing, argues discretion. Sores are not to be anguished with a rustic pressure; but gently stroked as with a lady's hand. Physicians fire not their eyes at patients; but calmly minister to their diseases. Let reproof be so done that the offender may see affection without arrogancy. Who blows out candles with too strong a breath, does but make them stink, and blows them in again.

Every man that admonisheth, assumes as it were a superiority over the other, which, if it be not allayed with proofs of kindness, grows hateful; so that even the reprehension is many times the greater fault of the two.

Nor can he be a competent judge of another's crime, that is guilty of the like himself. It is unworthily done, to condemn that in others, which we would not but have pardoned in ourselves. When Diogenes fell in the school of the Stoicks, he answered his deriders with this question: "Why do you laugh at me for falling backwards, when you yourselves do fall backwards, in your lives?" He is not fit to take the motes from men's eyes, that looks upon another with a beam in his eye. Freed, we may free others. And if we please them with praising some of their virtues, they will with much more ease be brought to know their vices. Shame will not let them be angry with them, that so equally deal both the rod and laurel. If he be much our superior; it is good to do it sometimes in parables, as Nathan did to David: so let him by inference give himself the censure. If he be an equal, let it be seen that affection, and the truth of friendship urge you to it. If he be our inferior, let it seem our care and desire to benefit him. I would be sure to show humility and love toward all. Though I find a little bluster for the present, I am confident I shall meet with thanks afterward, and, in my absence, his reverend report following me. If not, the best way to lose a friend, is by seeking by my love to save him. It is best for others that they hate me for vice; but if I must be hated, it is best for myself that they hate me for my goodness. For then am I my own antidote, against all the poison they can spit upon me.—Selected.

Children's Department.

"My Best Friend."

So said my niece, Katie Goodwin, one morning, as I closed the book I had been reading. It was about Christ's love and kindness even to his enemies. "I want to be like Jesus," said Katie. And she uttered the words as if she really meant what she said.

Now Katie was a sweet, amiable girl. We all loved her. There was so much that was gentle and lovable about her, and nothing seemed to delight her so much as when she was helping the poor, or leading some blind female across the street, or reading to some little child the story of Jesus and his love to sinners.

I can assure you that Katie loved Jesus, and nothing was so pleasant to her as hearing, or singing, or speaking about her Saviour. Oh, with what delight and sweetness, too, did she sing those words, beginning,

"I think when I read that sweet story of old,
When Jesus was here among men,
How he called little children like lambs to his fold,
I should like to have been with him then."

And how she always brightened up when she came to the words,

"Yet still to his footstool by prayer may I go,
And ask for a share in his love:

Shall I let you into a little secret? One morning, soon after breakfast, I had occasion to go into Katie's bed-room; and where do you think I found her? Seated upon a high chair near the window, holding in her hands a nicely bound book.

"Katie," I inquired, "do you like to be alone?"

"Sometimes, aunty; but I don't feel lonely."

"What is that book you hold in your hand?"

"My Bible, aunty; and I have been reading about my best friend."

"Who is your best friend, then, Katie?" I asked.

"Jesus Christ."

"How do you know he is your best friend?"

"Because he loves me—the Bible says he does."

"But your father and mother love you. Are not they your best friends?"

"They are my best earthly friends, aunty; they love me, but not as much as Jesus does; they are not like Jesus."

"I think your mother would do or suffer almost any thing for you, Katie," said I. "What has Jesus done for you, that she or your father either would not do?"

"O aunty, you know. Jesus was nailed to the cross. He died for me."

I could scarcely refrain from tears as I saw the earnest manner in which the dear child uttered these words; but, being anxious to find out what she knew about the death of Jesus, I asked her:

"Why did he die for you, Katie?"

"Because he loved me, aunty; that he might wash away my sins, and make me one of his own children."

"And did he die for no one else but you, Katie?"

"Oh, yes, aunty, for you, and for father and mother, and all the world."

Then, looking me full in the face, she inquired: "Now don't you think Jesus is my best friend, aunty?"

I took her upon my knee, but for several moments I could not utter a word. At length I said:

"Jesus is, indeed, your best friend. He is the friend of sinners; yes, of those who were any thing but his friends. While we were yet sinners Christ died for us. Not that we loved him, but that he loved us."

Jesus is your best friend—even if you do not as yet feel it. You must think about him—what he has done for those who have sinned against and grieved him; and sure I am that if you only carefully read the life of Jesus, and think why did Jesus do and suffer all this, you will soon begin to feel that he is your best friend.—Selected.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, AUGUST 24, 1870.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Editor's Absence.

The Editor expects to be absent till some time next week. The anniversary of the "Life and Advent Union," commences to-morrow (Thursday) Afternoon, and will continue over Friday. The Editor designs to remain at Springfield a few days later; and there will be no issue of the Herald of Life next week, or until Sept. 7.

The European War.

We have have nothing specially new and reliable to report. It is evident, however, there has been desperate fighting the week past, and thousands on thousands killed or wounded; forty thousand are reported killed or wounded in a battle on Friday last. The victories nearly all seem to be on the side of Prussia, and the French appear to be trying to retreat towards Paris, which city is now threatened by the Prussians. Nothing seems to be certain as to which power is likely to be ultimately victorious, but all appearances, at this date, (Tuesday), are on the side of Prussia, and a tolerable certainty of the downfall of the Napoleon dynasty—"He goeth into perdition," is the language of prophecy; and it seems as if the time has come for that event; but we wait to see.

To Disappointed Subscribers.

As we have said, a hundred and fifty subscribers failed to receive the outside of the Herald of Life for July 20. We had hoped to remedy this by other subscribers returning to us that number, after having read it; but in this we have been disappointed. Hardly a dozen have been sent to us. We do not blame any of them for preferring to keep that number; but to remedy the disaster to the 150 disappointed ones, we have reprinted the principal article of July 20 on the last page of this week's issue. Our friends who had the "Instructive Letter" in the July 20th issue, will not object to seeing it again for the sake of those who had it not: at least, so we think.

Thoughts for Consideration.

Those who embrace the doctrine of Life and Immortality only through Jesus Christ feel that they hold the most glorious of all truths ever made known to men. This feeling, we believe, is just and right. But what influence should it have on our hearts and lives? The most glorious truths, embraced and believed, ought to produce results proportionate to their value; else, we "hold the truth in unrighteousness," and have reason to fear a greater condemnation. Men, then, holding such invaluable truths, ought personally to be constant imitators of Christ in all his tempers of mind, and devotion to the welfare of men.

To one point, especially, we wish to call attention, viz.: Our feelings and conduct toward those who differ from us in opinion. Too often, it may be, a disposition is felt like that of the imperfect disciples, when they were ready to call fire down from heaven to consume those who would not receive their Master. There was an honest zeal for the truth in that feeling, but it was not chastened by that pure love which filled the heart of their Master. It seemed to them, the truth was so manifest, that Jesus was the true Messiah, that not to receive him at once, was evidence of a wilful obstinacy in the matter, that rendered them deserving of instant death. They did not understand their own spirit, or temper of mind, much less did they comprehend the long-suffering love that reigned in their beloved Master's heart. We cannot tell what light, or evidence, has been bestowed on another's mind, and therefore we are not competent to judge whether the rejection of truth is wilful, or, at present, unavoidable from circumstances over which that person has had no control. At any rate, his rejection or non-reception of what we regard as important and glorious truth is no reason why we should not be patient towards him. Let us remember the long-suffering patience of God towards us, while we were in unbelief, and perhaps sinned against greater light than he whom we may now be disposed to condemn for remaining just where we were. Impatience, or harsh treatment of them will not be likely to lead them to the truth, but drive them farther from it, and possibly harden them in unbelief.

While, therefore, we may not yield up, or abandon, any truth we have received, of life in Christ alone, let us strive by kindness, and a clear presentation of the truth, to lead men rather than seem to drive them into the truth. If we contemplate our own past experience, we shall see the fitness of this course. In conversation with those who differ from us, or do not yet see as we do, if irritation is manifested by them, let it not produce the same in us: better to drop the subject, for that time, than attempt to continue, if a Christ-like spirit cannot be maintained.

Moreover, it is not enough that we gain men to our opinions, or faith: if they are not gained to Christ, even to a vital union with him—"made partakers of the divine nature"—they "have no life in" them, and will perish, notwithstanding their knowledge in theory. We believe the views we maintain, of life only in Christ, are, in themselves, better calculated to win the heart to God and his Christ than any others; but let us not be content to lead men to the theory of life in Jesus alone. Let us labor, in love, to induce them to such a consideration of these glorious truths as shall effectually draw them into an experience of this life-giving union with the Son of God.

We fear, both with respect to ourself and others, that under the strong opposition we sometimes have had to encounter, in contending for truth, we may not have sufficiently considered that our object is not gained merely by silencing our opponent, or by converting them to our views of truth. They and we ought to be better Christians—more like Christ—by the acquisition of such glorious knowledge of God and his Christ, and of the love of God so wonderfully manifested towards the perishing children of Adam. If, instead of this, we become more worldly, more uncharitable, more impatient, more proud, and less meek and lowly like our Master, what have we gained? and what must others think of the truths which we profess to have embraced? If ever men, since the apostles' days, were called to be devoted Christians, and to make sacrifices to promote truth—even the knowledge of God and His glorious scheme of mercy in Christ—we should count ourselves the men. Shall God's light, with which he has blessed us, be by us "put under a bushel?" or shall we let it shine to enlighten and bless others?

Let us labor, by word and deed, with all meekness and patience, with long-suffering, to spread the truth abroad; and so order our lives as not to hinder that truth from its appropriate work of making men more like Christ—more heavenly-minded, more obedient to our heavenly Father's will in all things, "waiting for his Son from heaven, whom he raised from the dead; even Jesus, who delivereth us from the wrath to come."—1 Thess. i. 10.

or, the Penitent Thief's Case Considered.

The thief "said unto Jesus, Lord remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom. And Jesus said unto him, Verily, I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with me in paradise."—Luke xxiii. 42, 43.

This text is claimed by the advocates of "going to heaven at death" as teaching that an entity called the soul, in a disembodied state, goes immediately to heaven at the instant of dying. This assumption will be found to be without foundation in this text, when it is carefully examined, as well as irreconcilable with the general tenor of the Scriptures.

1. What did the thief ask? Was it that Jesus would have mercy on his soul? There is not a word said about such an entity in the conversation. "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." The common theory overlooks entirely the thief's prayer, and turns the truth into a folsehood by making it read, "Lord, take my soul into heaven with thy soul when we are dead." But nothing of this kind is uttered. The thief spoke of a kingdom—"thy kingdom," the kingdom of Messiah; the kingdom, of course, which God had promised him. We need not travel through all the promises of the Old Testament—which are many—where God promised to give Messiah the throne of Israel; but let us come to one in the New Testament which is so plain that no one need mistake the promise of God in reference to what throne, and hence what kingdom the Messiah, the Christ, is to occupy.

Said Gabriel to Mary, "Thou shalt bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus . . . And the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David," etc.—Luke i. 32, 33. It is plain what throne Jesus—the Jesus the thief addressed—is to occupy. Was that throne in the theological heaven? The answer must be, "No;" for David never had a throne in that locality—he does not now, and never did have a throne there; for inspiration declares, "David is not ascended into the heavens."—Acts ii. 34; consequently he had no throne there. Where, then, was his throne? It was on earth, on Mount Zion, in the city of Jerusalem, and nowhere else. That throne was cast down when the Babylonians took Jerusalem, and carried captive the last reigning king of David's line, and the Lord said of that throne and kingdom, "Take off the crown . . . abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him."—Ezek. xxi. 26, 27.

Here we find the throne of David, and the kingdom which God had promised with an oath to give to David's Son; and Jesus was that Son, as Gabriel affirmed. That throne he has not yet occupied; that promise of God has not yet been fulfilled; yet, "I will give it him," said he who cannot lie.

If the thief prayed, or spoke understandingly, he had reference to the time when Jesus would occupy David's throne, on "Mount Zion, in Jerusalem, and before his ancients gloriously."—Isa. xxiv. 23. That time is clearly marked in prophecy, not at death, but when "He will swallow up death in victory . . . and take away the rebuke of his people from off all the earth; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."—Isa. xxv. 8. This, inspiration tells us, will be, not when saints die, but "at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible," etc.—1 Cor. xv. 52. And our Lord saith, "This is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day."—John vi. 40. Again Jesus saith—that "same Jesus" who hung upon the cross—"When the Son of man [the Son of David] shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, THEN shall he sit upon the throne of his glory."—Matt. xxv. 31.

Thus we have a combination of testimony, invulnerable as the oath and promise of God, that the throne and kingdom of Jesus are yet in the future, and are on the earth, and not to be possessed by him till the resurrection "at the last day."

Again, we ask, What was the thief's prayer? "Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." Archbishop Whately says, "Into is a mistranslation: it should be in thy kingdom. The meaning is—at thy second coming in triumphant glory."—p. 324 of Whately's Future States." The prayer, then, is distinct and clear; it is a prayer to have part in the resurrection "at the last day." To be remembered, after death, is to have a resurrection: not to be remembered, is not to have one. Thus Job says, "Drought and heat consume snow waters; so doth the grave [sheol] those who have sinned . . . he shall be no more remembered."—Job xxiv., 19, 20. To be remembered is to live again from the dead. Thus Job speaks, "O that thou wouldst hide me in the grave [sheol], that thou wouldst keep me secret until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldst appoint me a set time, and remember me."—Job xiv. 13. The connection shows that, with Job, to be remembered was to "live again;" verses 14, 15. Other texts show the same facts. David speaks of some whom "God rememberest no more."—Psa. lxxxviii. 5.

Thus we come to an understanding of the thief's prayer. He asked Jesus to give him life again, at the last day, when he should come in his kingdom. We may now contemplate the reply. "Verily, I say unto thee today," etc. Our first inquiry is, What day is spoken of? The original word is seemeron; very generally translated this day. What does "this day" refer to? Was it the day they hung upon the cross? or, was it the day of which the thief had just spoken? We take it to be the latter: as though our Lord had said "You ask me to remember you in the day that I shall come in my kingdom. In this day of which thou hast spoken, thou shalt be with me in paradise."

We take this view for several reasons: 1st. The paradise of the Bible was not in existence at the time of the crucifixion, as we shall presently show: 2d. The thief did not die in the literal day that Jesus did; 2d. Jesus himself did not go heaven that day in which he died, and the advocates of the "go to heaven at death" theory affirm paradise and heaven are identical.

1. The paradise of the Bible was not in existence at the time of the crucifixion. The term paradise occurs but three times in our translation of the Bible, viz., in the text; in 2 Cor. xii. 4; and Rev. ii. 7. It signifies a garden of delights, hence theologians apply it to the Garden of Eden. That paradise was lost by the first Adam, but paradise will be restored by the second Adam, which is Christ; but it is not yet restored, that is a self-evident truth. In 2 Cor. xii. it is spoken of as synonymous with "the third heaven." Paul's man, spoken of, was "caught up to the third heaven," verse 2, and of the same event, verse 4, it is said, he "was caught up into paradise."

Thus the third heaven and paradise are seen to be one and the same place. The scene was a "vision;" a manifestation of "things which shall be hereafter," as it was said to John in Revelation. There is to be a paradise—a third heaven; and Paul's man in rapture, or vision, saw it. Can we tell what it is? and where it is to be? Peter tells us, "the heavens and earth were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water; whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished; [that is the first heavens]: but the heavens and the earth which are now [this is the second heavens] . . . reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men;" but, says he, "nevertheless, we, according to his promise, look for a new heavens [that will be the third] and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness."—2 Pet. iii. Have we not found Paul's third heaven, the paradise? John saw in vision this "new heaven," Rev. xxi. 1, "and a new earth;" and he saw the "new Jerusalem coming down from God," etc., and he "heard a great voice from heaven, saying, Behold, the tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God;" [paradise restored]; and Jesus saith, "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of Life which is in the midst of the paradise of God."—Rev. ii. 7.

Thus we find what paradise is, where it is, and when it is to be entered; not at death, nor at any period short of the new creation by Christ, and the glorification of his people at the last day; when he shall come in his kingdom, and the promise to the penitent thief will be fulfilled in "this day" of paradise restored, and the second Adam Lord of it, having the right to give the fruit of the tree of life to all who have accepted him as their Life-giver.

Here we might rest the question, but some need line upon line to remove their traditions received from men. We say, therefore, in the next place, it cannot be proved that the thief died in the same day that Jesus did; and, hence, did not meet him in paradise, whether that place was heaven, or a fancied conscious state somewhere else. Jesus died at three o'clock in the afternoon, or the ninth hour of the day. The day ended at sunset, as the Jews reckond time. The thief was still alive, and it was evening when his legs were broken to hasten his death. He did not die in the literal "to-day" when the promise was made him.

But, lastly, supposing heaven is paradise, and that the death of both parties occurred in that literal day, how is it to be proved that they went to heaven? Paul saith, "Christ died . . . and that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day;" etc., 1 Cor. xv., 3, 4. This language forbids the idea that he went to heaven during those three days; and Jesus himself testifies that he did not go there; for after he rose from the dead, he declared to Mary, John xx. 17, "I am not yet ascended to my Father." He did not, then, ascend to paradise the day he died, and had not for three days after; and hence, if the thief went there, he did not find Jesus, and the promise failed. There is no evading our Lord's words to Mary by saying, "Jesus meant he had not been to heaven in his body." He speaks of his personality—"I am not yet ascended," etc. Jesus—the person—had not been to paradise. He said to the thief—"Thou shalt be with me." Not, thy soul shall be with my soul. Three days after the same me saith, "I am not yet ascended." Here is demonstration of the incorrectness of the common construction of this Scripture. There is no proof from it of the survivance of a conscious entity called the soul, in death. Jesus saith nothing of a soul or souls in the entire account. We might extend our remarks greatly on this text, but we judge enough has been said to show its utter irrelevancy as proof of the common theory of going to heaven at death.

The Punishment of Sin:

or, Reasons for Dissenting from the Opinion that such Punishment is a Life of Misery Hereafter either Limited or Eternal.

1. Because it is a violation of the penalty God has annexed to the transgression of law. That penalty is plainly and positively revealed to be, neither eternal or limited torment in a future life, but, "death." "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die."—Gen. ii. 17. "The soul that sinneth it shall die."—Ezek. xviii. 4, 20. "The wages of sin is death."—Rom. vi. 23. "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death."—James i. 15. "Why will ye die?"—Ezek. xviii. 31. "He which converteth a sinner from the error of his way, shall save a soul from death."—James v. 20.

2. Because God has plainly declared that, "all the wicked will He destroy."—Psa. cxlv. 20. That they "shall be punished," (not with immortal wo, or future misery, a long or short time, after this present life, but) "with everlasting destruction," etc.: that they are "fitted to destruction:" that their way "leadeth to destruction:" that they are "cast down into destruction:" that their "end is destruction:" for they "shall be destroyed forever."

3. Because Jesus Christ, the faithful and true Witness, plainly defines destruction to be, not a destruction of happiness merely, nor a destruction after being made alive from the dead, but a destruction of soul and body in hell; (gehenna).—Matt. x, 28. Sheol, or hades becomes gehenna to all who die in their sins; because "sheol consumes those that have sinned."—See Job xxiv. 19.

4. Because other terms, relating to this subject, harmonize with a literal death and destruction of being; denoting the same, and not a temporary, nor an eternal existence in torment, after a resurrection from the dead. Such are the terms, perdition, lost, perish, coming to an end, "He will burn up the chaff," (the children of wickedness) "with unquenchable fire." If the fire is not quenched, the chaff is utterly consumed and destroyed. "Their worm dieth not:" the inevitable conclusion of such language is, devouring, an entire dissolution. "They shall be as though they had not been." Obadiah 16.

5. Because the Bible plainly represents the punishment not as a miserable future life, whether long or short, but death, (Rom. vi. 23); destruction, (Matt. vii. 13, 14); corruption, (Eph. vi. 8); perdition, or being lost.

6. Because the opinion of man's natural immortality, which is the basis and origin of the idea of eternal torments, and the notion of a future life of the wicked, from the dead, have neither of them any foundation in the word of God. The whole scheme of human redemption is founded on the fact that man is inherently mortal, and would utterly perish in death, like the brutes, but for the intervention of God in Jesus Christ, to become "the resurrection and the life." There is not one utterance in the Bible that declares man is by nature immortal, or that any man shall live again when once dead, except by virtue of a union with Christ, the Life-giver.

7. Because the eternal Spirit of truth has inseparably connected the immortality and the future life of men (condemned already to death) with a vital union with the Son of God, by a divine renewal of the Holy Spirit.—John iii. 36: vi. 53: Rom. viii. 11. "He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life. And this is the record, that God hath given unto us eternal life; and this life is in his Son;" (not inherent in ourselves, nor imparted to the rejectors of it to give life from the dead.)—1 John v. 11, 12. "The gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord."—Rom. vi. 23. In Christ alone is a future life to be had, and such life is eternal; no temporary life from the dead is promised or threatened to be given "at the last day." There is no such expressions as a happy or a miserable future life. Life is what is given. That all such life is both happy and eternal is abundantly proclaimed in the Book of God.

8. Because the utter destruction, in death, of impenitent sinners is a sufficient manifestation of God's holy opposition to sin; doing ample honor to his justice, and infinitely more compatible with his revealed character as "the Father of Mercies." "The wages of sin is" (not eternal torment, nor partly torment, but) "death."—Rom. i. 32: vi. 23. Consequently, punishment so vastly worse than death—as endless, or hopeless and useless torment must be—would be more than justice requires. We question whether the human intellect can conceive a greater incongruity and contradiction than to suppose a being who claims the character of the "Father of Mercies," will hold intelligent beings of His own creation in ceaseless or useless torment in a life revived by His own power after the sinner is once dead. It is not wonderful that theologians, of reputed orthodoxy, have been compelled to confess themselves shocked and confounded by the serious contemplation of their own faith of a nature so horrible! Nor is it any more wonderful that men and women, who overlook the revealed doctrine of death as "the wages of sin," should take refuge, from a faith so monstrous, in the error of universal salvation. The doctrine of the ultimate salvation of the entire human race, although unsupported by the testimony of the Bible, is not more baseless than the doctrine of inherent immortality, nor half as dishonorable to the Divine government as the doctrine of endless torture, or

Finally: We reject the popular sentiment of the eternal existence of sin, and the misery of any portion of the human race, or of a future life in hopeless suffering and death again, because it involves a failure of the plainly revealed and glorious purpose of JEHOVAH, in the incarnate manifestation of his beloved Son; "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil"—make an end of evil.—1 John iii. 8. This counsel of the "Father of Mercies" shall stand, all evil shall be expelled from our world; and, "As truly as I live all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the LORD," saith He who cannot lie, and whose "word will not return void."—Numb. xiv. 21: Isa. lv. 11. Moreover, the Revelator has confirmed this word too strongly to leave even a loop-hole for the endless torment theorist: thus, "And every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth, and such as are in the sea, and all that are in them, heard I saying, Blessing, and honor, and glory, and powe", be unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever."—Rev. v. 13. Clearly the time will come when no such place or state as the theological hell can be found. The language of the Bible confines the punishment of the wicked to the earth: "The righteous shall be recompensed in the earth: much more the wicked and the sinner."—Prov. xi. 31. But the time is to come when "every creature in the earth" is to praise God and the Lamb. There is no escaping the conclusion, all the wicked are dead or converted. We believe "they shall not inhabit the earth," (Prov. x. 30), and that, therefore, "The wicked shall be cut off from the earth, and the transgressors shall be rooted out of it;" (Prov. ii. 22); but, as they are to be "recompensed in the earth," death irrevocable is their doom.

Sin is to be "finished," (Jas. i. 15), not eternally perpetuated. "The triumph of the wicked is short." The temporary existence of sin and sinners shall only serve to illustrate the glorious and eternal victory of Zion's King over all the powers of evil and darkness, bringing a greater glory, and forming a ground of eternal joy and confidence in the Redeemer in the hearts of all who have received the gift of eternal life.

The discerning mind, unbiased by human tradition, must perceive, that in the Bible there is no such revelation as that of inherent immortality, or of a future life from the dead, except as a gift thro"gh Christ; and from that gift the incorrigibly wicked are excluded. "The dead are raised incorruptible;" and hence, "immortal."

An immortal being cannot die. When God created man, he suspended his life, or continued living existence, on his obedience. Immortality and a life beyond death, or from the dead, are plainly revealed in the word of God; not as objects that all men possess, or will possess; but as objects to be sought after and obtained by faith in the Son of God, (John iii. 36); and by a "patient continuance in well doing."—What prophet or apostle, "moved by the Holy Spirit," ever told men, "You have immortal souls," or "deathless spirits?" or, that they would live again from the dead, except by a union with Christ, the LIFE-GIVER? If we admit the truth, "the wages of sin is death," how appropriate and forcible is the gracious appeal of our Father in heaven to transgressors of His righteous will, "Why will ye die?"

Are any speculating on this subject and witholding their hearts from their MAKER, and their love from their neighbor? Let them agonize to enter into life. The overwhelming conviction that immortality, with its inconceivable glories, to be realized in the kingdom of God, are lost,—all forever lost—by voluntarily preferring this world to God and a part in his kingdom, is a sufficient cause of terror and alarm, if such considerations can arouse men to a sense of the value and importance in escaping the wrath to come, which is death, made eternal by refusing to cmoe to Christ that they "might have life." Let the love of Christ and the long-suffering patience of the God of love lead us all, now, to consecrate ourselves to Him and His dear Son.

THE ECUMENICAL COUNCIL.

The Romish Council is neither broken up nor adjourned; but notice has been given to the Bishops, that they may quit or stroll off informally, or without any special license, but be ready to answer to their names at the call of the roll on the 11th of December.—Boston Herald.

THUS it seems that body is virtually in session still. Well, the old lady must sit as "a queen" a short space before she sinks like a mill-stone in the sea, to rise no more. We are still inclined to think, her "death, mourning and famine" cannot long be delayed. If the "ten horns" that have been on the "scarlet colored beast"—the Napoleon dynasty—are separated from that beast, to whom they gave their "strength and power till the words of God shall be fulfilled," then it will not be long before they "shall hate the harlot, eat her flesh and burn her with fire." She is to be "cast alive"—having become "the false prophet," by the decree of "infallibility"—"into a lake of fire burning with brimstone;" evidently, destroyed by an awful war, when powder is the great agent of destruction. The beast and the false prophet go "into a lake of fire burning with brimstone" simultaneously, or nearly so. It now looks as if we should not have to wait long to see "the smoke of her burning." Surely the hour of redemption will not then be far away, and the resurrection of the sleeping saints and the translation of the living ones must be nigh at hand. Let us take courage, then; but let us also beware of impatience if these events do not take place as soon or as rapidly as we desire, or as the signs of the times would seem to indicate. They will certainly come ere long. "God's word will not return void:" His "counsel shall stand, and He will do all his pleasure," however men may seek to have it otherwise.

THE DURABILITY OF MATTER.

THE following article seems to be going the circuit of secular and religious papers, and, we suppose, with their approval. Do they know it expresses very nearly our views? Probably they do not; and yet such is the fact. The specific form of a thing may be destroyed, but the "simple elements" which go to make that form "cannot be destroyed;" and that Being who produced a particular form—say that of man—can reduce it to its original elements, and, afterwards, if he wills it, revive the being, or thing which He had caused to be dissolved. We maintain, indeed, that the godless sinner, when once dissolved into his original elements, will never again be revived, because he is "punished with everlasting destruction" for his wilful refusal of the aid of God's Spirit to give him everlasting life. They rejected life in the method God has seen fit to ordain; thus they chose death; and "verily they have their reward." The article is as follows:

ANNIHILATION.—It is ascertained, and is capable of the clearest proofs, that the simple elements of which all substance is composed, cannot, by any conceivable means, be destroyed. They may indeed be so changed as to present not the least resemblance to their previous form; they may be so mingled with other bodies that their identity cannot be traced; they may be dissipated into invisible vapor, and be apparently annihilated; but we learn from the science of chemistry that in every shape, the same elements remain inextinguishable and unaltered. The phenomena of solutions afford some of the most obvious illustrations of complete change produced in bodies without causing their annihilation. If a piece of silver be immersed in diluted niter, in a short time the silver will be entirely dissolved. Its hardness, its luster, its tenacity, its specific gravity, all the characteristics which distinguish it as a metal, are gone. Its very form has vanished, and the hard, splendid, ponderous opaque metal, which, a few minutes before, was immersed in the mixture, is apparently annihilated. The liquid, however, remains as limpid as before; it presents no difference in appearance to indicate a change. What, then, has become of the solid piece of silver which was placed in the liquid? Must we conclude that it is annihilated? Put some pieces of copper into the solution, and the silver will reappear and fall to the bottom of the glass in small, brilliant, metallic crystals. Though solution is one of the simplest processes of nature, the limited faculties of man will not permit him to comprehend the mode in which it operates. There is not one phenomenon of nature that the mind of man can fully comprehend, and, after pursuing the inquiry as far as the mental capacity will admit, he is obliged to confess that there is an operating power beyond the reach of his comprehension.

CENTRAL AND SOUTHERN PENNA.

BR. STORRS: We drop you the following lines to let your readers know that we are t.ying not to be idle in reference to the good work of preaching the word. On the 21st of July we started on a preaching tour, and visited parts of Adams and York counties in this State, and also Carroll county, Md. On the 21st we preached at Bendersville; on the 22nd at Gettysburg, and on the 23d at Littlestown. The appointments were all in Adams county, and in the street, except at Littlestown, where a few had the courage, without solicitation on our part, to open the United Brethren meeting house.

On the Lord's day, at 3 oclock, (the 24th) we preached in the Market square of Hanover, York Co. One of the papers of this place afterwards published a local editorial greatly misrepresenting our views—saying that we utterly ignored the future life, and taught that man perishes like the beast. A brief note from us correcting this misstatement, did not appear in this paper, even after a sufficient time had elapsed for it to do so. This shows that if the orthodox editor did not design to misrepresent, he certainly has no desire to correct the misrepresentation contained in his paper.

On the evening of the 25th we preached on the street of Uniontown, Md. At all these appointments the attendance was large, and the people evinced a great desire to hear the truth. We sold and distributed a number of tracts, we had, besides extended conversations with prominent persons on these subjects. Although we found great dissatisfaction among the people in regard to the Molochean character given to the God of love by the doctrine of eternal torments, yet we found also that the root from which it springs—the immortality of the soul—has produced a vast number of semi-universalists; for, though they are not satisfied to let the sinner DIE, they are not willing to think that he will be greatly tormented, as they discard roasting with a holy horror! We also found that many people have great fears of the "beast," when he shakes his head, especially; but, for ourselves. we have become accustomed to his belligerent demonstrations, and know, withal, so well how to handle him, that we have no fear of his power, the Lord being our helper. The "Beast" is fierce, jealous, shy of examination, and yet, withal, a coward.

Further; on the 6th and 7th inst. we had a "Grove meeting," on the land of Bro. Samuel Snively, near Greencastle, Franklin Co., Pa. This was the first meeting of the kind ever held in the Cumberland Valley. Many persons, of different denominations, were in attendance, and heard with apparent great interest. Many believers are getting to be in those parts. We expect to preach there again, soon.

Besides the foregoing we have preached in the street at the following places in the Cumberland Valley:—Shiremanstown, Shepherdstown, Carlisle, Mercersburg, Waynesboro, Greencastle, Marion and Chambersburg. A number of persons have believed at different points, but the leaven must work. Will believers every where pray for us?

CHRIST THE HOPE OF HIS PEOPLE.

BY HELEN ROBFRTSON.

WE have often tried to picture in our own mind the feelings of the disciples in the first chapter of John. After the fall, God had promised to Eve, "The seed of the woman shall bruise the serpent's head." Again to Abraham and his seed had been promised a Deliverer, a King. Their sacrifices had all the time been offered, pointing forward to this great sacrifice for sin. This had been looked forward to for so many generations, and now comes the time for its fulfilment. "And, behold, there was a man in Jerusalem whose name was Simeon; and the same man was just and devout, waiting for the consolation of Israel. And the Holy Ghost was upon him. And it was revealed unto him by the Holy Ghost that he should not see death before he seen the Lord's Christ."

How he must have felt! So many prophets and righteous men had desired to see that day; and Simeon had the promise, through the Holy Ghost, that he should see him before he tasted death.

Again, he was made known to John the Baptist; and he in turn points him out to his two disciples as the "Lamb of God." One of those finds his own brother Simon, and saith, "We have found the Messias; which is, being interpreted, the Christ." The day following Jesus finds Philip, and saith to him, Follow me. Then Philip finds Nathaniel, and saith unto him, We have found him of whom Moses, in the law and the prophets, did write, Jesus of Nazareth, the son of Joseph. Who can picture their feelings? So long looked for, come at last. They must have felt like men that dreamed.

That same Jesus Christ was afterward put to death, but God raised him from the dead; and he went away to prepare a place for his children, with the promise, "I will come again and receive you to myself;" and "This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven." Over eighteen hundred years have past since that promise was made. Has it been forgotten? No, he has all through had a people for his name.

Jesus himself gave us signs which should precede his second coming. We feel we are indeed living in the fulfilment of those signs. The student of prophecy has his eye intently fixed on Europe at present; and how does it look? As if our Lord were just coming. Amen. Come quickly. Like the disciples of old, let us warn others.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM W. H. H. MCALLISTER.

BR. STORRS: My wife, child, and myself went to Hinesburgh last week and spent a few days visiting our friends. We found them in usual health, and prosperity. They are still faithful to the truth as it is in Jesus. I think, however, if they were a little more active in the practical duties enjoined by this truth, if they could meet oftener for prayer and conference meetings, and maintain preaching with some regularity, they would be more efficient. I think they feel this. I do not offer this as a criticism, neither would I judge them in respect to duty. They are alive to their needs and duties, and I trust will receive assistance from on high to do all God's holy will. There has been good seed sown in Hinesburgh. It has brought forth fruit already. May it under the nourishing care of wise and judicious effort bring forth an hundred fold unto life everlasting. God will bless all our efforts if we but look to him and labor in his name. Let us all be faithful to this work.

Last Sunday I spoke to the friends at one o'clock from 1 Cor. i. 30. I tried to show the plan of salvation as constituted in Christ. At five o'clock we had another service. I spoke from the parable of the Vine.—John xv. My constant prayer was that some good might be done in the name of Jesus.

We returned home Monday by way of Shelburn, visiting Dr. Tagert's people for a few hours. Here we had a precious season communing with God's people. They are strong in the faith, and the truth is all the more precious to them for the persecutions they have suffered for his name. They have lately been called to mourn the loss of a daughter, but they have the Christian's comfort that she sleeps in Jesus and will rise from the dead when he comes. In this faith she died. A son of theirs has been dangerously sick; but God in his infinite mercy has spared him. This whole family, consisting of the Dr., his wife, three sons and two daughters, are a unit on the precious truths of God's word, and I enjoyed my visit with them all the more because of this oneness. O, that there were more such families in the land.

Yours in the Vineyard.

ST. ALBANS, Vt., Aug. 20, 1870.

FROM DR. J. W. BECHTLE.

BR. STORRS: I pledge myself for $10 to the good old HERALD OF LIFE. I never want to see the rising glory of the heaven-inspiring HERALD stopped while the earth is in darkness, for the HERALD is the best religious paper that sheds the true light of the blessed gospel among the people.

O, to think of the blindness, the wilful ignorance and obstinacy of the people with regard to their everlasting happiness, is enough to set the hairs of a thinking man on end. How men and women can pin their salvation on their preacher's coat sleeve is only to be attributed to wilful ignorance. O how true, literally true, are the LIFE-GIVER'S words, that light has come into the world, but men choose darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil; also, strait is the gate and narrow is the path that leads to life, and few there are who find it, because they don't look for it. O may the living light of the glorious gospel of our blessed LIFE-GIVER penetrate into the darkness of the people's hearts, that they may awake to their eternal interests, and flee for refuge to lay hold on the hope set before them, and find peace in believing in Jesus, and see that there is no life out of Christ.

I feel to praise God for the Life and Advent Union, for through their efforts I have been led to see the glorious light of the blessed gospel; and, O, what peace and love and joy this blessed light and truth has brought to my believing, confiding heart. Never did I feel as I do now. I feel that the truth has made me free by faith in Jesus, who is the life, the truth, and the way. I now see I am a sinner saved by grace. O I see a fulness in Christ I never saw before. I look up and see a smiling God, and feel a consciousness of his omnipresence about me continually. Yes, he is my pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night.

I think I can see the signs of the coming of our glorious LIFE-GIVER. Look to the east, look to the west, to the north, or to the south, the light of his coming is breaking upon us. Especially look at Europe; every kingdom seems to be trembling; men's hearts are failing them for fear. O may the glorious day speedily dawn upon us. I am trying to watch like a faithful servant to see my Lord's coming I shall not be surprised at his appearing.

O brethren, the time has come that those who possess, live as though they possessed not, etc., for in a very little time it will make little difference whether we have much or little of this world's goods. All we need or want is Jesus. Our redemption is now much nearer than when we first believed. O lift up your heads, ye sorrowing ones, who are pressed by the trials, cares and vexations of this life; look out a little ahead; there are the fair climes of glory to be inherited by all who love his appearing. Fear not little flock, it is our Father's good pleasure to give us the kingdom; and best of all, Jesus shall be our King forever. To his kingdom there is to be no end; no signs shall ever indicate his downfall. Blessed be God, there shall nothing that maketh a lie, or any thing that will hurt or destroy be in that happy land. No sickness, pain or death, no sorrow or crying, no parting farewells in all God's holy mountain. Death, cruel death, that so often parts and tears asunder the nearest and dearest ties on earth, shall then be swallowed up in victory. O the blessed hope of immortality; how it cheers us. O how inspiring.

May God in mercy spare you, Br. Storrs, to usefulness, and all the dear brethren and sisters, who labor so earnestly in the good cause of Life only in Christ. This glorious life revives our courage by the way.

Yours, looking for the coming of the LIFE-GIVER—Christ.

HARRISBURG, Pa., Aug. 15, 1870.

FROM CLAMOR FRANKE.

BR. STORRS: Most heartily do I desire in common with all our dear brethren and sisters that the HERALD OF LIFE be continued. I pledge myself, to this end, to pay $25 for two copies, and $10 to the Tract Fund. The money shall be forwarded in due time.

Who that has feasted upon the blessed truths as they are presented and unfolded to us from week to week in the HERALD OF LIFE could for a moment think of doing without that paper? I for one feel I could do with half my daily food rather than part with this faithful exponent of the truth. I prize it much; yea, I love it dearly. God grant that it may live on until the King of kings comes in His glory. And may the choicest blessings of our heavenly Father rest upon the labors of all who are officially or otherwise connected with the paper. Our editor, who has grown gray in the service of his Master—may he be spared in health and strength to still labor on in the good cause; and may loving hands and warm hearts encourage and support him in his labors of love. But above all may our graciou3 covenant God strengthen him to bear aloft the beauteous banner of "Life only in Christ" a little longer, until his warfare is ended, which, at the most, cannot be long.

May we, one and all, be preserved blameless unto the coming of our blessed LIFE-GIVER, is the prayer of,

Yours, in the bonds of Christian love.

FROM CHAS. N. BUZZELL.

BR. STORRS: Thinking you would like to hear from this part of the State, I will say, I have gone to work in earnest, this summer for the salvation of perishing sinners, trusting wholly in the Lord as to where I go and labor in his vineyard. I have attended six grove meetings at Spring Creek and Rootville, Pa. The one just closed at Rootville has been a good season; the brethren all working in harmony. Six were baptised during the meeting, and last night a new one started to serve the Lord. Thus we are encouraged to work on.

This grove meeting was commenced Aug. 6, and continued afternoon and evening over two Sundays. The last three days brethren C. F. Sweet and Colgrove were present, and preached the word.

I moved to this place four weeks ago. There are some thirty or more brethren. Some however, for Paul, others for Apollos; but all meeting and working in harmony. There are several with me on the Life views; the others are not bitter, but are willing to hear. Father and Mother Ongley reside here, and speak of being personally acquainted with you; and wish to be remembered. They, although not able to preach as formerly, are as shocks of corn fully ripe: are firm in the faith of the gospel of the kingdom and nearness of the advent; which is their daily conversation. May God preserve them to witness His appearing. Bro. J. T. Ongley is heartily engaged in the work. He believes in the resurrection of the wicked, but is not bitter or hard. I have an appointment at Edenboro. Some eight miles from there are one or two who take the HERALD. Two brethren from Rouseville were up to the late grove meeting. They take the HERALD. I will make a special effort for our paper. I send you one subscriber, and to hope, many more. I feel God has called me to work here and trusting wholly to Him am willing to work wherever the door may open; for He has led me safely through many trials to purify me and make me trust all to him. My heart yearns to behold the brethren East; but not my will but thine, O God, be done. May I meet you soon on the right hand of our LIFE-GIVER, with all the dear ones, is my prayer. Your Br., firm in the faith of No Life except through Jesus Christ our Lord.

FROM G. U. LEWIS.

BR. STORRS: The campmeeting is to be held in this town again this year, in a grove owned by Z. Spalding, near the mouth of Campbrook; advertised to commence Sept. 11. Two questions will naturally arise in the minds of Life Believers, viz., Will there be an able representative of the Life views on the ground? If so, Will he have the privilege of presenting those views to the people? We shall see.

Brethren let no minor consideration keep you at home. If we are to occupy the position of the fox in the "Fable," we should devise some way to get our views before the people at the meeting.

The Campaign Documents are just the thing. Had I the means I would have a few setts for the occasion. Yours in hope.

BETHEL, Vt., Aug. 19. 1870.

Remark by the Editor.

We will furnish you with the Campaign Documents gratis, if you will let us know, immediately, what ones you want, and how many.

FROM PROF. JACOB F. HUBER.

BR. STORRS: Gladly would I meet with the Brethren of the Life and Advent Union, if circumstances permitted; and though absent in body, I hope to be present in spirit. May the Lord grant you all a blessed Union meeting: may the spirit of heavenly wisdom and love inspire all your actions and direct your every movement for the spread of the Truth and the promotion of His glory!

And may we, above all, have grace to ualk in the light, as living epistles, known and read of all men, ever ready for the coming of our blessed and glorious Lord and LIFE-GIVER.

Dear Brethren, let us not falter nor grow weary, but continue firm and steadfast to the end, looking for and hastening unto the coming of that great and glorious day when Christ shall appear, to be glorified in His saints, and to bestow upon them the ineffable blessing of Immortality.

With the HERALD I am greatly pleased as to its beautiful type and excellent paper; and its contents are highly instructive and deeply interesting to me. I will continue to take four copies, and will remit you the amount therefor in due time.

May the Lord have mercy upon our Dear Brethren Wolcott and Campbell in their severe affliction; and, if consistent with His will, restore them to health, and usefulness in His Church. Yours affectionately in Christ Jesus.

MIDDLETOWN, Conn., Aug. 18, 1870.

BETSY M. MURPHY, Roxbury, Conn., writes: I am glad the HERALD OF LIFE ever came into my hands. It was by means of a pilgrim brother. I read it, and must say, I love its truths; though I have never made known my belief, and do not feel fully satisfied on some points; but I wish to believe the truth. I am willing to accept anything that is truth. I do not care for the reproach it may bring. I desire to please the Lord. O, how it cheers my heart to read the letters from dear pilgrims. I believe we are living in the last days. Soon we shall hear it said, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom;" or, "depart." God forbid that I should be of the class last named. I wish for a home in the kingdom when our Lord shall come to gather his children. Pray for me, your sister in the faith.

CAMP-MEETING IN MAINE.

THERE will be an Advent Camp-Meeting in North Hermon, on the ground we occupied last year, commencing Sept. 5. It is five miles from Bangor. A boarding tent will be under the direction of Br. Charles Philips. Board for man and beast at a reasonable rate. Those coming with tents will find lumber and straw on the ground. Preaching brethren generally, are invited to attend our campmeeting. We would say, This meeting is to be a free one, for all. There will be no one to dictate the preachers what they shall or shall not preach. We hope to see a large gathering of the dear saints at Camp Hermon this year. Come, brethren and sisters, filled with the Spirit and love of God; then we can labor for the perishing, and strengthen the weak.

HELP THE NEEDY.

SR. BUSSIER of this city is very sick, and in need of pecuniary aid. She is afflicted with dropsy, erysipelas, and other diseases, and is under the physician's care. Sr. B. is a Life Believer, and has been for forty years, and one of the Lord's devoted children. She has been passing through the deep waters, and her afflictions are on the increase. These lines may meet the eyes of some of her friends who now knowing her circumstances, will doubtless be glad to assist her in this her time of deep distress. He name and address are—MRS. S. BUSSIER, Passyunk Road, below Federal Street, Philadelphia, Penn.

Yours, in Christ,

TRUTH VS. MAN'S WISDOM.

WE have substituted the above name for the Campaign Document No. 20, instead of "RICH TRACT." Some have thought, that, as all our Tracts are rich, it was "invidious" to call only one by that name. Hence it is changed as above.

As a ship held by an anchor looks as though it were going out with the tide, yet never goes, so some souls that seem constantly to be getting nearer to Christ, never come, because they are anchored and held by some secret sin.

An Instructive Letter.

The author of the following letter is a farmer in Michigan. It was written to a Sister without any thought of its being printed; but Dr. Finley, of Niles, having read it persuaded the author to allow him to forward it to us to print or not, as we judged best. Dr. Finley writes:

"It appears to me that he presents some points in a striking manner, and that its publication might do good. I don't know that I ever met with any one, who, in so short a time, seemed to have so thorough and complete a view of our doctrines and their bearings as Mr. Hoadley, and his whole soul is engaged in trying to get others to investigate them. I like to see such articles in our paper, as they are calculated to produce a favorable impression on any one who may see them for the first time."

We give the letter, trusting it may do good to many, and be the means of leading some souls to the knowledge of themselves and the designs of their Creator towards them, and thus lead them to love and adore Him for His mercy and love.

Sister Seraph:

If, after giving this letter a careful perusal, you remain unchanged in your opinion, I will, out of regard to your choice, discontinue any further correspondence on this subject. I have written you several times extending each of my letters to more than an ordinary length with the hope of being able to present the truth in a manner to enlist your attention, that you may be led to investigate for yourself and see whether these things are so. With more care, than usual for me, in writing, I have devoted several days to preparing this letter; and with the aid of books and papers, made such selections and references as I deem nearest the purpose. So certain am I that there is no future life out of Christ that it appears exceeding strange that others do not see as I do, and are not more ready to adopt the same views. I have come to the conclusion that the difference of opinions concerning the doctrine taught in the Bible originate in part from the influence of early education, and in part from a want of a proper starting point, which is only to believe God. If we do really believe him, we must believe that truth harmonizes with the Bible, but that error does not. When I learned to interpret the teaching of the Scriptures, based on the divine attributes of God, viz., that he is a God of love, mercy, wisdom, goodness, truth, justice and power; and that every religious theory or doctrine that comes in collision with one of these attributes is false, I could then see and believe that by our descent from Adam we are mortal, and that immortality is a gift dependent on the will of the giver. The starting point, then, is to believe that God made Adam of the earth, an earthy man, of the dust of the ground. Paul gives a definition of this first man in 1 Cor. xv. 45, 46. "The first man Adam was made a living soul; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit. Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural; and afterwards that which is spiritual." We see the first Adam was an animal; the placing him in the garden did not change his nature, but his condition; he was in the reach of the tree of life, and but for disobedience might have continued in endless life. 2. Sin placed him outside of the reach of the tree of life, subjecting him to his corruptible or animal nature. The threat, "For in the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die," preceded the violation and the violation preceded the rejection. The judgment pronounced is in accordance with the threat. Having violated the law, God explains to Adam his condition in this manner, "For dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return," previous to ejecting him from the garden; "and now lest he should put forth his hand and take also of the tree of life and eat and live forever, therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden to till the ground from whence he was taken. Under the first law, one man was tried and failed, and the world was condemned to its animal nature, and Adam was sent away from the tree of life and he and his race left in a perishing condition — death reigned.

A new dispensation enters, and a new man is tried under a new dispensation. Paul says, Adam was a type of him that was to come. The first man was tried, and failed and was sent from the tree of life into the animal world; and we die, being in Adam, because we have an animal nature. But the second man who is tried under the new law succeeds, and in him God restores man by a new principle of life. It is by partaking of him as the tree of life. Jesus says, "I am the bread of life, that one may eat thereof and not die."—John vi. 51. All die because of their animal relationship to Adam. So, in Christ, christians have life because of their relationship to Christ. The wicked have not this relationship; consequently they die and remain under the dominion of death forever. God does not bring them to life to die again.

Let us see! salvation depends on regeneration. But what does regeneration include? It includes something more than being begotten. Being begotten and being born are two different matters, as well as different in time.

We are begotten again by the word of truth, of the Spirit, in this life. The birth takes place at the resurrection, at the last day. Christ was "the first born from the nead." (Col. i. 18), "the first-fruits of them that slept." (See Rev. i. 5, 1 Cor. xv. 20.) He was "the first born among many brethren:" (Rom. viii. 29). That which is not first begotten, can never be born. Those who are born from the dead, are those in whom the Spirit of God dwelt while in this life; and being thus born, "they are the children of the resurrection," . . . "neither can they die any more."—Luke 20. He that is born twice can not die "any more." So you see the second death is not dying twice.

The time when the Bible regeneration is to take place is set forth in the age to come, when Christ shall sit in the throne of his glory, at and after the resurrection of the saints, or their birth from the dead. (See and read Math. xix. 28). In that resurrection the wicked dead have no part, and of course do not die twice. Their death being final, never to be revoked, is called the second death; which death hurts not any in Christ or any born from the dead; over such, that death hath no power, "neither can they die any more." The word eternal also may be used in the sense of final, or nearly so, because the state of destruction or death is such that there is no recovery from it. So punishment, in the same sense, where life is never to be restored throughout eternity, may properly be styled an eternal punishment. It is not the going on of the act of dying, but it is the state of destruction in such a manner that it is past recovery that makes it eternal punishment or death. If you please so to term it, you may call it, "the death that never dies;" which would be about the same thing as saying, the righteous have "the life that never lives."

Shall we not come to the conclusion, that "sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death;" and that sin will eternally hold men under its dominion, if they die in their sins? (Perished?) Paul declares, "if Christ is not raised, ye are yet in your sins"—not in Adam's sins. And if so, (that is, if Christ be not raised), all (the righteous as well as the wicked) are perished; faith is left without foundation; that is, "your faith is vain, ye are yet in your sins;" no sacrifice of blood to wash away our sins; so we remain sinners, (perished). Shall we not believe Paul, that unless the Lord lends a helping hand, we must eternally remain under the dominion of death? Where then is the boasted immortal soul? Where is that endless torment? where? When man was helpless, what did God do to show him favor? Jesus saith, "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him may not perish, but have everlasting life." Eternal life then is the gift of God through Jesus Christ. Did he make provision for those who do not believe? or for one class only? Read what Jesus saith again, "God so loved the world" etc., perish! perish!—why! perish means to die; to lose life in any manner; to wither and decay; to be destroyed; to be lost eternally. Let us see about that. That word "perish"—get your Dictionary and examine with me; also, while we are about it, let us see what die means. "Die—to lose life, to expire, to cease, to vanish." Then life and death are opposites; or rather the one is the antithesis of the other, as are, also, night and day, wet and dry, love and hatred, truth and falsehood, a part and the whole. Is the gift of God through Jesus Christ (eternal life) granted (I do not mean offered) to all men? or to believers only? Very well, (I think I hear you say) "to believers only." Then it is a part, is it not? or one class only, that have the promise of eternal life. If he has made provision for those who do not believe, then they also will get eternal life. But stop: the distinction is made plain; although offered to all upon conditions, those only who believe in him shall have everlasting life. They (some) are left outside the garden of Eden where they have not access to life (because they neglect or refuse) and when their animal nature wears out they perish.

Look again and see what perish means: to die and remain dead; for the wages of sin is death according to the penalty of the law; nothing more and nothing less. Paul says, "The gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth." So then, none but believers are saved from death. There is no life mentioned outside of the gospel plan. Life and immortality only are brought to light in the gospel: 2 Tim. i. 10, which see and read. Shall we learn of Paul or of Plato about this question of immortality? Paul says, that God only hath it.—1 Tim. vi. 15, 16. Does Paul say in what manner man can obtain it? Yes,—"To them who by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, and honor, and immortality, eternal life."—Rom. ii. 7. When will man obtain this immortality? "At the last trump" this mortal must put on immortality, 1 Cor. xv. 52, 53; which see and be convinced.

It is by inferences and reasonings the philosophy of Plato teaches (aside from inspiration) that all souls are possessed of immortality. These pagan fables virtually deny future life in Christ, and explain away the gospel hope of the resurrection by putting the honor of immortality on the first Adam, when it belongs exclusively to the second. This is the origin af the difficulty. Now, which shall we believe? Schooled in the fables of that day, the dogma that makes void the offer of life through Christ has been handed down from hand to hand through successive generations, and is still maintained, and (perhaps) truly believed, in accord with the deductions of vain philosophy. However truly this may be believed, with the light which we have received, and with the Bible in our hands, can we hope to escape the condemnation of apostate men, if we still cling to these fables—still insist that life means happiness, that death means life in misery, that perish means to preserve, and destroy means life in eternal torment?

If divine revelation, giving all needful information with regard to man's origin, history, condition, and destiny does not contain one plain and positive statement that man's soul is immortal, and is destined to exist as long as God exists, shall we look elsewhere for authority to establish it as a fact? The authority of creeds and ordinances of human establishment can not do it. "This is the record, that God has given us eternal life."—1 John v. 11, 12, which see. So "this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son of God, hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." For Jesus says, "I am the resurrection and the life; he that believeth on me though he were dead, yet shall he live." So if he does not believe there is no resurrection. Jesus says, "The Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister and to give his life a ransom for many." He says, "I will ransom them from the power of the grave. I will redeem them from death," etc. Isaiah says, "Thy dead men shall live." Whose? God's dead men will live, and this life will be in Christ, through the resurrection to believers only, who shall be raised incorruptible. This would seem to upset the mortal resurrection theory; if it does not, I will try and give it a shove before I have done—that is, the theory of raising the wicked dead to life to judge them, then remanding them back to death again.

If immortal souls have existence, are destined to exist somewhere as long as God exists, if there is such a thing as eternal torments that also, must be eternal life! Why not? Christ alone can forgive sins. He purchased the right of our redemption by giving his blood and life for us. If he is dead there is no atonement made, for without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sins. Then, in harmony with the word, "The wages of sin is death." Hence when death overtakes the unrepenting and unforgiven sinner, the law will eternally hold him in its grasp. Thus he pays the full penalty without being restored to life again to be tormented eternally or to die twice. Die once is the penalty—not twice.

Modern theology says, souls do not go into the grave; that the body dies—not the soul. The Bible says, "Nevertheless man being in honor abideth not, he is like the beasts that perish." The Psalmist speaking of ungodly men, says, "Like sheep they are laid in their grave; death shall feed on them." (Now the contrast). "But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave."—Psa. xlix. 14, 15. Which shall we believe? "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead."—Prov. xxi. 16. "For the living know that they shall die; but the dead know not anything." "Also their love and their hatred and their envy is now perished."—Eccl. ix. 5, 6. Immaterialists or immortal soulists say, 'Tis the immortal soul that thinks, that loves and hates. The Bible says, love, hatred and envy will perish. Which shall we believe? "O Lord our God, other lords besides thee have had dominion over us" . . . "they are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise; therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish."—Isa. xxvi. 13, 14. Behold, "all souls are mine; as the soul of the father so also the soul of the son is mine: the soul that sinneth it shall die."—Ezk. xviii. 4. Again, verse 20, "The soul that sinneth it shall die." Modern theolgy says, "The soul is immortal; it can not die." Which shall we believe? "For behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly shall be stubble, and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch."—Mal. iv. 1. Modern theology says, They shall not burn up; and both root and branch shall continue forever. Which shall we believe? "My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me, and I give unto them eternal life, and they shall never perish."—John x. 27, 28. Modern theology says, all men have by nature eternal life dwelling in them—that they are inherently immortal, that the man proper leaves this temporal house at death and soars away in conscious existence through realms of space in the etherial regions above, beyond the shores of time, to dwell with Christ and the spirits of those gone before, where Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are enjoying the blissful raptures of immortal life (or happiness) with other patriarchs and apostles—that death is the gate to heaven, and this body merely a clog which anchors the soul to fleeting time till God calls, come home, immortal soul. Which shall we believe?

The Contrast. "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son and believeth on him, may have eternal life." How will they get it? Hear Jesus: "I will raise him up at the last day," Suppose men will not believe on Christ. O, says modern theology, Christ will raise them up; and as to eternal life they have that already. Which shall we believe? Therefore the ungodly shall not stand in the judgment:" that is, they fall under the penalty of the law, death,—do not exist beyond their mortal sphere—therefore shall not stand; mortality engulphs them in oblivion.

Study well 1 Cor. xv., and you will not only see that man is mortal, but you will also see the absurdity of the mortal resurrection theory,—for a theory I call it without a "thus saith the Lord" to sustain it. Paul says, "That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die;" that is, can not be brought to new life, or the old one restored, except it first die; "and that which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be;" that is, you do not expect the return of the same identical seed sown, but its exact likeness in a new crop, the true representative of the original seed. He next inquires, "And with what body do they come?" For the answer I refer you to verse forty and onward, which please read. First, a terrestrial; second, a celestial body; "sown in corruption, raised in incorruption; sown in dishonor, raised in glory; sown in weakness, raised in power; sown a natural body, raised a spiritual body." Is there any allusion to the resurrection, other than that strictly carried out in the above figure? Read again and see. Not the resurrection of the same seed sown, but an existence derived, a new growth from the same original seed. He says, "To every seed he giveth his own body:" that is, its own natural product—the same in appearance, substance, quality, and nature; putting off of its animal relationship to the first man, (Adam), and a putting on of its spiritual relationship to the second man, (Christ), who is "the Lord from heaven." "As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly." "Flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God, neither doth corruption inherit incorruption." Now to the fifty-first verse explaining the mystery of what will take place at Christ's second advent, "We shall not all sleep"—that is, we who are living at the time of, and are in Christ at his coming, shall not die, "but we," those then living and in Christ, "shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound and the dead shall be raised incorruptible," not in flesh and blood. What dead? The dead in Christ only; "and we," (who?) those in Christ and living "shall be changed." "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." Well, what then? When all this shall be brought to pass, there will be no more death,—no more to die,—death then will be swallowed up, and we, in Christ will have the victory.

Then, the grave can no longer hold us (who are in Christ,) for, "now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first fruits of them that slept." "Thanks be to God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ." "Therefore, my beloved brethren," that is, we who believe Jesus will come again according to his promise at the last day to redeem us, "be ye steadfast; unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, for you know your labor is not vain in the Lord." That is, you know that Christ is risen from the dead, and that therefore, your faith is not vain; labor on till the day comes. This figure when applied to the resurrected state of the saints implies a new mode of existence, connected with a new life, identical with the original in his most perfect manhood. The elements which secure his future immortality existed in his first estate—such as faith, hope, and charity, with every grace and virtue engendered by the power of christianity. Connected with eternal life, these are elements which can not die.

The future state of the righteous is set forth in beautiful language by Peter, "According to his abundant mercy hath he begotten us again to a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled," etc.; that is, begotten from a state of death by the resurrection of Christ. What to? An incorruptible inheritance. "Born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth for ever." The everlasting and ever abiding word of God which is the incorruptible seed first sown in the human mind while in the present life.

The human body may crumble to dust, and all its natural elements be dissolved, yet the living word assures us of a new and other mode of existence through the resurrection, beyond the reach of pain's sting or death and the power of the grave. If you will now refer to the Book I sent you, "Bible vs. Tradition," page 69, headed "The soul of Christ sacrificed in death," you will plainly perceive an important bearing upon what I have written, and which I think will prove conclusively to your mind, that there is no consciousness after death—no natural immortality, no never dying soul. Please turn to the references given in that when you read and observe (on page 72) the 29th verse Acts ii.; Peter compares and contrasts the death of David with the death of Christ, "The patriarch David (equal to the soul of David) is both dead and buried and his sepulchre is with us to this day;" implying that you may see for yourselves that David himself is still in his grave; 34th v. "For David is not ascended into the heavens." 30th v. "Therefore . . . knowing that God . . . would raise up Christ to sit on his throne, he seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hades, neither his flesh did see corruption. For David after he had served his own generation by the will of God, fell on sleep (died) and saw corruption; but He whom God raised again saw no corruption." Both Christ and David died, and both were buried in the grave; but while the soul of David or David himself, is sleeping in the grave in a state of corruption waiting for Christ to descend again from heaven to wake the dead, the soul of Christ, or Christ himself, was raised from the dead. Also see Acts xiii. 28, 29, 30. But for this, the soul of Christ, which David makes to be the same as the Holy One, or himself, would have experienced corruption.

The comments on the above are well worth referring to, by those who advocate natural immortality and a conscious existence after death. The soul of David, or David himself, will remain unconscious where he now is until the time spoken of in 1 Cor. xv. 52, "his sepulchre is with us to this day." Read to where it closes with, "Not a part only crucified, but Christ died and Christ was buried and Christ was raised." Read considerately what I have referred you to, then, (as is therein asked) tell me candidly, Did the Holy One, Jesus Christ himself die? Not a part—the non-essential or mortal part—but the Christ himself? "Christ died for our sins—was buried and rose the third day." 1 Cor. xv. 3, 4. If the dead rise not, then is not Christ raised; then all are lost; no atonement; no redemption; no forgiveness of sins; no future life; hope misplaced; faith without foundation; expectation vain; "then they also which are fallen asleep are perished." Shall we believe the traditions of men, or shall we believe the Bible? The traditions of men say, "all souls are immortal." The Bible says God will not keep alive the soul of the wicked.—Ps. xxii. 2. The Bible says, "And it shall come to pass that every soul which will not hear that prophet shall be destroyed from among the people."—Acts iii. 23. The Lord preserveth all them that love him, but all the wicked will he destroy.—Psa. cxlv. 20. They shall be as though they had not been.—Obd. xvi. Thou shalt diligently consider his place and it shall not be.—Psa. xxxvii. 10. A God of love manifests his mercy in allowing the wicked to remain where the justice of a broken law places them. His wisdom and goodness is vindicated in harmony with his love for his creatures; for he gave his only begotten Son, etc., and gave him power on earth to forgive sins. Of a truth, he is a God of the living: "For he giveth life to whom he will." I have heard it affirmed, and I think with some plausibility too, that, to say, The wicked dead are raised, is to charge God with being the author of sin. Why not? Let us see what the argument is. If God never made anything in sin in the past, and he is immutable he can not change and become the author of sin in the future, for he is too holy, pure, and undefiled for anything tainted with sin to come from his hand. But it is said—the wicked dead are all raised in sin; and, if they are raised immortal then they will sin to all eternity; or if they are raised mortal for an hour, a day, or a year, it is all the same; they are raised in sin, and sin while they live. Now the question arises, By what power are the wicked dead raised? God can not do it, for he never made anything in sin, and a dead man can not raise himself to life again, and I never heard any one affirm that the devil could raise the wicked dead, although it is affirmed he holds a claim on them. Query: Now if God can not do it without being the author of all the sin in the future state, even in hell, if there is such a place, and as the dead sinner can not restore himself to life, and the devil can not do it, By what power are the wicked dead raised? Who will attempt to prove that God will raise them? I will not attempt it; but I think I have shown some good reasons, if not proof, that he will not raise them. Let us suppose, yes, let us suppose, if by any power the wicked dead are raised, must they not be raised in incorruption, immortal, put on immortality when raised, receive a spiritual body from Jesus Christ, to whom the Father hath committed all power in heaven and on earth to judge the quick and the dead? (John v. 28) and has Jesus promised to raise the wicked dead to life? I can not find it, and believe it is not to be found within the lids of the Bible. Can you refer me to any positive texts where it says he will? Please do so. The first Adam was the head of an earthy or animal race, who with their father will return to dust from whence they came. The second Adam is the head of a spiritual race, who are begotten in this life by the word of truth and the Spirit of God, which Spirit raised up the Christ from the dead, so that he was the first born from the dead, and those who believe in him and receive the same Spirit which raised up Christ from the dead will also be born from the dead at the "last day;" "neither can they die any more" because "they are the children of God, being children of the resurrection."—Luke xx. 35, 36. All inherit mortality from Adam by generation; but the righteous only have hope of immortality and a revival from death by a union with second or life giving Adam.

The first Adam did not, and could not come into the class of those "subjected in hope," for he sinned willingly and wilfully without excuse and was rejected from eternal life, as we have seen, by an entire exclusion from the tree of life. He lived an animal, enjoying what such a nature is capable of, but death without hope was ever before him. He had willingly subjected himself to it, while his posterity were made subject to it, not willingly, but by reason of him who subjected them in hope. There is a wide difference between Adam's death and that of his posterity; yet his posterity by their personal sins, or refusing to lay hold on the hope set before them, may make their death as hopeless as that of Adam's.

"Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy hath begotten us again unto a lively, (a living) hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead."—1 Peter i. 3. If the same spirit is exercised in reading and understanding, that has prompted me in writing this letter, I shall consider myself paid for time and trouble, and I assure you I have brought to bear all the energies of mind I am capable of, to do the subject justice. I hope when you have read it, you will read it again with the view of detecting all the absurdities and unscriptural declarations contained in it, and report the same to me at your earliest convenience.

Yours in hope.

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures." The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE IMPORTANT QUESTION.

HOW FAR DO THE CONSEQUENCES OF CHRIST'S RESURRECTION EXTEND?

READER, do you inquire why we propound this question? We reply, because of its importance; for the Scriptures declare that "if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins," and "they also which have fallen asleep in Christ are perished."—1 Cor. xv. 17, 18. Therefore, the resurrection of any of the human family is obtained only through Christ, or is in consequence of His triumph over the grave. In view of this fact we sincerely inquire: Do the consequences of Christ's resurrection extend to all men? If not, to how many of the human race?

Paul in his masterly argument on the resurrection of the dead says: "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive."—1 Cor. xv. 22. One important fact is established by this text, viz.: That all who are raised from the dead will obtain their resurrection by virtue of a union with Christ. By a parental relation to Adam we possess a dying nature, and the "even so" in this passage shows that all who shall have a revival from death will secure it as a result of a union with Christ. Therefore, we earnestly ask: First. How can the wicked dead in any sense be considered "in Christ;" or claim a connection with the LIFE-GIVER, when they have not received the "Spirit of adoption" into their hearts? Second. If the wicked dead are in no way connected with Christ, how can it be proved that the consequences of His resurrection extend to them—or, in other words, that they will have a revival from death? Third. If it be assumed that the enemies of Christ are related to Him, or that the consequences of His resurrection extend to them, upon what grounds can their final salvation be disproved?

In Paul's day the important question was propounded: "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?"—1 Cor. xv. 35. He does not answer these questions on the premises of Universalism, nor does he take the other extreme and deny the resurrection of any of the dead. There were two questions which he endeavors to answer:

First. "How are the dead raised up?" In answer to this question the force of his whole argument is to show that it is accomplished by the quickening power of the Second Adam (Christ) in the production of a new life, spiritual and eternal in its nature. Death in the very nature of things is eternal, and would forever hold man in its chains unless arrested by divine power in the production of a new life, because death is the destruction of life—an effect and not an agent. Mortal, or blood life, ends in the grave; but Christ has become the author of an indestructible life principle, which can only be obtained as a gift, and by which all who are united to Him by receiving the "Spirit of adoption" into their hearts, will finally triumph over the grave. As death never ends of itself, the wicked go down into the state of death without any hope of deliverance, for they have rejected Him who alone has the keys of death.

Second. "With what body do they come?" was also a question which the apostle, through the illuminating power of the Holy Spirit, answers in detail. He says: "Thou sowest not that body which shall be"—yet many in our day, admitting that it is sown a mortal body, assume that it will be raised a mortal body, in direct contradiction of the apostle's words, that "it is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; . . . it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." The Scriptures declare so emphatically that "the dead shall be raised incorruptible" it seems strange to me how any one can possibly frame a theory for even the mortal resurrection of a portion of the human family.

But what is God's plan and purpose regarding the destiny of a fallen race? We find this revealed in the words of Jesus: "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life."—John iii. 14, 15. Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness as a means of salvation to the perishishing Israelites; but all who did not look upon that serpent perished. They refused to obey God. But how can those Israelites be said to have perished if they are to live again? Temporary sleep in death cannot be called by that term; for Paul says, "If Christ be not raised, your faith is vain, and they also which have fallen asleep in Christ are perished." Christ told the Jews: "Your fathers did eat manna in the wilderness, and are dead"—i. e., they are dead without hope of a resurrection. But Christ is the "bread of life," and those who partake thereof will not remain under the chains of death like those who perished in the wilderness, for Jesus says: "I will raise him up at the last day."

Again: Christ was typified by the serpent which was lifted up in the wilderness by Moses, and as none who looked upon that serpent perished, so God's purpose in giving his Son was that "whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." Did the lifting up of the serpent by Moses affect the condition of those who refused to look thereon? The history of the transaction shows that it did not; and this fact, set forth in type, God fulfils in the antitype, for the consequences of Christ's obedience unto death only reach those who are spiritually united to him—all others perish in the same manner as though he had not come—like the rebellious Israelites who refused to look upon the uplifted serpent. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth [Syraic—"obeyeth"] not the Son shall not see life."—John iii. 36. W. H. S.

MATERIALISM—WHAT IS IT?

DEAR SIR: In The Rainbow for May, p. 235, your able and worthy contributor, Mr. Maude, has sounded a note of warning against "Materialism," which he designates this "thick-skinned monster of the ooze and the mire." If such language is properly applied to this "Materialism," no wonder Mr. M. rightly warns us to "beware of it, whether it comes carping and quibbling under a mask" or revealing itself in "naked repulsiveness," as he avers it does in "Christadelphianism, or Thomasism." But what is this loathsome and much-to-be-avoided "Materialism?" In The Rainbow for May, 1869, p. 422, Mr. M. has described it in the words of two writers whom he designates, "Theological Materialists," to distinguish them from "Scientific Materialists."

Now, sir, as I am neither a "Christadelphian" nor a "Thomasite," I am not concerned in vindicating the quotations there given and commented on; but, as I am avowedly and publicly a believer of what Mr. M. would designate "Materialism" or "Theological Materialism," I would, with your permission, submit a few paragraphs in defence of those ideas, at least so far as they are charged with loathsomeness.

Mr. Maude has at length given us a statement of his belief in the nature of man, in The Rainbow for 1869, which each reader can judge of for himself, and it is not my purpose at present to point out its defects; neither to give a demonstration of what I believe to be the truth on that point, though I am ready at any time to do so. My object is simply to state what I understand to be the teaching of Scripture—corroborated by our own observation and experience regarding man's constitution, and to leave the reader to decide whether that belief merits the opprobrious epithets which Mr. Maude has applied to it.

I believe with John Milton, that, "Man is a living being, intrinsically and properly one and individual, not compound and separable; not, according to the common opinion, made up and framed of two distinct and different natures, as of body and soul, but the whole man is soul, and the soul man; that is to say, a body or substance, individual, animated, sensitive, and rational."—Treatise on Christian Doctrine. Vol. pp. 250, 251.

I believe that God "made MAN of the dust of the ground;" and that "the man," so made, "became a living soul," by God breathing "into his nostrils the breath of life" (Gen. ii. 7); and that MAN when he dies returns to the earth as he was (Gen. iii. 19), until the voice of him, who is the Resurrection and the Life, calls him again from the dead.

This dust-formed man, animated by the breath of life—and not some subtle invisible something independent of his organism—I believe, performs all those wonderful functions of thought, emotion, passion and will, which distinguish man from the other orders of earth's inhabitants, and raise him so far above them.

Elsewhere I have written, "Philosophers, in their ignorance of such matters, may ask: 'How can a creature, formed of the dust of the ground, simply on having the breath of life imparted to it, perform the various fnnctions, physical and mental functions, peculiar to man?' There is only one answer that I know of, namely, 'By the power of God.' Is it not satisfactory? Such teaching may appear humbling to man, who would fain regard himself as being, by birthright, an immortal, and having a different origin than 'the dust of the ground;' but to the God-fearing and reflective mind the doctrine in question is suggestive of wonder, reverence and praise."—Messenger of the Churches, Feb. 1, 1870. What, sir, is there unworthy of God, or dishonoring to him, in such a belief? Why should the idea that the Creator endows living organised matter in the form we call man, with all those wonderful functions—of speech, volition, emotion, etc., which we possess, be held up to reprobation, scorn, and contempt, as a "Thickskinned monster of the ooze and the mire?" However appropriate, or otherwise, this language of Robert Hall might be, as applied by him, to Antinomianism, it certainly is unfair to apply it to the belief in question. Mr. M. does not believe that there is any thing inherently evil in matter, and it is to me past comprehension, how the idea, that man is essentially a material organised being, is either derogatory to man or to God: because, whatever the constitution of man, or whatever we believe it to be, man is still all that he is; and the power, wisdom, and skill of his Maker, are alike the same. We do not think less of a painting, or admire and praise the skill of the artist less because of the picture being just so much canvas and paint. It is composed of canvas and paint, but the wonderful skill of the artist has so used these materials as to produce a picture, that fills us with raptnrous wonder and admiration. Who has not gazed with delight on the gorgeous and variegated rays of the setting sun? Yet that glorious vision is essentially material.

But, sir, I must finish: will you permit me only further to say, that if there is any danger of the good work which the Rainbow seeks to perform being frustrated by "Materialism," this can only be by the differing beliefs of its supporters being made a bone of contention. I have no fault to find with any one setting forth the views of Mr. M. in these pages, and of their opposing the opposite belief: and I have no wish to see the pages of The Rainbow made an arena for debating this question, but when those who are anxiously seeking to promote the interests of this magazine find their beliefs characterised in the way I have alluded to, they are very likely to claim the privilege of reply, or to withdraw their support. Mr. Maude and I are at one on this: That man is essentially mortal; that whether man be a unity or a compound being, whether one or two parts of him survive the death of another part, or that death in the present state be the cessation of his entire life, the ultimate fate of the unsaved is the entire destruction of their whole being; and that those alone who are saved shall inherit eternal life. This to me, sir, is a grand Scriptural doctrine, almost everywhere denied. I am glad that The Rainbow is set for the defence of this and many other like precious truths. Cannot we, then, so far as The Rainbow is concerned, hold our beliefs on the constitution of man (which Mr. M. admits are, in a great measure, philosophical) in abeyance, or confine ourselves to Scriptural language, and unite in our testimony against the common error of natural immortality, and in favor of the Scripture doctrine of life in Christ?

Hoping that you will deem these lines worthy of a place in The Rainbow,

I remain, yours, respectfully,

W. LAING.

ANOTHER NOTICE OF F. H. CHAMBERLAIN.

BY MARIA M. WEAVER.

BR. CHAMBERLAIN: In the "World's Crisis" of Aug. 10, you have again attacked the "Life Views," and in kindness I beg to again defend them. You know it used to be thought a very unfair, cowardly thing to speak against a person behind his back; but as the paper through which your attack is made will not permit our side of the question to be presented in its columns, we are of necessity compelled to defend ourselves through another paper, one which, however, will gladly give both sides an opportunity to present their views.

I see nothing in your last article that needs a notice till we get to about the middle of the essay. There you quote from a brother's letter these words: "If there be no resurrection, I see no way in which they are punished in any sense, in which the righteous are not equally involved." You also say, "Neither in life nor in death do the righteous have any apparent advantage over the wicked."

Such language, coming from a "Blue Presbyterian," fifty years ago, would be nothing strange; but to hear such language from one who believes that eternal life depends upon a resurrection, through Christ the LIFE-GIVER, is to me surprising. It is a poor prop to your loved theory. I view the state of the righteous and wicked dead in a very different aspect. One goes down with the seal and promise of Jehovah, in full assurance of being brought back into life; and the others, "like beasts they are laid in the grave," and on their tombs is written, "They shall not rise," "they shall never see light." O, my brother, consider this question more candidly.

On this question a young brother for whose sake we have suffered some persecution, said: "I see a difference between the state of the righteous and wicked dead in this way: Supposing I were to go to bed to-night and be assured that I should 'sleep a perpetual sleep' never wake again, to all eternity—would it not be more terrible than to fall asleep fully expecting to rest for a few hours and awaken in the morning?"

If we say, the righteous have "no advantage over the wicked," we make the work of redemption of no account, and the precious promises of Christ as idle tales. Said Jesus, of his own, "I will raise him up at the last day;" but he has never made this promise to the wicked. It grieves me exceedingly to have the best words on record overlooked. Blessed Jesus, we believe thy word will prove true.

Let me close with a little general advice to all who oppose the Bible views of the resurrection, gathered from my own experience:

1st. Be willing to let God's way be yours. 2d. Be brave enough to confess the truth, though it makes enemies on every hand. 3d. "Cease from man," whether in the singular or plural (organized bodies) number. Be candid, independent and honest in studying the Bible. Prejudice and will among even Adventists is a foolish, unsanctified thing. "Bread and butter" is of no account compared to the pure truths of the Bible. Hard labor, poor fare, few friends and true gospel, is better than ease, plenty, multitudes of friends, and error. I've had my choice. Friends forsook; poverty and labor is my lot; but the light of truth makes my path plain, and bread earned for Christ's sake is sweet and wholesome. The delicious things will come by and by, and with them my Lord and Life. Let us wait.

PREJUDICE: THE FUTURE AGE.

BY ELD. J. PARRY.

THE readers of the HERALD OF LIFE have had a long breathing time on the subject of the future age, and the restoration of Israel to their own land, at the advent of their long promised Messiah. I have taken some pains to discover the reason of the wide-spread prejudice against this view of prophecy, which some of its opponents confess to be the evident literal meaning of the prophecies of the Old Testament.

The Jews have been a by-word and a reproach amongst all nations for many centuries; and, like all other inbred prejudices, it is hard to eradicate. What! these filthy infidel Jews, the offscouring of all things, who crucified Christ, and have been hated and persecuted by all Christian people, shall they be restored and honored in a future age above all other people on the earth! Who can credit this? "God's ways are not as our ways, nor his thoughts as our thoughts," or Israel would long ago have been cast off forever, and some Gentiles too, who have little to boast of against the natural branches, that, notwithstanding all our pharisaical pride and vain glory, will be grafted in again to their own olive tree.

The argument against it is this—The Jews, as a nation, rejected Christ and caused him to be crucified: therefore, all prophecies and promises made to them as a nation, became conditional, and therefore are now null and void, and the believing Gentiles are now the spiritual Israel and entitled to all the promises. There is some plausibility in this argument on the Advent view of their being kings and priests in the kingdom of Christ, and no subjects for them to rule over, and no increase to the kingdom after the resurrection, although it is compared to a grain of mustard seed; that it is to grow and spread itself over the whole earth. Again, it is said that the Jews rejected Christ at his first advent, and would not have him to reign over them. Well, but the Jews were not all Israel; they were but two tribes; and shall the ten tribes, "the whole house of Israel," be cut off for the crime of a remnant? Is this the way God deals with his chosen people—make the innocent suffer for the guilty? God forbid. I know not where the ten tribes are; they may be the Anglo-Saxon or not—but God has ever had his eye on them, and is able to bring them out of darkness into marvellous light; and when Christ comes again in power and great glory, he will take away ungodliness from Jacob; and when they shall see him they will say—"Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord." Amen.

AN ILLUSTRATION.

Two neighbors are seen running in the same direction. One apparently sees a prize of inestimable value ahead, and he has undoubted assurance that he can obtain it; he feels a perfect confidence that if he endures to the end, the prize will be his; his thoughts and desires, his affections and ambitions are all concentrated in that direction; he cares for nothing on the right hand or the left, "forgetting the things behind, he pushes on for the prize;" running with implicit faith, he runs joyfully and thankfully, using every means by which he is authoritatively assured of obtaining. The other neighbor apparently sees some terrible danger behind, upon which his gaze is constantly reverting; he has been pointed to the prize for which his neighbor is hastening, and has been told that there is safety from this much dreaded calamity; but he fails to see the prize, and catches merely the one idea of safety; aside from this he sees no attraction—nothing worth running for, and is in constant doubt about being able to reach the point; he has no relish for the race, it is an intolerable burden to him, and he looks hither and thither for some other way to avoid that haunting danger (which is his impelling power), and says to his neighbor who is running for the prize: "If I saw as you do, I would not run another step." In his confusion he stumbles upon a company of persons who tell him they are going to the same place, but by a circuitous route which is the only sure way; anon he comes upon another company, and another, and another—all going different ways, and sometimes at open war with each other, but all claiming the same destination; he is ready to sit down in despair, when a venerable evangelist tells him he must unite with some one of these companies—that it is the only means, the way having become so cut up and nearly obliteraeed by sectarian feuds that it is impossible for him to find it without traveling with some of the organized companies. He finally selects his company, closes his eyes and gives his hand to some blind leader, nods assent to some peculiar tenets probably entirely foreign to the real subject, and tries to make himself and others believe that he feels safe. He thus entails upon himself the additional duty of gathering in and carrying along all the supplies necessary for the maintenance of party government, but also the obligation to beat back his neighbor who is running for the prize—with the Chart in his own hand and his eyes open to the fact that "a kingdom divided against itself cannot stand."

The foregoing is a fair representation of two classes of Christians. One follows Christ because he believes he will thereby obtain eternal life; the other endeavors to follow Christ because he thinks God will torture him forever if he does not. One feels that eternal life is an inestimable boon in itself, with which all this life is not to be compared, seeing it cost the blood of the Son of God, and in view of the promise that "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man" the joys of eternal life without sin. The other looks upon it as nothing, only as an escape from imaginary eternal torments. One looks upon death as a dire punishment—an "enemy," because it will deprive him of eternal life; the other tries to look upon death as a "friend," an "angel of mercy," because he has been told it will immediately accomplish his end and admit him to heaven, and, if there is no eternal torture, because it will release him from all obligation to God and man. One runs a race of love, joy, confidence and peace in believing, "supported by Jesus and his word;" while the other runs a race of compulsion, doubt and fear, supported by the "traditions of men."—The Nararene.

JOHN TWENTIETH.

DEAR SIR,—One of the most wonderful things in reading the Word is, to see how varied is the truth each portion contains, and how many applications may be made of each part without at all straining it; so it is of this chapter. We have a literal account of the Lord's resurrection to Mary, Peter, and John, and to Thomas, each of these being, I believe a type of those who will be found upon the earth when he comes again. The Lord had over and over again told the disciples of his death and resurrection, and yet when it took place they were as much astonished as if they had never heard a word; and who does not see how much the disciples of this day are like them? The Lord's second coming and resurrection are the burden of the epistles, and yet how few, like Mary, are there that will not be said nay—The angels might say "He is not here," but she could not leave the place, and was rewarded by hearing his loved voice say "Mary." So in this day, there are a few who are waiting for him, and although they may be told their hope is vain, and be pointed to signs intended to prove that the world is getting better, yet they stand by the word and watch and wait, and it will not be long before they too will hear him say "Well done!"

In Peter and John we have a type of those who, although told of his coming, because it does not take place at once, are content to go home and make the best of it; and in Thomas a type of those who will not believe; no, it will have to be his actual appearing that will convince them. Now how blessed to see that whatever may be the attitude of the believers, the Lord manifests himself to all! None are left; and so when he comes again, whatever may be the attitude of the believer, not one will be left behind.

May the Lord help us to emulate Mary; it was early in the morning before it was day, and so the word says, "the night is far spent and the day is at hand." I am, yours truly.

CHRIST IN HEAVEN—DAVID IN THE TOMB.

"NEVER man spake like this man," said one in reference to Jesus. Never man spake by the inspiration of Jesus as did Peter on the day of Pentecost, say we—when that great Gospel baptism of the Spirit was poured out on the apostles at Jerusalem. Now notice what Peter said to those Jews who thought more of David than they did of Jesus, in Acts, 2d chapter: "Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us to this day. Therefore, being a prophet and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne; he seeing this before, spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul [he] was not left in hell [the grave], neither his flesh did see corruption. This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses; therefore, being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Spirit, he hath shed forth this which ye now see and hear. For David IS NOT ascended into the heavens; but he saith himself, the Lord said unto my Lord, sit thou on my right hand until I make thy foes thy footstool."

We hear everywhere, continually, especially on funeral occasions, of souls going to heaven at death; but Peter very plainly tells the Jews in that memorable sermon, that David—the man after God's own heart, the sweet singer of Israel, and Israel's favorite king—had not ascended into the heavens, but was dead and buried at Jerusalem, and his tomb was there as evidence of the fact, unto that day. It was Jesus who had ascended into heaven after leading captivity captive. Here is a great positive truth boldly declared—in which the Old and New Testaments abound—yet, as a late English writer has said, theology would about as soon die in error as relinquish a life long belief in some man-made creed. Paul says of all who have died in the faith, they sleep, just as David is now sleeping, and will be "satisfied," as he said while yet alive, when he awakes in the likeness of Christ.

When will Christians gain sufficient stamina to accept Gospel truth in preference to the uninspired wisdom of men, coming from Doctors of Divinity made such by feeble, ignorant man—in many instances having none of the grace of God in their hearts. Let truth prevail, though all the bricks and mortar in Christendom tumble down—though all the denominational divisions of Christ's church be swept from the earth, and creeds be driven as chaff before the wind. TOO ANXIOUS TO REAP.

AN over anxiety to see the result of their labor is a prevailing weakness of the professional ministry of our day. They seem to forget that sowing is the peculiar business of Christ's ministers, and though a Paul may plant and an Apollos may water, God must give the increase. Any increase gathered in any other way is not legitimate fruit—it is, to say the least, premature and unripe. "Sow thy seed in the morning, and in the evening withhold not thy hand" no part of the day set apart for reaping. Men are too anxious to manifest great results of their labors—too anxious to number their host and thereby measure their strength and importance; so much so that they do not scruple to "gather where they have not strewn," and place the gatherings to their own credit. Better be patient, content in the humble calling of a sower, foregoing the praises and titles of men, bestowed upon those apparently the most successful. If the sower labors faithfully and sows only the pure seed, it is none of his business about the result. He is not even responsible for the kind of ground it falls upon—whether by the wayside, in stony places, among thorns, or upon good ground—his reward is the same. Paul no doubt did his duty just as faithfully and acceptably when he preached without apparent result to the idle and curious Atheneans as when he gathered a promising church at Corinth. God has only given the seed of the Word into the hands of his ministers; he has never entrusted them with the sickle. "The harvest is the end of the world," when God will "send forth his reapers."—The Nazarene.

A MAN of veracity is a true man, a bold man, a steady man. He is to be trusted and relied upon, no fears can corrupt him, no fears can desert him.—Wm. Penn.

EQUALITY.—So far as it is from being true that men are naturally equal, that no two people can be half an hour together but one shall acquire an evident superiority over the other. —Dr. Johnson.

What is it to Hear?

BY H. YOUNG.

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God: and they that hear shall live."—John v. 25.

We quote this verse to ask, why the word "hear" is twice written in the text? Are there two kinds of hearing and two classes of hearers brought to view in said text? Will those who think there are not, answer our question, and say why the word "hear" is repeated? If there is but one class of hearers, and one kind of hearing, why not write the verse thus: The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God and live?

But this way of writing it would spoil the text for us, for we can see a difference in the hearing and hearers, which is no less than the difference of life and death, i. e., we can see how this voice of the Son of God, which reaches those who are under the condemnation of death—though it comes to them as a means of their recovery from said condition—may yet leave them still in death. Such are said to "hear" it, though it is an unwelcome voice to such, because it is a reproof; it finds them "doing evil;" and as they wish to continue so to do, they "hate the light" which this voice brings; and instead of coming to the light, which thus disturbs them, they shut it from them, and so are confirmed in their present condition, and thus their condemnation and death become eternal.

But how very different is the case of those of whom the text says, "and they that hear shall live." These last—though, perhaps, in no better condition when the voice reached them, than were the others—gave it such a hearing as soon amounted to an understanding; and such hearing and understanding would soon result in faith, love, obedience, salvation, and eternal life in the end.

Have we not seen by this time that "the dead" in this text are not literally dead when the voice of the Son of God is heard by them? We think there can be no other conclusion.

Well, if what we have written is a clear exposition of this 25th verse, we have only to pass down to the 28th and 29th verses, and we shall find that there is not a single word in either of them which is any thing more than a repetition of what is said in verse 25, except the word "all," found in the 28th verse; these two verses thus only making a universal application of what had been said in the 25th verse. For when it is said, in the 28th verse, "The hour is coming when all that are in the graves shall hear his voice," what is this saying more than is said in verse 25, "the hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of God," except that in the 28th it is said that "all shall hear?" And as to the word "resurrection," twice written in the 29th verse, it imports no more than the action or effect produced on the two different classes of hearers by the voice of the Son of God, when it reached and stirred them to their different action, which resulted in life to one class and death to the other. They came forth and showed themselves his friends or enemies; "the thoughts of their hearts," concerning Christ, were thus "revealed."—See Luke ii. 35.

Allow one thought more. We have said that the word "all," in the 28th verse, makes the first hearing named in the 25th, a universal hearing; and we mean by this word universal, all that it imports. We believe that every individual of the human race will sometime, and somewhere, hear this "voice," under such circumstances as that each and every one may make said voice the means of securing eternal life.

But millions of our race have lived and died who have not heard this voice; but they must yet hear, and hear in probation, too; for it is only in such condition that any can hear. Indeed, we are probationers only as this voice of invitation reaches us. This voice contains our offer of life; and can any one be lost only as he rejects this offer? Let the word of inspiration answer.

"If ye were blind, ye should have no sin."—John ix. 41. "If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin."—John xv. 22. "And this is the condemnation, that light has come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light because their deeds were evil."—John iii. 19; and Heb. xii. 25.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 7, 1870.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

Our Anniversary.

The Report of our Secretary, the letter of Br. Grim and the communication of our Assistant Editor, will be read with deep interest by all our friends. It will be seen that the Herald of Life is loved and cherished with an earnestness and liberality that is seldom the lot of a paper devoted to an unpopular cause. The reason of this is, the Life view, or the doctrine of Life future and eternal only in Christ, has taken deep root in the hearts of the supporters of the paper; too deep to be shaken by an occasional apostacy, or the combined opposition of believers in inherent immortality, or the fancy idea of a "spirit entity in man, distinct from his corporal organism," constituting "his essential personality;" the "survivance" of which, it is claimed, "is the only valid basis for the Bible doctrine of resurrection from the dead." With such sentiments, it will be seen by a resolution in our Secretary's Report, the "Life and Advent Union" has no sympathy, and believe they are subversive, so far as accepted, of the doctrine of "Life only in Christ" and of the resurrection of the dead: because, if the "essential personality" does not die, the "personality" cannot have a resurrection, for the very plain reason, that that which is not dead cannot be raised from the dead. Against the absurd notion of a "spiritual entity" being the "essential personality," and surviving in death, the Union has spoken out in unmistakable language. In this we rejoice, as showing the Union is firm to the principles with which it was first formed, and to which it has unwaveringly adhered from the outset.

The prospects of the cause, to promote which the "Life and Advent Union" was formed, were never more encouraging and promising than now. Disturbing causes have been removed or overcome, and an increasing harmony among ourselves is manifest; for which we devoutly thank God and our Life-giver, and take courage to labor on.

Our Assistant Editor.

We have no doubt, it will give joy to all our friends to learn that, by our request, our beloved Br. Leonard C. Thorne has been appointed our Assistant Editor. Br. Thorne is too well known to our readers to need any commendation from us. Our only regret is, that his business as a merchant occupies his time and energies so completely that we shall not be likely to get much more from his pen than heretofore; and especially as his health is not good; but to know that we have his immediate counsel and aid, in the editorial department, is a comfort to us and must be a satisfaction to our friends. That the Lord may give us, both, heavenly wisdom, let all our friends ask Him who giveth liberally and upbraideth not, and it shall be given. So shall the Herald of Life go forth on its mission of love and good will to men, and show forth the loving kindness of our Father in heaven, and the wondrous love of His Son our Life-giver and Lord, who is soon to be King on his own throne.

To the Members of the Union.

It will be seen by the Secretary's report of transactions of the last annual meeting that, upon the suggestion of the Editor, we were elected to the position of Assistant Editorship. It is true that from the organization of the Life and Advent Union, and first publication of its organ, the Herald of Life, we have been devoted to its interests because we have felt that its interests and the interests of truth are identical. It is true, also, that we have in the measure of grace given us, used our pen for purposes of comfort and encouragement to the Lord's struggling ones, and for the building up of "the faith once delivered to the saints;" but the little we have been enabled to do has been done with a view to one present reward only, that of consciousness that we have pleased God. This consciousness we possess. If our labors, of whatever nature, resulted in turning any from evil, or in strengthening any weak ones; if any have been by them led further into truth; if in any way God has been glorified and the blessed name of Jesus exalted, we can only the more feel to praise the Lord for His goodness and for "His mercy" which "endureth forever."

Somewhat apprehensive that the position assigned us may be fruitful in the bringing of additional duties, we can scarcely be expected to accept it with gladness; but for such an expression of the confidence of our co-laborers we are glad, and hereby tender our grateful thanks. May the Lord's will be done.

As a religious body, we have a great work to do, and in order to its accomplishment each member of the body has duties that can only be performed by himself or herself. Let all, then, from old age down to tender youth, seek not our own but the things that are Jesus Christ's. If this be the concern and aim of the body we shall stand as a bulwark of strength from which shall sound forth a pure gospel, and the people round about will bless God for our faithfulness. May we earnestly and unceasingly seek for aid.

Our Late Anniversary.

BY JACOB GRIM.

To the Brethren and Sisters, scattered abroad, we would again, at the close of our Anniversary, send our cordial greeting; and we would ask you to mingle your united prayers to the Father of all our mercies for his abundant mercies and favors toward us, in watching over all our deliberations, and overruling them to his own glory. We were again privileged in meeting many of our dear brethren and sisters at the Tent of the Life and Advent Union. Although at the commencement of our deliberations it almost seemed as if we were to meet an important crisis in the Life movement, and for awhile our hearts were made sad, yet, with the exception of the first afternoon, there never was, since the organization of our Union, a better or more happy state of feeling. We realized the hand of the Lord in all our movements; and never for the last seven years have we so felt that the Herald of Life is in the hands of the great Head of the church; and he will overrule all things for his own glory. We never before realized so clearly that we individually and collectively are but instruments in the hands of the Lord, and when we fail to accomplish God's purpose, he raises up others in our stead. Yes, my brethren and sisters, the Herald of Life will live until it has accomplished its work; and when it fails in that, God will use some other instrument.

If we could only be satisfied, and endeavor to learn our Father's will concerning us, and then work therein—and not try and subserve our own wills—how much more could we accomplish for his glory and our own comfort.

Brethren, suppose we try to drop and lose sight of self, and ask the question of our Father, what he would have us do, and in what capacity he would have us employed? and then, when we meet again at another anniversary, we will come together in quite another spirit. It does seem sometimes as if we forget that Jesus is at the rudder of the Life boat; for sometimes, when a little storm is brewing, or one of the oarsmen lets go his oar, we feel as if the boat was going down. But we have sailed thus far under His guidance, and by his help we will maintain our position, however humble it may be. Yes, my brethren, be of good cheer—Jesus guides our boat and all will be well. I think our friends left the camp ground with a full conviction that the Life and Advent Union stands in a better position for labor than it has in any past year.

And now, brethren, one word for the Herald of Life. I know that there has been considerable fault found for the past year or two; some with one thing and some with another, and I admit there has been some reason for it. But allow me to repeat an anecdote that I heard some thirty years ago. Considerable fault had been found with the "Baptist Record." Said the Editor, "I was once invited to a dinner, and I saw several dishes on the table that I did not like; and I turned up my nose at them; but going farther along the table I found a dish that I was very fond of; so I placed my chair near said dish, sat down, and drew several of the side dishes to me and made a very good dinner. Before I finished, I happened to look toward the two despised dishes, and found several enjoying those as much as I was enjoying mine." So, says the Editor, "I made up my mind the table was not spread for me alone." Moral: Brethren and Sisters, if we can find a dish in the Herald of Life which suits our taste, allow us to enjoy the same; and then you take the dish which suits your taste; then all will be fed in due time.

There is the children's corner: who would shut out that dish from the little ones? Then there should be a dish of pure milk for the new comers inquiring after truth: then we should have a dish of answers to questions. We say sometimes, "O, that is old; we have answered that so many times that it is quite stale!" So it may be to you or us; but it is quite new to the new subscribers. Why, I have been answering "Thief on the cross;" "Rich man and Lazarus;" "John v. 28, 29," for the last twenty-five years; and was asked the question again only the other evening. Yes, brethren, we must keep on answering; that is the work God has assigned us; and we are willing to work in the calling our Father has assigned us.

The great truths are, first, Life only in Christ: and second, When will this life be manifest? We answer, At the advent of Jesus the Life-giver. Here, then, are the two great fundamental truths upon which the Herald of Life has started on its mission. Now if men build upon this foundation, they will have life; even if what they build should be made up in part of hay, wood, or stubble; only be sure we build upon Christ, and not upon an immortal soul, or spirit entity. The great matter is, to be sure we get the foundation right.

Now brethren, for once just make up your minds that you and I are not the Life and Advent Union; but only a part of the large and increasing family; and others who are scattered abroad, and who have never been able to be present to speak for themselves, have the same rights with you and me; and all this great family must be fed and it requires a diversity of food in order that all may be satisfied. Only let us try to make our dishes small, and have them well spiced down with the love of God and the love of our brethren and sisters. Now, some folks are fond of a dish of chowder; but I prefer having all the ingredients that make up the dish separate, and then I can eat that which I like best; and that is what we do with some of the articles in the paper; we separate the parts we like and leave the rest for some others.

We have concluded, if time continues, and the Lord will, to have a Camp-Meeting of our own; and have opened a subscription for the same through the Herald: but the thing of the first and most importance is, that the brethren and sisters should speak their minds freely through the Herald as regards the best, most central and easiest place of access to the body at large: so speak freely, friends, that your committee may act intelligently. Yours, in the bonds of christian fellowship.

Life and Advent Union.
SEVENTH ANNIVERSARY.

SECRETARY'S REPORT.

Informal Meeting.

The Life and Advent Union held an Informal meeting at 10 A. M., for the purpose of considering their rights on the National Advent Camp Ground, as affected by a resolution of the Camp-Meeting Committee excluding business meetings from the camp ground. Brn. Thorne, Carroll and Macdonald reported the result of a meeting with the Camp-Meeting Committee in Springfield sometime since, in which this matter was discussed. They, acting unofficially, had acquiesced in the resolution. The Union did not consider itself bound by their action. A committee of seven was appointed to meet the Camp-Meeting Committee and express the sentiments of this body with regard to their rights on the ground.

This committee met the Camp-Meeting Committee and reported in the afternoon, previous to the opening of the regular session, that the committee had suspended the resolution for this year, and that we should be allowed to hold our business meeting on the ground as usual. Br. S. G. Matthewson accompanied the committee on their return, and requested that another committee be appointed for further conference.

REGULAR MEETING.

According to previous notice the seventh annual meeting of the Life and Advent Union was held at 2 P. M. on Thursday, August 25, 1870, in the Life and Advent Mission Tent, on the ground of the National Advent Camp-Meeting at Springfield, Mass.

The meeting was called to order by the President, Br. Jacob Grim, and opened with prayer by Br. George Storrs.

The Secretary made his report. This was corrected by substituting the words "agreeable to" for "advisable by" in the second resolution adopted last year, and by restoring a resolution accidentally omitted, in substance, "That the President and Vice-President of this Union shall not be eligible for two successive years." The minutes as read and corrected were adopted.

A discussion ensued as to the membership of the Life and Advent Union, during which remarks were made by various brethren; the first and second articles of the Constitution were read and discussed, and the second was amended by supplying the words, "thereby denying any future life to the wicked," between the words, "Christ alone" and "sustaining." This discussion did not result in any definite action, save a general acquiescence that the principle of membership of former years should be observed. Adjourned till 10 A. M. to-morrow.

Life and Advent Union met at 10 A. M., and was called to order by the President. Prayer by Br. Rockwell.

Voted to appropriate $75 out of the general fund to defray the expenses of board and travelling expenses of preachers and tent expenses.

Brn. L. C. Thorne, Chas. A. Hastings, John C. Day, Thos. R. Weaver, S. W. Bishop, R. E. Ladd, and Geo. K. Carroll, were appointed a committee to confer with the Camp-Meeting Committee, relative to differences existing between the two bodies and our rights and privileges for the future.

The Treasurer presented his report as follows:

Sept. 1, 1869.
Cash on hand, ...	$464 64
Receipts during year, . . .	5,157 60
Interest, ...	153 11
	$5,775 35
Amount paid out during the year,	$5,197 21
Interest, ...	64 79
	$5,262 00
Balance on hand, Aug. 26, 1870,	$513 35

Report accepted.

Thos. R. Weaver, Joseph Laciar, Geo. K. Carroll, John C. Day, and Geo. W. Brown were appointed a committee to nominate a board of officers for the year ensuing.

The resolutions adopted last year, the one relative to the re-election of President and Vice-President, the other relative to replying to communications in the Herald of Life in the same number in which published, were rescinded.

The nominating committee reported as follows:

For President, Leonard C. Thorne.
Vice-President, George K. Carroll.
Secretary, Wm. H. H. McAllister.
Treasurer, Wm. H. Thorne.

All these brethren were duly elected by a rising vote of the meeting.

Br. George Storrs was elected Editor of the Herald of Life for the year ensuing.

Bro. Storrs made a verbal report as Business Agent of the Union. This report was highly encouraging, and showed a degree of prosperity for which we ought to be thankful. A new office in an accessible locality, a new set of type, the paper entirely set up in the office, and $1.200 expended in the tract cause, were some of the facts embraced in the report. This report was accepted, and a vote of thanks was returned Bro. Storrs for the able and conscientious manner in which he had performed his duties as Business Agent and Editor for the past year.

On motion of Bro. Carroll, voted that we do now raise $2.500, to defray the expenses of publishing the Herald of Life for the next year. Under this motion $2.540 were pledged as fast as the Secretary could take down the names. The spirit was still so good that, on motion of Br. Chas. A. Hastings, voted to raise $500 more for the Tract cause. Under both motions $2762 were pledged. See list of pledges. $25 were also raised by collection for expenses.

On motion of Br. Grim, closed the session by singing the doxology, "Praise God," etc., as a thank offering to God for His favor in raising moneys to sustain the cause.

Adjourned till 1.30 o'clock P. M.

Aug. 26. Afternoon session. Met at 1.30 o'clock P. M. Prayer by Bro. Roworth.

On motion of Br. Storrs, Voted that the conference committee be empowered to take decisive action in their interview with the Camp-Meeting Committee.

Br. Spencer introduced the following preamble and resolution: Whereas, It has been from the first, and now is the belief of the members of the Life and Advent Union that man is wholly mortal, and in death unconscious, thereby denying that there is in man whether saint or sinner, an entity that survives the dissolution of the body and—

Whereas, Article II of the Constitution requires that all members shall believe in life through Christ alone, therefore,

Resolved, That any person who believes or teaches that man is dual, or that he has an entity that survives the dissolution of the body, shall be excluded from the privilege of membership.

This resolution was discussed, both pro and con, by Brn. Spencer, Day, Storrs, Hanford, Grim, Ladd, Carroll, Roworth, Bishop, Allen, Glass, Olmstead, Sr. Castle, and others, and was finally adopted by a vote of 54 ayes to 7 nays.

Voted, that the Secretary prepare the minutes of the Union and present them for correction before final adjournment. Adjourned till 6 P. M., to hear the Secretary's report and the report of the conference committee.

Aug. 26, 6, P. M. Prayer by Bro. Spencer. Secretary made his report. Adoption deferred till final meeting. A vote of thanks was returned Bro. Grim for the able manner in which he has served the Union the past four years as President. Adjourned till 8 o'clock A. M., to-morrow morning.

Saturday, Aug. 27, 1870. Met at 8 o'clock A. M. Prayer by Bro. Dwight Weaver.

The conference committee reported as follows:

Your Committee report that they entered upon their duties with a strong impression that some arrangement could be made with the Camp-Meeting Committee by which all could meet on the ground and hold meetings in harmony; but during the several interviews that followed, it became apparent that this could not be. A proposition was then made by the general committee to purchase our interest in the lease (two years of which are unexpired). This proposition your committee duly considered, and it was finally agreed between the two committees that the Life and Advent Union body receive $175 as a fair proportion of its interests in the grounds, said interests to cease at the close of the present annual meeting. And your committee take pleasure in informing you that although a misunderstanding existed between the two committees, on one or two points, there was not, in any of the several conferences, an expression used, a word spoken or an allusion made, not in harmony with the principles of Christianity. Kindness, wise counsel, and brotherly love prevailed throughout.

Leonard C. Thorne
Chairman of Committee.

This report was accepted.

On motion of Br. Grim, a collection was taken for the benefit of Br. W. S. Campbell; the same to remain open for subscriptions in the Herald of Life. $45 was raised. An opportunity was given to withdraw from the list of pledges, if any were dissatisfied with the action of the Union in adopting the resolution of yesterday P. M.

On motion of Br. Carroll, Voted that we hold a campmeeting next year. A committee of 9 for selecting a place and making other arrangements was appointed, consisting of the following brethren: S. W. Bishop, Oceanport, N. J., Jacob Grim, Philadelphia, Thomas R. Weaver, Springfield, Mass., Geo. K. Carroll, N. Y., Geo. W. Brown, Orrington, Me., Caleb Thompson, Providence, R. I., C. C. Barker, Hartford, Conn., John C. Day, South Ashburnham, Mass., Thos. R. Crocker, Brooklyn, N. Y. Voted that the $175 received for our interest in the Camp Ground be increased to $1000, for a Camp-Meeting fund, pledges to be opened here and continued in the Herald of Life. The amount was made up to $600 in a few minutes.

A vote of thanks was returned the Conference committee for the manner in which they closed their business with the Camp-Meeting committee yesterday.

The Secretary read the balance of his minutes and the whole was approved.

On motion, adjourned sine die.

W. H. H. McAllister,
Secretary.

New Tracts.

No. 23. The Life Views: or, Man's Origin and Nature. Annihilation of the Wicked. Is the Identity lost in death? Prof. C. F. Hudson's Position. The Judgment: Heb. ix. 27, 28. 1 Corth. xv. 18, 20, and 22. "Not see Life."

No. 24. How Readest Thou? or, Various Topics Considered: viz., Degrees in Punishment. Resurrection and Judgment. To Cease to be a Soul. The Punishment of Sin. Going to Heaven at Death. The Durability of Matter.

The above are two new tracts now added to our Campaign Documents, made up from matter which has appeared in the Herald of Life. For price see last page of this paper. To these we shall continue to add other tracts as we have matter and means.

Tracts by E. Wolcott.

This Brother wishes us to give notice that he has a large quantity of tracts on hand for free distribution. Some have accompanied their orders, for the last lot, with money, the amount of which was sent in tracts at their cost value, which is 60 cents per 1000 pages. Br. Wolcott's object is to get them before the people. Let those having one or more talents please send in their orders to

E. Wolcott, Keyport, N. J.

Truth vs. Man's Wisdom.

We have substituted the above name for the Campaign Document No. 20, instead of "Rich Tract." Some have thought, that, as all our Tracts are rich, it was "invidious" to call only one by that name. Hence it is changed as above.

GONE "INTO PERDITION."

"THE scarlet-colored beast"—the Napoleon Dynasty—which "ascended out of the bottomless pit," some twenty years ago—has gone "into perdition," as the prophecy, Rev. xvii. 8, said he should go. Napoleon's mighty army, which he set in motion with proud array six weeks ago to humble Prussia, has been dashed to pieces, and he himself is now a prisoner in the hands of the king of Prussia, against whom he had waged an unprovoked war.

The details of Napoleon's disasters, and the crushing of his mighty army, with its final surrender, will be fully known to all our readers, by the secular papers, before ours can reach them. The details are of little consequence to us; the fact that the Napoleon dynasty has come to its "end, and none to help him," seems to stand out undeniable. What complications are to grow out of this fact remains to be seen; and we are not much disposed to speculate, but wait and watch to learn the order of Providence in the matter. We all need a calm and sober state of mind to meet coming events, and to avoid all undue excitement. That the end of this age is not distant, seems certain; yet it may be more so than many believe.

Our eyes are now turned towards Rome, as a prophetic point, to see what is to become of the Harlot Woman, who has been riding the "scarlet colored beast," now that she is "unhorsed," and the beast she rode has gone "into perdition." Will the Harlot soon follow him? She was riding that power to her "judgment," if we read the prophecy aright, Rev. xviii. 1, and onward. The beast has gone down "alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone"—clearly a symbol of an awful war, with modern instruments of death, in which immense quantities of powder are consumed. "With violence shall that great city Babylon"—the harlot woman—"be thrown down, and be found no more at all."—Rev. xviii. 21. "The ten horns . . . upon the beast," (the ten States of Italy, it may be), "these shall hate the harlot . . . and burn her with fire."—Rev. xvii. 16. She has "killed with the sword," and she "must be killed with the sword."—Rev. xiii. 10. Her end it seems is to come in "war and by violence." We wait to see it.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM ELD. B. MATTHIAS.

BR. STORRS: I thought to go east (and I may), but not in time to be at the meeting of the Life and Advent Union; but, if my testimony is worth any thing, you may accept of it entirely in favor of the main doctrine that called it out, viz.: that Christ is the LIFE-GIVER, as he declares, "I am the resurrection and the life, he that believeth in me though he were dead, yet shall he live; and whosoever liveth and believeth on me, shall never die." This is a very plain statement for whom the resurrection is instituted. Those who believed in him, before dying, like Job, who spoke for a resurrection thus: "Oh that thou wouldest appoint me a set time, and remember me." And that intelligent criminal, about whom so much is said, "Lord remember me, when thou comest into thy kingdom." David says, "Thou wilt redeem my soul from the power of the grave." Isaiah saith, "With my dead body shall they rise." Paul saith, "Your life is hid with Christ in God." "Them that sleep in Jesus, will God bring with him;" and very much more of the kind shows that the resurrection is a provision of mercy, and a reward; and abundantly implies that only such as speak of it, and speak for it, and live for it, will have a resurrection. That text, "He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live," as much implies that unbelievers will not be raised, as it distinctly affirms the believer will be. The admission by a ticket into an assembly implies so forcibly that those who have them not may not be admitted, that everybody accepts of the rule.

Please be assured of my poor, hearty cooperation; for I greatly rejoice in the peculiarity of our paper; the only one living of the kind, is it not? But there is the "Nazarene"—let them multiply; and I think it has a providential Editor: "The right man in the right place." But I can only say, "Be ye warm and be ye fed," at present. Work is increasing on my hands, and I expect to make a virtue of working for nothing and finding myself. I have, and will recommend the paper.

Though you do not accept of me, as a correspondent, which weighs something with me, though nothing to your prejudice or the paper, I yield to nobody in my love for the cause, the paper and yourself. I rejoice in our happy lot, as an outpost, to have you in command.

More when I have the time. We will commence a Tent campaign in a week or ten days.

Send us a package of tracts; and when we shall get under way I will make a collection for the tract fund.

Yours, in hope.

LANESFIELD, KANSAS, Aug. 18 1870.

Remark by the Editor.

We regret that we did not get time to send the tracts sooner; but they are now on the way, but too late for the first tent meeting spoken of, we presume.

FROM POLLY G. PITTS.

BR. STORRS: Here are a few words that I would like to say to the brethren at your Anniversary. To the brothers and sisters now assembled, I would send a few words of greeting. May God enable you to appreciate your high and holy calling. Called to hold up, before a gainsaying world, God's everlasting truth of life, life from the dead through Jesus Christ our Lord and LIFE-GIVER, and No Life out of Him. Soon, dear brethren, the great Alleluia, which I feel is struggling for utterance, will burst forth like mighty thunderings, saying, "The Lord God omnipotent reigneth." Great Babylon, which has corrupted the earth, is sinking like a mill-stone, to rise no more; and the scarlet beast, that has carried her is going to perdition; and soon it will be said, "Rejoice over her ye heavens, and ye holy apostles, and prophets; for God hath avenged you on her."

God grant that we may be among the number that shall again say, "Alleluia; and her smoke rose up forever and ever." O, what then? Perhaps a few lines of a poet that I highly prize will express something of it:

"On a pebbly shore, where forever more
Gently creeps a music-laden wave—
In the meadows green, which beyond is seen,
Camps a conq'ring army, true and brave.
Shining are the weapons of this martial throng—
Crimson-dyed their banners, battle-worn so long;
But now they cast them down, and each receives a crown,
While they chant their never-ending song!

Our Saviour and our king,
His victories shall ring,
His conquests thro' eternity shall sound!
War shall be no more—we have reach'd the shore,
Safely reach'd our last grand camping ground."

Fight on, friends; the crown will soon be given. God's blessing be with you all.

Amen. So be it.

FREDERICKSBURG, IOWA, Aug. 20, 1870.

FROM BENJAMIN MELLOR.

BR. STORRS: As I cannot attend your annual meeting, I feel myself called upon to state my mind in regard to the eighth volume of the HERALD OF LIFE. Now, I do not know what your mind will be on this matter; but judging from your advanced age, I fancy it would be very desirable to be relieved of some of your care and responsibilities, and to feel yourself more at liberty to enjoy the comforts of domestic life; and I do hope and trust that all our friends of the Union, will feel themselves in duty bound so to arrange. There seems to be a choice of two ways in order to accomplish the desired end; viz., Either make the paper a semi-monthly, or appoint an Assistant Editor. For my own part I should prefer the latter, if most agreeable to the friends at the meeting.

I am not sure that I can do any more for vol. viii. than for vol. vii., but shall stand pledged for the same amount.

I have been delighted with the leading article in our paper for July 27, headed the "WRATH OF GOD: WHAT IS IT?" I think the article, if published in tract form, would make an excellent little preacher.

With unabated love and esteem, yours in the gospel hope.

ROCKDALE MILLS, PA., Aug. 1870.

FROM SAMUEL BROWN.

BR. STORRS: I had intended to be at the anniversary of the Life and Advent Union this year; but on account of large expenses by sickness in my family, I shall have to forego my fond anticipation of seeing those I have never seen of like precious faith; but as as I want to aid the publication of the HERALD OF LIFE, perhaps it will be best to save all I can for that purpose. I will pledge for the support of the paper twenty-five dollars, for Vol. viii., and five dollars for the tract fund; and more if I can. I should very much dislike to see the HERALD go down, and wish I could sustain it by hundreds instead of twenty-five; but trust that it will be kept up until the Master comes. My prayer is, that the Lord will give Br. Storrs health and strength to perform the arduous work which seems to be his lot and privilege to perform, until the opening heavens shall reveal the longed for and loved one, that so many are looking for. Then we shall have a meeting when all the saints will be there; a glorious meeting that. Your friend and brother.

N. M. CATLIN, Esq., Kingsbury, N. Y. writes: I wish to express my entire approbation of the HERALD, and to say that its general tone and course are not only approved, but the mechanical execution of the paper is most admirable. I heartily wish it continued under the same guiding hand of its present Editor. I will pay for the next year and more if I can. Truly, your brother.

FROM WM. MONTGOMERY.

BR. STORRS: I enclose $5, my subscription for the HERALD OF LIFE for next year.

I am sorry I cannot be with you at your annual meeting, but trust you may have a good time, and that the presence of the Lord may be felt by every one; and I wanted to say, when it is well with you remember all those loved ones, who, although not personally with you, yet are with you in heart and soul; and, I may also say, doing all in their power to help on the good work of proclaiming to the world—"Life only through Christ."

Is it possible that —— has made shipwreck of faith and gone back to preach the immortality of the soul? I do sincerely hope it is not the case; but supposing it is, and even Geo. Storrs, and all connected with the "Life and Advent Union,'" should turn, it would not change my firm conviction that there is no future life for any of the human family without a "union with Christ." May we all secure that union, so that when Christ, who is our Life, shall appear, we may also appear with him in glory. Yours sincerely.

Remark by the Editor.

That is right Br. M.; the truth does not depend on man nor on any body of men. We pity any one whose faith stands only or mainly on the wisdom of men; too often, "unstable as water." Let us trust in the wisdom of God.

FROM S. B. EMMONS.

DEAR SIR: Enclosed find one dollar for tracts. Send any of the numbers you please. I have no choice. I am pleased with the numbers of the HERALD OF LIFE, I have received. I hold the same views on the immortality question I did when reading the "Bible Examiner." It seems strange how great, good, and learned men should hold to the doctrine of the immortality of the soul.

I have, within the last two years, given some attention to the science of Physiology, and also to the writings of Phrenologists; both of which declare that the brain is the organ and seat of the mind. The mind, or soul being one and the same. So says Professor Hooker. So says Mr. Geo. Combe, author of System of Phrenology.

Now, if the mind be dependent on the brain for its mental operations, when that brain is dissolved in death, and is turned to its original element, dust, where are we to look for the manifestations of mind? Where is the thinking principle?

I am both surprised and pleased to find both sciences bear me out in the belief of the non-immortality of the soul.

I have taken some interest in trying to disseminate the doctrines you advocate; though to little effect. Must I say it? The greatest hindrance to its reception is sectarian prejudice.

O sectarianism! What hast thou done? Do I greatly err when I say, it has done more to obscure and pervert the doctrines of the Bible than all the infidel writers since the days of Bolingbrook and Hume, down to Tom Paine. I am sorry to say, I have found but little independent inquiry among men in their attempts to determine what the Bible teaches. Alas for poor human nature!

Yours, in the love of truth and sincerity.

LANCASTER, S. C., Aug. 27, 1870.

FROM J. D. SHERIDAN.

BR. STORRS: On my arrival here, some three weeks ago, I received the packages of tracts and papers you sent me; and I have spent the time, as much as my poor health would permit, in scattering them, where there was a probability of their being read. There are a few here who take an interest in reading them. I find a few souls here who are looking for the soon coming of the Redeemer; but they all hold to the belief of the revival to life of the wicked dead.

The Life views, as held by the "Life and Advent Union," have not been promulgated in this place, that I can learn, previous to my coming. I feel somewhat disappointed, as I so much desired to find some here of my faith.

But I am determined to do what I can to present the truth by scattering those silent messengers.

I feels this consolation, that while I am making myself very unpopular, the truth never was popular, and we can hardly expect it will be at the present time.

I feel to thank God that in these "perilous times," when men, "having itching ears, are heaping to themselves teachers," we may have His holy word for our guide; and for the blessed promises therein contained, that we may have the aid of the Holy Spirit, if we desire it, who is able to guide us unto all truth.

I have much to write, but I forbear to take up your time.

Dear Brothers and all the pilgrims who are scattered abroad, waiting for the return of the Son of man from heaven, I desire an interest in your prayers, that I may prove faithful, and endure to the end, that we may all meet in that better land.

Enclosed find two dollars, which I wish to contribute to the tract cause.

Yours in the bonds of Christian love.

FROM N. S. WILBUR.

BR. STORRS: I think no true disciple of Christ need be mistaken in the signs of the times, when we compare passing events with the blessed old chart—the Bible. The Bonaparte Dynasty is on its last legs; and as I believe that power to be representative of the scarlet colored beast that carried the harlot woman, which goes into perdition with the beast, I cannot help thinking that the great battle of the last day is near, very near, if not already begun: and although I am old and infirm, yet I have a persuasion that I shall live to hear the solemn, but glorious news proclaimed, "Babylon is fallen;" when the scriptures will be fulfilled, as seen by John Rev. xviii;" when "a mighty angel took up a stone, like a great mill-stone, and cast it into the sea, saying, Thus with violence shall that great city Babylon be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all."

My dear brethren, seeing we look for such things, what manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation and godliness? In closing these few lines, brother, let me say, my prayer shall be that you and I may be prepared to receive a crown of Life when Jesus comes in his glory, and to meet Him with joy, receiving an inheritance in the new heavens and earth, with all them that love His appearing, and are sanctified through his precious blood. God grant this for his Son's sake. Amen.

RICHMOND SWITCH, R. I., Aug. 1870.

FROM Z. MCLESTER.

A FEW numbers back I received the HERALD with only the inside impression, and the other side blank, with the remark; "Sad mistake:—Our paper fell short nearly 200 this week, so that we are obliged to send the inside impression only to about that number of our subscribers." Which language needs farther explanation on my dull brain, as the outside came blank, and for aught that I could see, ready for the impression also. Now, if you had said, your ink fell short, the dimness of the print at top of the paper would have corroborated your statement: for the HERALD is, generally, the most beautiful print I ever get. Now, if you think any of your other readers are as silly as me, you will admit that a few words of explanation will be acceptable.

Yours as ever.

PARIS, HENRY CO., TENN., Aug. 22, 1870.

Explanation by Editor.

The outside of our paper is printed Friday before its date. The type is then distributed and used to set the inside, which is printed Tuesday afternoon following. At that time it is impossible to reprint the outside, unless we reset the entire pages, at a cost of some $20; and even to do that would delay its issue for two or three days. We trust this explanation will be satisfactory.

FROM JANE J. BRADLEY.

BR. STORRS: I am often met by those opposed to our views touching the non-resurrection of the wicked, in this way: There is not sufficient motive, unless the wicked are to be raised and punished, or rather tormented, to induce the sinner to repent. Nor is this view entertained by Church members (so called) alone. Not long since, I was advocating the non-resurrection of the wicked to an Advent sister, who belives in the final destruction of the wicked, when she suddenly exclaimed, "Sister B. if I believed as you do, I never would try to persuade a sinner to repent," as if God, when he has said, The soul that sinneth it shall die, had failed to use language sufficiently strong to induce the sinner to turn from his evil way and live!

The above erroneous view has suggested the following questions—Was the penalty denounced upon Adam, viz., "In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die," due to all his posterity? Did not God fully explain to Adam the nature of that death when he met him in the garden, after his transgression, and told him he would finally "return to the ground," saying, "for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return?"

Is not the Creator equally chargeable, as some of ourselves, with not having presented the sinner with sufficient motives to induce him to repentance; or, to preserve from sin?

VERNON, CONN., Aug. 1870.

FROM JOSIAH M. FIKE.

BR. STORRS: We are living in a grand and awful time, when the nations are angry and are summoning their hosts to battle; or, "The battle of that great day of God Almighty:" and well may it be. Their cup of wrath must be about filled up, that they be brought into the valley of decision (Joel iii. 14,) to make an end of Gentile rule and to put down all authority, and to set up the everlasting kingdom of God, and to establish righteousness in the earth, to redeem the saints to be the ruling power of the future ages; whom all nations, tongues, and kindreds of the earth shall serve. Amen. May these things soon take place, to the glory of our God.

We do not get much preaching from the word of God, except what one "Christadelphian,"as they denominate themselves,preachers here in their synagogue. "He went out from us," and yet he can deliver a very sound discourse on things concerning the kingdom of God and the future condition of the earth. But he has "Departed," or digressed from the Faith by preaching, and making as a test of fellowship the doctrine of mortal resurrection, with investigating Judgment for the saints after the resurrection," etc. So, all the sound doctrine we get is what comes from reading the Good Book, the HERALDS, and some occasional works or news on the signs of the times, to make us wise and of sound understanding, so that we fall not.

I have had pretty hard work "to provide for things honest in the sight of men" for the support of my family; so that I could not send you money as I wished; can only send you a little now, for the HERALD. Don't stop my paper, if my subscription should run out. You will get some money by and by. If not, it will be because I cannot get it. I would like more tracts, but have not the money. A brother in hope of eternal life in the new earth. "Life only in Jesus."

ONE who studies the Bible much, with a prayerful, humble mind, will not be apt to go wrong in matters generally. It is not what the church "will let you do," but what Jesus Christ sanctions, that must be your guide.

ONE may often hear it observed that there is a great deal of truth in what such a one has said: i. e., perhaps it is all true except one essential point.—Whately.

CONSTITUTION OF "THE LIFE AND ADVENT UNION."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to the wicked) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, and five Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same, and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VI. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church, as that term is usually understood. It is simply a Union for the transaction of the business specified in the first Article: in other words, it is a "Business" association; and the 1st and 2d Articles were so framed as to make it impossible for any one to vote in its meetings who does not harmonize in the main object. Hence, the Union, at its seventh annual meeting (1870), declared, by the decisive vote of 54 to 7, that by "Life only in Christ," we mean, there is no entity in man, called spirit or soul, that survives in death; and that persons holding such views are ineligible to vote in the transaction of the business of the Union. All such persons do really deny the fact intended to be set forth in Article I., of "Life only in Christ." They make the life principle to be, first, of themselves; and only secondarily of Christ; thus perverting the truth which the Union was formed to promote.

ELD. W. S. CAMPBELL.

FROM LOUISA J. BEACH.

BR. STORRS: We arrived safely at home from campmeeting on Saturday afternoon. The next day we rode over to Meriden, to see Br. and Sr. Campbell. Br. C. still lies on his bed of suffering, as he has done for the last three months, and where he must in all probability still be for some time to come. He is no doubt gaining somewhat, but slowly. It seems almost a miracle that he has lived through so much,—but the Lord is very pitiful and of great mercy.

Br. C and wife were both glad to hear from the meeting, as they are interested in all that concerns the welfare of the church. The free-will offering sent to them was presented by the hand to whom it was intrusted, and thankfully received. Sr. C. especially, wishes to acknowledge their sincere gratitude to all who have kindly remembered them and given expressions of sympathy, whether by word or deed. She would gladly have responded to all by letter, but her arduous cares and duties, by day and night, have made it impossible.

She would like to acknowledge the reception of five dollars from some one calling themselves simply "An Ohio Life-lover," or believer.

We trust the church will continue to remember our Bro. and family in this hour of trial and sorrow.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., Sept. 2, 1870.

FROM ELVIRA H. JILLSON.

BR. STORRS: Allow me to say, through our loved paper, the HERALD OF LIFE, to my dear brothers and sisters, whose sympathy I have shared, and whose love is a treasure, my poor heart is sad; yet hopeful, even now, though God, by an afflictive providence, has come very near me.

Aug. 22d, intelligence reached me in New Hampshire, that my dear mother, who has taken care of my invalid father for so many years, was sick of lung-fever. I was with them the next day.

Friday Aug. 26, they both died, and are now quietly sleeping in one grave. O, what so precious as our hope.

Pray for your afflicted sister.

BY MARIA MATHEWS WEAVER.

JESUS, uphold me by thy hand,
Lest I should fall at last;
O guide me thro' this dreary vale
Till all earth's storms are past.

When friends forsake and foes unite,
When heart and flesh all fail,
Strong in the strength that God supplies
Let me o'er all prevail.

A little while earth's storms will cease,
And foes oppress no more,
Our tears and sighs our pains and groans
Will be forever o'er.

After our sorrow, cometh joy:
After our toil, comes rest:
After our our wanderings, we'll be home
Among the pure and blest.

O wait, ye saints, for that glad day;
Be holy while ye wait,
For soon the King to earth shall come
And all things new create.

And while we wait let heavenly love,
Bind all our hearts in one;
So shall we prove our kindness true
To God's eternal Son.

BIBLE—SPIRITUALISM.

MR. EDITOR:—Under the above heading J. A. M. F., in your issue of the 14th inst., complains of my not answering his plain question. "Was the prophecy of Malachi iv. 5, fulfilled in the person and ministry of John the Baptist?" If I manifested a spirit of seeming indifference to the question, then he must attribute my motive to my earnest desire to warn and guard my brethren and fellow Christians from the false, delusive system of modern Spiritualism, which is the result of teaching man's inherent immortality. But to the question, as I understand the Scriptures, I do not think the prophecy has been fulfilled entire.

The prophet says: "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet,"—that must mean Elijah himself, must it not? and not Elijah in some other person. And his coming is to be "Before the great and dreadful day of the Lord;" and the prophet had just been giving a description of that day in these words, "For behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble; and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch." And it was before this day that Elijah the prophet shall be sent, "to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the hearts of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse." This day, then, being in the future, and no personal Elijah to establish the proper relations of fathers and children, it looks clear, to my mind at least, that this prophecy was not fulfilled in John the Baptist. But this is not all our reasons for such an opinion. John's reply to a delegation of priests, when they asked him, "Art thou Elias?" unequivocally answered "I am not." "Art thou that prophet?" and he answered "no." His testimony in regard to himself was this: "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness; make straight the way of the Lord, as said the prophet Esaias, recognizing his mission in the words of the prophet Isaiah, xl. 3, without the slightest allusion to the prophecy of Malachi.

After the death of John the Baptist, Jesus, with Peter, James and John, was returning from the Mount of Transfiguration, and after charging them not to tell any man what they had seen in vision, they then ask him, "Why then say the Scribes that Elias must first come?—Matt. xvii. 10, 11. And Jesus answered and said unto them, "Elias truly shall first come and restore all things." Can this have any reference to John the Baptist, who had been beheaded? We admit that John the Baptist came in the "spirit of Elijah," but his mission falls short of the complete fulfillment of Malachi's prophecy. "If any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of His;" and having Christ's spirit, does not make us so many Christs; it only makes us Christ-like, hence the necessity of some personal prophet to fulfill the prophecy of Malachi.

Now let us turn to Acts iii. 20, to close of chapter, and see if Jesus Christ is not that prophet whom God will send; whom the heavens must retain until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began; and "that every soul which will not hear that prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people." And as Elijah had power to command "fire to come down from heaven," and consume those which consulted strange gods, 2d Kings i. 16, so Christ, as the Elijah of Malachi, and in fulfilment of his prophetic declaration shall be revealed in flaming fire, taking vengeance on them that know not God, and obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, 2d Thess. i. 9. But you may say this mode of reasoning makes Christ and Elijah one and the same person; we answer in the words of Jesus; "No man knoweth the Son but the Father."—Matt. xi. 27. Neither has God revealed to us the method by which Elijah was prepared for his change. God works every thing after the counsel of his own will.

Against the "ministry of angels," we have nothing to say, other than we believe it as firmly as any one, but that they are the spirits of dead prophets, remains to be proved. "Man was made a little lower than the angels," so the Scriptures affirm.—Heb. ii. 7. And because he was thus lower than the angels, he was subject to death in consequence of sin; and before man can live again after death, Jesus must be made a little lower than the angels, too—Heb. ii. 9; so that by the suffering of death he may free man from the consequence of sin and death, and man be in his resurrection state, "equal unto the angels,"—Luke xx. 36; so that Enoch or Elijah, in their translated state, if God saw proper, could reveal to John in the Isle of Patmos, that grand panoramic vision which he beheld. This, the spirit of a dead prophet could not do: "for the dead know not anything." Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego passed through a fiery furnace, and came out uninjured. And why? Ah! that's the question. Why? Because the form of the fourth was with them, and loosed their bonds, and took the general superintendence of the whole affair, and conducted it in such a masterly manner as to convince the king that the "form of the fourth was like the Son of God."

These men did not seek this opportunity to make a display that might be heralded to the world what they as noted spiritualists could do—not they! It was because of their firm and unyielding adherence to truth and right; because of their undying devotion to the God of their fathers, and their persistent refusalto acknowledge the orthodoxy of the king, that his "visage was changed, and he was full of fury," and commanded the furnace to be heated "seven times more than it was wont to be." The King was not aware that those three Hebrew captives were in such intimate relations to the form of the fourth, as that to touch them, was to "touch the apple of his eye." Was the case of "David Home," in these respects, similar to theirs, or was it not? We certainly made no mistake when we judged from the tone of your previous article that modern spiritualism was your system of religion, and you do not believe in a resurrection either. There is nothing strange in this at all. It would be rather strange if you should, and in fact it is passing strange, that any one believing in the separate conscious existence of the soul or spirit from the body, which was only a hindrance or clog to their freedom, should ever have need of it in a future state; and this accounts for the reason why orthodoxy pays so little attention to the doctrine they have learned from some one, outside of the Bible, that "death is the gate to endless joy;" and they sing it lustily too. They seem to forget that death is our common enemy, and as such, doomed to be destroyed. But in the midst of this almost world-wide delusion, there are a few who believe in a resurrection from the dead, "Anastasis ton ek nekron," (out from among dead ones). Jesus says, I am the resurrection and the life. All Christians believe this. We do not believe in any spirit resurrection at death. Christ the author of the resurrection and the life, laid for three days in the cold embrace of death, after which time his Father raised him up according to promise before his flesh began to see corruption; and four times in John vi. he promises to raise his people up at the last day, and give them "everlasting life."

You refer me to Luke xx. 35—But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection of the dead, etc. Can language be plainer than this? They who are worthy! What then? They are raised! What then? They are equal to the angels. Does this not look as though there was some who are not worthy, either to obtain that world (or age) nor a resurrection from the dead? We think it does. But Paul says: Philip iii. 11, "If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead." Are we to understand Paul as saying, that when he died, he would have a spiritual resurrection from the dead? We do not so understand him, but we infer from this passage that Paul counted all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus, his Lord, and was made to know the fellowship of his suffering, and to be conformable to his death. "If by any, or all these means he might be found among the worthy ones of whom Jesus spake in Luke xx. 35. Neither would he have used such language had he believed in a universal resurrection.

But Paul shall speak for himself concerning this disputed doctrine—1st Cor. xv. 16, and onward, "for if the dead rise not, then is Christ not raised; and if Christ be not raised, your faith is vain, ye are yet in your sins; then they also which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished." Now if their falling asleep in Jesus was their spiritual resurrection, how superfluous for Paul to say they had perished. The fact is, Paul does not base his argument on the resurrection of Christ merely, but on the doctrine itself; and if the doctrine of the resurrection is not true, then Christ himself has not been raised; but that Christ was raised in his bodily form proves the doctrine true, and he becomes the first fruit of them that slept. "For since by man (Adam) came death, by the man (Christ) came also the resurrection of the dead. "For as in Adam (by virtue of their relation to him as mortal beings) all die; even so in Christ (by virtue of their relation to him as the author of eternal life) shall all that are in him be made alive," "but every man in his own order. Christ the first fruit—afterward they they that are his at his coming." Then cometh the end, etc.

If this does not exclude the wicked dead, who are not in Christ from any part in the resurrection, then we cannot see the force of the Apostle's analogy between the two Adams, 51st verse. "Behold I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but shall all be changed in a moment—in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we (the living—those who do not sleep,) shall be changed. "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." Not the theological, spiritual, immortal part of man, put on incorruptibility and immortality at death. These according to modern theology never were any thing else but spiritual and immortal, and can never be any thing else in the future. But the logical Paul applies his masterly arguments of a resurrection, to something that was heretofore corruptible and mortal, and there can be no amount of science or philosophy that can change our mind from this belief.

Jesus and the resurrection is as sound theology as we care to have; and upon the return of Jesus from heaven, and the resurrection of the dead, depend all our hopes of a future life and immortality. We may not be able to explain satisfactorily to those who differ with us, but we believe the righteous will be raised to everlasting life. Christ assures us of the fact; and if all the imaginary spirits that throng the air and darken heaven, and rule this lower world, (Wesley) were to tell us to the contrary, we would not believe them. No! nor if an angel from Heaven was to come and tell us differently, we would not believe him. We have been trying the spirits for some time, and we find quite a number of them, but none of them immortal; and among them prominently, is the spirit of lying, and when we trace this spirit in our trial of them, we find at a very early period of the world's history, he commenced his diabolical system of lying in the garden of Eden, for which he earned the reputation of a liar and murderer from the lips of Jesus himself.—John viii. 44.

God had told Adam if he ate of the forbidden fruit, he should "surely die;" and this lying spirit said "ye shall not surely die." And he persists in saying the same thing today, whenever and wherever he can get a medium through whom he can successfully propagate the same diabolical lie, "ye are immortal and cannot surely die." This lying spirit cannot accomplish anything unless he first gets the consent of some person to act as medium; and the more mediums he can get, the more ruin he can effect. But remember, he is perfectly harmless and powerless until the medium consents; and when this takes place, the consenting medium becomes particeps criminis.

Let us all try to have and keep the Spirit of Him that raised up Christ from the dead, and if we have this Spirit, then "He that raised up Christ from the dead, shall also quicken our mortal bodies by His Spirit that dwelleth in us;" so that whether we sleep or wake, we shall be the Lord's. And when the Chief Shepherd shall appear, we shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.

STEWART CARLISLE.

THE Gospel is just good news about God and his Son Jesus Christ. It is not good news about myself—but simply and solely about God and Christ. It tells me of the exceeding riches of the grace of God. It tells me there is salvation for me—salvation to the uttermost through the cross and blood of God's beloved Son.

Jesus has great care for the weak ones, because they will become strong one day. All great graces were once little graces; all great faith must have once been little faith. It is always first the blade, then the ear, and then the full corn in the ear. Mountain-moving faith was once a trembling thing. Kill the lambs! Then where will the sheep be? Slaughter the innocents! Then where shall Bethlehem find her men? Destroy the children! Then whence shall come the warriors who march in ranks to the battle? Jesus sees the weak ones not as they are, but as they are to be. He discerns the complete man in the babe of grace.

WITH THE HEART.—It is evident that true religion, or holiness, lies very much in the affections, because the Scriptures place sin very much in hardness of heart; and it is equally evident that without holy affection there is no religion. No light in the understanding is good which does not produce holy affection in the heart; no habit of mind is good which has no such exercise; and no external fruit is good which does not proceed from this principle.

FINISH WHAT YOU BEGIN.—A new church was being built in the vicinity where little Milton H. lived. The work went on very slowly, and sometimes stopped for days. At last Milton's patience was exhausted. "I do wish," he said, "they would finish that church." "Ah," said his grandmother, "don't be in too big a hurry. The world wasn't made in one day." "I know it wasn't," Milton replied, "but when the Lord commenced to make it he never stopped until he finished it."

WHEN God makes our cross a little heavier, he means that we shall come nearer to him, for added strength to carry it. We must draw closer to the Lord our Strength, and live more simply upon him. He has fulness without limit, and of his fulness shall we receive.

WHEN men are determined upon being blessed, but will not obey God, the devil will give them an elation of soul that readily passes with many for a manifestation of the presence of the Holy Spirit. The counterfeit so closely resembles the genuine that experienced believers are often deceived.

A DINNER of fragments is often said to be the best dinner. So are there few minds but might furnish some instruction and entertainment out of their scraps, their odds and ends of thought. They who cannot weave a uniform web, may at least produce a piece of patch-work.—Hare.

THERE is no right faith in believing what is true, unless we believe it because it is true.

EYES OPEN.

"OUR minister said in his sermon, last evening," said Mrs. Beach, the wife of a prosperous wholesale dry goods merchant, on Market street, as she dusted her mantle of porcelain and marble on Monday morning, "that he who wanted to do good must be on the constant lookout for opportunities; that God does not find our work, and bring it ready fitted and prepared to our hands; but he spreads the world before us, and we are to walk through it as Christ and the apostles did, with eyes open, looking for the sick and suffering, the poor and oppressed.

"Now, I am certain," continued the lady, as she replaced a marble Diana in the centre of the mantel, "I should like to do some good every day—one feels so much better when they go to rest at night; and I'll just keep my eyes open to-day, and see if I come across any opportunities that under ordinary circumstances I should let slip."

Half an hour later Mrs. Beach was in the nursery with the washerwoman, who had come for the clothes.

"I wish, Mrs. Simms," said she, as she heaped the soiled linen into the basket, "that you would get Tommy's aprons ready for me by Wednesday; we are going out of town to remain until Saturday, and I shall want a good supply on hand for such a careless little scamp as he is."

"Well, I'll try, ma'am," said the washerwoman. "I've got behindhand a good deal since Sammy got the whooping-cough; but now he is better, I must try and make up for lost time."

"Has he had the whooping-cough? Poor little fellow. How old is he?" questioned the lady.

"He was three last April, ma'am."

"And Tom is four," mused the lady. "Look here, Mrs. Simms, won't you just open the lower drawer of that bureau, and take out those four green worsted dresses in the corner? Tom's outgrown them, you see, since last winter, but they're almost as good as new. Now, if you want them for little Sammy, they'll do nicely without altering, I think."

"Want them, Mrs. Beach!" answered the washerwoman, with tears starting into her dim eyes, "I haven't any words to thank you, or tell you what a treasure they'll be. Why, they will keep the little fellow as warm as toast all winter."

"Well, I'll place them on the top of the clothes," said the lady, smiling to herself, as she thought, "My eyes have been open once to-day."

Not long afterward Mrs. Beach was on her way to market (for she was a notable housekeeper), when she met a boy who had lived a short time in her family the year before, to do errands, wait on the door, etc. He was a bright, good-hearted, merry-faced boy, and had been a great favorite with the family, and Mrs. Beach had become interested in him; but this morning she was in quite a hurry, and would have passed the child with a cordial but hasty "How are you, Joseph, my boy? Do come and see us," had it not struck her that Joseph's face did not bear its usual happy expression. She paused as the memory of last night's sermon flashed through her mind, and she asked, "Is any thing the matter with you, Joseph?"

The boy looked up a moment, with a half-confiding expression, into the lady's face; the latter triumphed. "Mr. Anderson's moved out of town," he said, pushing back his worn, but neatly brushed cap from his hair; "so I've lost my place, and little Mary's sick; and that makes it very bad just now."

"So it does," answered Mrs. Beach, her sympathies warmly enlisted; "but never mind, Joseph; I remember, only night before last, my brother said he should want a new errand-boy, in a few days, for his store, and he'd give a good one two dollars a week. Now, I'll see him to-day, and get the situation for you, if you like."

The boy's white face brightened: "O! I should be so glad of it, Mrs. Beach."

"And see here, Joseph, I'm going to market, and perhaps I can find something nice for little Mary." The lady remembered that Joseph's mother, though a poor seamstress, was a very proud woman, and felt that this would be a delicate way of presenting her gift.

So she found some delicate pears and grapes, and a nice chicken to make some broth for Mary, who, as she learned, was ill with a fever, before she proceeded to do her own marketing. But it was a pity that the lady did not see Joseph, as he sprang into the chamber where little Mary lay wearily moaning on her bed, while her mother sat busily stitching in one corner, and held up the chicken and the fruit, crying, "Good news! good news! I've got all these nice things for Mary, and a place at two dollars a week!"

O! how little Mary's hot fingers closed over the bunches of white grapes, while the sewing dropped from her mother's fingers, as the tears ran down her cheeks.

It was evening, and Mrs. Beach sat in the library, absorbed in some new book, when she heard her husband's step in the hall. Though the morning had been so pleasant, the afternoon was cloudy, and the day had gone down in a low, sullen, penetrating rain.

Now Mrs. Beach loved her husband with the love of a true wife, but he was not a demonstrative man, and the first beauty and poetry of their married life had settled down into a bare, every-day, matter-of-fact existence. But her heart was warm to-night—warm with the good deeds of the day, and remembering her resolution of the morning, she threw down her book and ran down stairs.

"Henry, dear," said the soft voice of his wife, "has the rain wet you at all? Let me take off your coat for you."

"Thank you, Mary, I don't believe I'm anywise injured, but you may help me, just for the pleasure of it;" and he stood still, while she removed the heavy coat, with all the softness of touch and movement which belongs to a woman. She hung it up, and then the husband drew her to his heart with all the old lover tenderness.

"You are very thoughtful of me, Mary, my wife," he said.

And there was music in Mrs. Beach's heart as she went up stairs—music set to the words, "Eyes open! eyes open!"—Exchange.

WHAT a folly it is to dread the thought of throwing away life at once, and yet have no regard to throwing it away piecemeal.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

THAT WOODPILE.

COMING home from school one day, says a gentleman, a large pile of wood lay before our little back door. "There's work for you, Billy," said Ned Blake, the boy who was with me. "Your father had better do as my father does, hire a man to get it in; it is too much for a boy, mother says, and it will take the whole of Wednesday afternoon: you will have no time for play. Now, Bill, I would not do that, I tell you."

This was the substance of Ned's talk as we stood before the wood-pile, and the more he said, the higher it grew; by the time he left me I began to think myself a poorly used boy indeed. "There is work for you, Willie," said mother, as I sidled into the kitchen; "did you mind that beautiful wood at the gate as you came in?"

"I reckon I did," I muttered to myself, but said nothing aloud, only asking how father did. He was sick and had been for many months, and the family funds I knew were becoming low.

"It is a monstrous pile," I at length said, getting a glimpse at it from the window.

"So much the better for us, Willie," said mother, cheerfully; "a long winter is before us, you know."

Dinner was soon ready; the table was spread in the little kitchen, and father was helped out from an adjoining room by his two little daughters, one on each side. Father and mother sat down to our frugal meal with thankful hearts, I am sure; the girls chatted as usual, while I sat brooding over that "awful pile." I am afraid my chief dish was a dish of pouts. Father asked me several questions, but I took no part in the pleasant table talk. "Well, my boy," said father, after dinner, "there's that wood to be got in: no school this afternoon, so you have time enough; you had better do it the first thing."

"It will take the whole afternoon," I said coldly; "the boys are going nutting." I was not sure of this, but anything in the way of an objection to the wood.

My father said nothing. Dear, dear father; God forgive me for wounding his feelings. "Mother," I said, following her out into the pantry, "Ned Blake's father hires his wood drawn; his mother thinks it is too much for a boy to do. Why don't father hire?"

"Ah," said my mother, sadly, "the Blakes are very differently off from us; your poor father"—tears came into her eyes, she stopped. Mary ran in where we were, and I, half ashamed of myself, escaped out the back door. Still Ned Blake's words rankled in me, and I thought it was too bad; nor did the brisk west wind blow off the fumes of the foolish grumbling, which made a coward of me. I sat down on the wood-block with my hands in my pockets, and shuffled my feet among the chips in sour discontent. "It is such a monstrous woodpile," I said to myself a dozen times. Presently out came mother. I jumped up.

"Willie," she said, cheerfully, "I would take right hold of the work now—you will soon set it in."

"It is so monstrous, mother," I said, in a self-pitying tone; "it will take me for ever, and half kill me into the bargain."

"Forever is a long, long while," she said; "come, let us look at the pile. It is big, but all you have to do is to take a stick at a time; that won't hurt you, Willie, I am sure: only one stick at a time, yet one stick at a time will make that pile vanish quicker than you think for, Willie. Try it now."

There was a kindness yet decision in my mother's tones which were irresistible. She could put even hard things, or what we thought hard, in a very achievable light. "Only one stick at a time," I cried, jumping up and following her; really the pile seemed already to lessen under this new mode of attack. "Only one stick at a time;" that seemed easy enough. "Only one stick at a time." What was the need of a man to do that? "One stick at a time:" if Ned Blake could not do that, he was a poor tool. Ah, and a poor tool he proved to be, but my mother had got my mettle up, and I boldly went to work.

"Father," said I, bolting into the house at a later hour in the afternoon, all in a glow, "father, please tell me what time it is?"

"Whew! I shouted, "and the pile is mastered." Never did I feel such a strong and joyous sense of the power of doing. Finding mother, "Mother," I said, putting my arms around her neck, "I was a naughty boy, but 'one stick at a time' has cured me."

I did not then know the full value of the lesson I had learned. Years of labor have since tested and amply proved its value. When your work looks insurmountable, and you seem to have no heart to take hold of it—as work many a time will—remember it is only one stick at a time, and go at it.

SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y. in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures." The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE OBJECT of this paper is to promulgate the truth of "Life only in Christ;" or, a future life and a resurrection from the dead are both conditional, and only bestowed at the Second Advent of Christ, "at the last day."—See our Motto.

THE VOICE OF WITNESSES.

"O, CHRISTIANS! do you know that your Lord is coming? In such an hour as ye think not, the Man who once hung quivering on Calvary will descend in glory; 'the head that once was crowned with thorns' will soon be crowned with a diadem of brilliant jewels. I do look for his pre-millennial advent, and expect he will come here again."—Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"The second advent of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ is copiously spoken of in the Holy Scriptures. And no wonder; for it is the crowning subject of all, toward which every intermediate subject tends. It is the final chorus, in which all the harmony of prophecy combines. It is the ocean into which all the streams of Revelation empty themselves as their great home. Sin and misery till he comes; righteousness and happiness at his coming; groanings and agony till he comes; songs of triumph at his coming! Faint glimmerings of hope, amidst surrounding and prevailing darkness, and desolation, and despair, till he comes; everlasting light, and life, and joy, and love at his coming! These are the cadences which continually fall upon our ear from the sacred harp."—Rev. Hugh M'Neile, D. D.

"The time is fast running out; and soon He that shall come, will come and will not tarry. And then, no longer will the darkness contend with the light, no longer will the struggle seem to be doubtful, or the throne of the universe to be in obeyance; no longer will heavenly truth throw out its scattered and broken beams upon our sin smitten earth; but out of the midst of the fearful convulsion and tremendous storm, with flame of devouring fire, shall the sun of righteousness arise in mid-splendor, with healing under its wings, and bless our creation to its remotest bound, with his everlasting and unclouded light."—Rev. C. J. Goodhart, M. A.

"In the birth-week of creation, the outlines of God's providence in redemption are set before us. In six days these lower heavens and earth were made, and on the seventh God rested from his works. So for near six thousand years, the mystery of redemption is carried on, till at length, on the sounding of the seventh angel, the mystery of God shall be finished, and the Millennial Sabbath shall complete and hallow the new creation of God."—Rev. T. R. Birks, M. A.

"This day, then, is at hand. The judgment of the righteous . . . is now very near. The time of judgment may come before, in the ordinary course of nature, the younger among us might die. Never could it be so emphatically said as now, 'Stablish your hearts, for the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. Behold the Judge standeth before the door.' Live, then, in constant contemplation of this coming judgment. Act in the constant view of its solemn decisions. Dread, above all dread, being unprepared to meet your God. Desire, above all desire, to be ready for the coming of the Son of man."—Rev. E. Bickersteth.

"At this present closing crisis of the world, alike in the evidence of prophecy, in the signs of the times, in the general agitation of Christendom, and in the increased and increasing expectancy of Him by his people, the Saviour's voice seems to be heard, distinct and clear as perhaps never before, 'Surely I come quickly.'"—Rev. E. B. Elliott, A. M.

"When faith's backward gaze on the bright obscure of Calvary is clear and strong, then hope's prospective glance penetrates into heaven itself with animating anticipations of the day when He shall 'rend the heavens and come down.' . . . Even now there is a sound of his chariot wheels upon the mountains. He is on his way back to rescue his weary bride from the conflict."—Rev. B. Philpot, M. A.

"We watch; for we know of no interval between us and the Lord's appearing. The hour of our meeting with him, and with those whom we have loved and lost, may be nigh at hand."—Rev. H. Bonar, D. D.

"We are led from all signs to infer that the meeting-place of all the lines of God's providential work on earth is very near. Paganism is breaking up all over the East. Mahommedanism is in its death struggle, in vain attempting to avert its waning. Popery is artificially propped up, and preparing to take its exodus to eternal night. . . . We stand on the margin of two ages; we hear the dying moan of one, and catch from afar, the awakening anthem of the other."—Rev. J. Cumming, D. D.

"O, glorious Messiah! Soon wilt thou again appear, 'without sin unto salvation,' and present to the Father a church 'without spot or blemish, or any such thing!'"—Rev. A. A. Bonar.

"This, I conceive, is the next great event that we are to look for. So far as I can discern, no further signs are to be expected; as it seems to me we have entered into that last period of awful expectation, during which the church is likened unto ten virgins."—W. Cunningham, Esq.

"And can we see and feel these awful signs of the times crowding around us, and never hear the whisperings of a yet more awful voice that seems to break, more and more distinctly every day, on the attentive ear: 'Behold, the Bridegroom is coming! Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour when he will come!'"—Rev. H. White, A. M.

"Who, that is alive, may not live to see that awful time arrive, in one universal and instantaneous burst of astonishment! Therefore, 'seeing that we look for such things, what manner of persons ought we to be, in all holy conversation and godliness!'—and how diligent ought we to be, that we may be found of him in peace, without spot and blameless!"—Rev. J. Scott.

Rev. John King Lord said on his deathbed, "Tell the church to hold on till Christ comes."

THE COMFORTING MESSAGE.

BY WM. H. SPENCER.

ONE of the most striking scenes presented in the New Testament is a small group of despised men gathered upon Mount Olivet. A dark and deep cloud of sorrow had overshadowed the little company during the entombment of the Messiah, and the wicked world around, after having brought all this sadness upon them, now rejoiced over their sorrow. And who, thus situated, would not have been sad? Their constant companion, their faithful counsellor, and their only comfort and joy—one for whom they had forsaken all and followed—had been ruthlessly torn from them by cruel hands, borne as a criminal to the judgment hall, and finally crucified, leaving them like sheep without a shepherd, wanderers amid his enemies. But doubtless in their loneliness and sorrow the words of their dearest friend had often rung in their hearts—"A little while and ye shall see me again."—John xvi. 16. But "they knew not the Scripture, that he must rise again from the dead."—John xx. 9.

The manifestation of Jesus to his disciples, revealing himself to them as risen from the dead, and unfolding to them the glorious truth of the resurrection of his people, were matters of thrilling interest to them. On one occasion when they were assembled in an upper chamber in Jerusalem, with closed doors, for fear of the Jews, how their hearts must have leaped for joy when unexpectedly Jesus appeared in their midst as he that was dead, but was now alive forevermore! How every particle of unbelief regarding his identity must have vanished when he told doubting Thomas to thrust his hand into His side, where he had been pierced on the cross, and be no longer faithless! What divine light, what joy and understanding must have been imparted to them during the forty days that the Messiah had remained with them as the risen Christ, "speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God."—Acts i. 3.

But at last the time came for Christ's ascension, and he met the little company of disciples on Mount Olivet. Doubtless when he appeared in their presence their hearts expanded with glad anticipations of the promised kingdom, and they asked him anxiously, "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" This thought was uppermost in their minds, though he had instructed them of his departure to sit at the right hand of the Father, until his coming at the last day as the heir to David's throne, and but poorly comprehending this they now confidently looked upon him then as come to be the long promised king. And how it must have thrilled their hearts with sad disappointment when he told them that they were "not to know the times and seasons which the Father had put in his own power," but they should yet be witnesses for him in the uttermost parts of the world.

But while he is yet talking to them, behold a cloud receives him from their sight; hides the Bright and Morning Star from their gaze—the Shepherd who had bound up their wounded hearts—their counsellor—their leader—their light and Prince of Life. Looking steadfastly toward heaven they try to penetrate the cruel vail that hides him from their view, and get one more glimpse of the desire of their hearts and the one altogether lovely. But they look in vain. He is borne away by angel bands, and is welcomed in heaven by the joyful acclamation of all the heavenly hosts, who sang a new song unto the Lamb that was slain.—Rev. v. 9.

But Jesus would not leave them comfortless. While they looked steadfastly toward heaven as he went up, behold two men stood by them, clothed in white apparel. Oh listen to their good news—the glad tidings with which they comfort the hearts of the disappointed and saddened disciples! "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus, which is taken up from you in heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven."—Acts i. 11. O what good news! Is not that a comforting message to you, dear reader? It comforted their hearts; does it comfort yours?

This same Jesus shall so come again "in like manner." How much this is like Jesus' own words! "If I go away I will come again and receive you unto myself."—John xiv. 2, 3. "I will not leave you comfortless. I will come again; . . . because I live ye shall live also."—John xiv. 18. Truly, this is a comforting message that Christ will come again to deliver his people and receive them unto himself. Paul says: "For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord, that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord shall not prevent them which are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first. Then we which are alive and remain, shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air; and so shall we ever be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words."—1 Thess. iv. 16–18.

Dear reader, I long to see this Jesus arrayed in his glory as king, and join with the redeemed church in singing—

"'Tis the very same Jesus
That the Jews crucified,"

THE CREEDS.

DEAR SIR,—Being a nominal member of the Church of England, I have had the curiosity to examine her creeds, articles, and services, with relation to the subject of life and immortality only in Christ, and have been not a little surprised at the result. I find that natural immortality is not once set forth as a doctrine or even recognized in the prayer book, for "I believe in the life of the world to come," surely refers only to believers, being classed in the creeds with "The Communion of Saints," and "The forgiveness of sins." "Immortality" only occurs three times, once applied to God himself, and twice prayed for as a blessing. "Everlasting life" is prayed for twenty-eight times, and in article vii. is declared to be offered to mankind by Christ. "Eternal life" is prayed for six times. "Life," declared to be the portion of believers, thirteen times. "Death," is mentioned as the doom of the wicked in eight passages. "Everlasting death" once (in the catechism). Jesus is said to "destroy" and "overcome" the works of the devil and death. "Destruction" also occurs three times. "Destroys both soul and body" once. "Die eternally" once. "Perish everlastingly" once. "Damnation" is mentioned once. "Everlasting damnation" once. "Everlasting fire" occurs twice. "Unquenchable fire" once. "Fire" once. The last three expressions in direct quotations from Scripture. "Eternal torment" occurs nowhere. The teaching of the Established Church seems, from all that I can gather, wonderfully scriptural on these points, but I have not seen the fact mentioned in any work on the controversy; would it not be well for you, or one of your able writers, to call attention to it in the Rainbow; it might relieve the minds of some persons, and at least remove the unjust stigma of heterodoxy from any church members holding those views. Whether the compilers of the prayer book purposely left out the doctrines of natural immortality and eternal torment from the creeds and articles I have not the learning to know, but it seems a strange omission if these are to be regarded as articles of the faith of our church.

Believe me, Sir,

Yours in the Lord Jesus, A. Y.

THE NATURE OF DEATH:

OR, THE TRUE MEANING OF THE TERM, DEATH.

EDMUND LAW, Lord Bishop of Carlisle, in his work, "Considerations on the Theory of Religion," published in 1774, treating of death, speaks as follows:

It will be necessary to attend to the true meaning of the word death, as it is strictly and properly applied in Scripture: and this may be best seen, by looking back to the remarkable passage where it is first used, in that denunciation which brought Adam and his posterity under it; and where we must suppose it used in all the plainness, and propriety of speech imaginable. And accordingly, we find the original here, as full and emphatical as words can make it. They are translated, Thou shalt surely—but might with more propriety have been rendered, Thou shalt utterly die. Which one would think sufficiently explained in the sentence passed on our first parents; where they are reminded of their original, and of that state to which this change should reduce them. In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. Now what do we imagine they could possibly understand by this, but a resumption of that natural life or conscious being, which their Creator had been lately pleased to bestow upon them? the forfeiting which must necessarily include a total loss of all those benefits, that then did, or ever could proceed from him. This surely, and nothing less, must be implied in that most solemn sentence: nor can we well conceive the unhappy subjects of it, to have been at that time so very ingenious, as to explain it away, by distinguishing upon the several component parts of their constitution; and concluding, that by death no more was intended, than only a separation of these parts, while one of them was still living in some different manner; or that it was a continuation of their consciousness, and real existence, in some other place. No: this was the philosophy of after ages: concerning which, all I shall say at present is, that some of its most eminent patrons cannot help observing, that they don't find it in the Scriptures.* These, in their obvious meaning, represent the whole man, individual, person, or being; as included in the sentence addressed to him; nor do they seem to take notice of any other circumstance in the case, beside that, so often mentioned, of his returning to the dust, or ground from whence he was taken:† and might not the first pair as well expect, that the same breath of life, which the Lord God had breathed into their nostrils; whereby man became a living soul; should still survive the execution of that sentence; or that the dust itself should praise God; as that any kind of knowledge of, or communication with him, should continue in that state of darkness, and destruction, to which they were then doomed?

* Tillotson, Vol. II., fol. Serm. 100.—This is very tenderly expressed; and the reason that great author gives for it, not unsuitable to the prejudices of his time: whereas if he had considered the point more fully, I presume, he would have found the Scripture, not taking this natural immortality for granted; but rather laying down the contrary; and the New Testament everywhere insisting on it, as the very ground of the whole Christian covenant; through which alone, we attain to immortality, or everlasting life. In order to form a better judgment of this, we must examine the Scripture language more particularly; and see what all those several terms, and phrases may imply in the original, which are supposed to include the doctrine above mentioned.

† Gen. iii. 23.—"As the threatening was only in general, Thou shalt die; and it does not appear by the history, that man had any notice given him of spiritual death (or the necessity of sinning), nor of eternal death (i. e., a necessity and eternity of torment), so it would seem surprising, if it had not been often said by some men (which was never yet proved by any), that death, natural, spiritual, and eternal, was threatened.—Jeffery, Select. Disc., p. 22. "When Adam was told that if he offended he should die, he could not then understand by death a future punishment after Death, but rather an annihilation of his soul, and a dissolution of his body, and a returning to the same insensibility from which he had been called into being."—Fortin, Serm. Vol. VII., p. 283.

THOUGHTS ON THE RESURRECTION.

BY T. HENDRYX.

"As in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive."—1 Cor. xv. 22.

THE theme in this chapter is the resurrection of the dead; not of all, but of the dead in Christ. I am aware that many beside Universalists believe that this chapter, especially the text, proves the resurrection of all men; but after examining and re-examining repeatedly, for the last forty-nine years, I can see no grounds for such conclusions. I can see no proof in this chapter that the wicked will ever come up at all. I am told that the ALL includes as much in the latter clause of the text as in the former; but I think not. The whole family of man were in the fall—were in Adam; but all men are not in Christ. "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature."—2 Cor. v. 17. We look at the scope of Paul's reasoning. He first asserts and proves the resurrection of Christ, verses 4–16; and—that being the centre and foundation of the Christian's hope—argues from it their resurrection, showing the falsity of their hopes and of the apostles preaching if Christ is not raised, verses 13–18. To make this argument effective he must needs show some connection between Christ and those who are to be resurrected by him. This he does by bringing to his aid the doctrine of the first-fruits, verses 20–23. The first-fruits were sacredly offered to God.—See Ex. xxii. 29. They were like the rest of the crop, being part of the same; and that which was offered was a foretaste, and its acceptance a sort of assurance or guarantee for the balance of the crop; "for if the first-fruit be holy, the lump is also holy."—Rom. xi. 16. Hence, he says, "Now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first-fruits of them that slept."—Verse 20.

We now notice the order of the resurrection, verses 23, 24. "Every man in his own order. Christ the first-fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming." Then cometh (not the wicked, but) the end, or, according to Macknight, "then the end shall be." No place yet for the wicked to come up. Again: I ask, as in verse 35, if the wicked are included, "with what body do they come?" Paul says of the body of those, "It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption; it is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory; it is sown in weakness, it is raised in power; it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body; for this corruptible must put on incorruption; and this mortal must put on immortality; then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory. O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory? Thanks be to God which giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ."—Verses 42–57. The saints are included in this language: but are are the wicked? Will they have spiritual, immortal bodies? Will they come up shouting, "O death, where is thy sting—O grave, where is thy victory?" and, "thanks be to God which giveth us the victory?"

Again he says: "As IN Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." Now we inquire, How do all die in Adam? Manifestly by being in him in the transgression and the fall—in him as our federal head. There is a sense in which we may be said to be, and act in him; the exact modus operandi, I do not pretend to comprehend, but I submit to the word. See text, and Rom. v. 15–19. I cannot comprehend how Levi paid tithes to his great-grandfather; yet I submit to the word which says, "Levi . . . paid tithes in Abraham; for he was in the loins of his father when Melchizedec met him."—Heb. vii. 9, 10. All are in Adam, then; and all die in him; but, are the impenitent in Christ? are they new creatures? What relation do the rejectors of Christ sustain to him? If any, I can't see it. But the righteous are created in him.—Eph. ii. 10; 2 Cor. v. 17; Eph. iv. 24; are made nigh by the blood of Christ.—Eph. ii. 13. As all (that are) in Adam die in him, EVEN SO (on the same principle) all (that are) IN Christ shall be made alive. The saints sustain a peculiar relation to Christ: they are members of his body, of his flesh and of his bone; are in his body; are espoused to him as bride.—See Eph. v. 30; i. 22, 23; iv. 15, 16; Col. i. 18; ii. 19; Matt. ix. 15; Mark, ii. 19; Rev. xxi. 2, 9. The righteous are connected with Christ in his sufferings and death.—Rom. viii. 17; 2 Cor. i. 7; Phil. i. 29; 2 Tim. ii. 11, 12; 1 Pet. iv. 13; Rom. vi. 3–5; are in him in his offering and intercession. "Surely he hath borne our griefs," etc.—Isa. liii. 4, 5.

Compare the type. When the high priest entered the holy place with blood to offer for the people, he wore a breast-plate, in which were inserted twelve precious stones, each representing one of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel. He bore them on his heart when he offered the blood and made intercession.—See Ex. xxviii. 29: read the whole chapter. Thus the high priest made atonement for all Jews, and for none else. (These were carnal or national Jews). Christ atones for all (spiritual Jews, or true) Jews. For, "he is not a Jew which is one outwardly; neither is circumcision that which is outward in the flesh; but he is a Jew which is one inwardly."—Rom. ii. 28, 29. Christ atones for none else. The idea that Christ made atonement for unborn sinners eighteen hundred years ago, is a mischievous error. The Jewish atonement was not made at the door of the tabernacle, when the victim was slain, but in the holy place within the vail.—See Lev. xvi. Christ did not make atonement on the cross, but IS NOW accomplishing that work in heaven itself. Heb. ix. 12, 24: "NOW TO APPEAR IN THE PRESENCE OF GOD FOR US;" and when he has finished that work he will leave the place and the mediatorial garments, and assume the judgment robe and throne.

The objector asks, How can you preach to sinners if there is no atonement for them? I answer, by pursuing gospel order; convince them that they are sinners and need salvation; and that without the shedding of blood there is no remission. Then invite them to Christ. When they accept Christ, they become "Jews," and Christ pleads his own blood for them. The Gentile became interested in the Levitical atonement by submitting to the law of circumcision. So the sinner now becomes interested in the atonement of Christ by submitting to Christ's law of circumcision.

I remark again: The saints are in Christ in his resurrection.—See text and Rom. vi. 5; Luke xx. 36; Rom. iv. 25.

Reader, are you a Christian? Do you heartily believe on, love and obey the Lord Jesus Christ? If so, you love his word and his people, and can lift up your heads and rejoice as the evidence of his second advent being near, "even at the door," multiplies and grows stronger and stronger. Bear the scorn and reproach of the world, then, patiently, and soon your fondest hopes will be realized.

WEBSTER CITY, IOWA, Sept. 1, 1870.

THE SOLEMN WARNING.

CHURCH of the living God! hast thou heard the voice which spoke from heaven, "Surely, I come quickly?" And hast thou responded to it gladly, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus?" Does his absence now lie heavily upon thy spirit? Does the promise of his return cheer thee? And is the thought of his speedy coming a most welcome hope in these days, when men's hearts are failing them for fear? Then how is this prospect operating? Is it full of quickening, animating, stimulating power? Is it increasing the intensity of your earnestness? Is it making the separation between you and the world a more decided thing? Is it imparting a deeper solemnity to your deportment, and attaching an unutterable importance to every word and action? Is it rebuking idleness, and sloth, and vanity, and frivolity, and levity, and selfishness? Has it uprooted and destroyed in you covetousness and worldliness, those two master-sins of the evil age? And has it made you liberal and generous, enlarging your heart to give,—to give with no sparing hand so long as the time remaineth? Ah, brethren in Christ, we are surely far behind! The religion of the day is a poor, second-rate, ineffective thing! We are dreaming when we should be working; we are pleasing self and indulging the flesh when we should be serving the Lord. We are indolent and yielding when we should be energetic and indomitable. We are shrinking and fastidious when we should be resolute and hardy. We sit idly in our tents, with weapons sheathed and banners folded, when we should be in the thickest of the fight, for the world's last conflict is begun, and the armies are mustering for the battle of the great day of God Almighty.

And you, ye men of the earth, whose portion is not among the things unseen, have you heard the voice that speaks to YOU from heaven,—"Fear God, and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come?" Has the warning pierced your ears and broken your mad security? How long do you count it safe to remain unreconciled? And what short of reconciliation with God will avail you in the day when he ariseth to shake terribly the earth? And when is he to arise? Have you ascertained the time, that you sit so easy and unalarmed? The long pent-up winds are beginning to break loose; and the tempest's sudden outburst is the precursor of the world's last desolating storm.

Are you ready? Are you hidden in the clefts of that rock to which no weapon, no storm, no fire can reach? He alone is safe who has reached the hiding-place; and that hiding-place stands with its unfolded gates ready to receive you now. Will you enter? Or will you remain without? Remain without, and perish in the fiery storm!—"For every battle of the warrior is with confused noise and garments rolled in blood, but this shall be with burning and fuel of fire." It is now in these last days, as in the days of Noah. God's purpose of vengeance has been declared, the warning has come, and the judgment is making haste to follow. But the ark is still open, and the preacher of righteousness beckons you in. For one hundred and twenty years Noah preached, but the unheeding world heard him not. Then he entered the ark, and, for seven days, he remained there before the deluge came, and standing at the open door of the ark he delivered God's last message of grace, entreating men to come in. It seems as if we were now in the period corresponding to these seven last days,—proclaiming God's last loving message to long-resisting man! For what, then, are ye waiting? Are you lingering in hope that the millenial day will softly steal in upon the world, and that then you will be converted with all the rest? Alas for you! Do you not know that between you and that glory there lies a region as dark as midnight, and strewed with terrors such as earth has not yet witnessed? Why, then, do you wait without? There is room enough within, and will you not go in and occupy it? There is love enough, and will you not go in and taste it? There is blessedness enough, and will you not go in and enjoy it? It will cost you nothing; and you are welcome! The Father bids you welcome; and the Son bids you welcome; and the Spirit bids you welcome; and angels bid you welcome; and every saved one bids you welcome; and with so many welcomes will you still hesitate or delay?

BY JAMES H. JACOBS.

While at work, to-day, in my meditation I thought of the judgments. Is it right to say, judgments? I am told it means two or more. If so, has there been any judgments in the past? If not, can it be demonstrated that there will be any in the future? Out here, where I live, men preach loud and long on the judgment to come; but make no account of what God has done in the past. It looks to me that if there has not been some judgments in the past that are eternal, and will not be done over again, there can be no use of preaching one to come that will be eternal. If there has not been any judgment in the past, then we have no evidence there will be any to come.

I will now give what to me is good evidence that there has been judgments of God in the past, and which, in their nature, cannot be revoked. In Gen. xviii. 25, we read, "Shall not the Judge of the earth do right?" The question was asked, if he would destroy the righteous with the wicked. A queer question, if God had not, and would not destroy any of the wicked till after Christ should come the second time. Read Gen. xix. 13, 14, 24, 25. Now, does this look as if the Judge had done right? If so, will he bring them up from that destruction to another? My answer is, No. If he should, would it not show that the Judge of all the earth did not do right? It is said in Gen. vi. 7, the Lord said, he would destroy man from the face of the earth. We believe that; but when will he do it so that it will be right? Will it be after Christ returns from heaven? We think not. Read Gen. vi. 13, 14: then read Gen. vii. 21. Now does it not look as though it was in the past? If so, has the Judge of all the earth done right? Then, so let it be. Look in Exodus vi. 6. What does God say that he will do? "I will redeem you with great judgments." Did he do it? Without giving all the evidence that he did, read Exodus xiv. 27, 28, and Psalm cxxxvi. 10–20. In all this, did the Judge of all the earth do right? If so, then the language of the prophet is made plain in Isaiah xxvi. 14. "Thou (God, the judge of all the earth) has visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish." So much so, that they cannot live, they cannot rise, or have a resurrection, not even in or by Christ; for God, by his Spirit, in Heb. ii. 2, hath said that, "Every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward." When? At the time when God, the Judge of all the earth, visited and destroyed them. Can any man show from the Bible that more can be added to them and have it just? If there ever was an age in the past where transgressors have received a just reccompence, can those be brought into another age, by the Son of God, to have life, to suffer, be visited and destroyed again, and have it just? We think not. Let any man show or prove that in no age have any transgressors received their punishment, and a just one too, and that God did not do right when he judged Sodom, before they preach through, in, or by Jesus a universal life from the dead, so that sinners can receive the wages of sin, which is death.

Br. Storrs: My second article, published in the Herald of last week, was not read before the Bible Class until last Sunday. As I wrote you, several were out of town, one Sunday, that I wished should hear it; and the next was stormy, and so few out that we had no Bible Class. I felt very quiet about the delay, knowing that a convenient season would come some time, and that time was last Sunday. We had a gentleman to preach who will probably be chosen pastor. He is very talented and eloquent, and drew a full house. I never saw so many at Bible Class before. The room was full. The Methodist minister was there, and at least three of the University Professors. After a little talk over the lesson for the day, Mr. Leiper announced that he had another letter to the class from "Truth Seeker," and asked what should be done with it? Deacon Smith immediately moved that it be read, and it was read by the same young lady who read the previous communication. (The Deacon seemed to think it ought to be read by the writer; but she couldn't see it in that light). The result is, that the class is to investigate anew the Bible doctrine of future punishment; and I presume there will be a beginning made next Sunday. One gentleman suggested to the ladies, that as these communications had come from their side of the house, one of their number should take them and make some reply.

I have wished sometimes that I could be near enough to you to run in occasionally and get a word of counsel and help. But as it is, my sole dependence must be on the Lord. The truth seems to me clearer than ever, lately, and I feel so anxious that others should see it as I do. E. H. P.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 14, 1870.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Herald of Life.

Two numbers more close volume vii. The first of October opens with volume viii. Our mail books must be arranged by that time; and all persons who have not renewed their subscriptions for the new volume are desired to do so during this month: do not delay.

A few persons have received the whole of the present volume and paid nothing; others have paid only in part. All of these must now make a remittance, or expect to find their papers discontinued. We shall be as lenient as possible to old paying subscribers, but hope they will remit for the next volume as early as possible.

European Affairs.

The foreign news is contradictory on many points. It seems, however, that the King of Prussia finds himself in a dilemma. He made proclamation, at the outset, that his war was not against France, but against the Bonapartes. He has captured that "wild beast," and has him shut up; but he does not know what to do with France, which has proclaimed itself a Republic. This seems to displease the King of Prussia, as he doubtless sees in it a ghost to upset all other kings and emperors, and spread republicanism over Europe. What is to be done now remains to be seen. Rome shakes, and the Pope is in a slippery place.

Inherent Immortality.

The doctrine of the immortality of the soul of man, in a separate state of being from the body, lies at the foundation of the various systems of theology that, at the present day, are taught in the schools, and in the nominally Christian church. This assertion needs no proof; as no one who is in the least acquainted with the nature of the subject and with the facts in the case, will presume to deny it. Indeed, so closely is this doctrine interwoven with the different creeds of the church, and so essential an element is it in their very foundation, that they cannot be separated, and with it they must stand or fall.

But notwithstanding this is so, and therefore the minds of many may be shocked at anything like a denial of this, their darling and fundamental dogma, we shall prove, both from reason and the word of God, that the sentiment or doctrine that the soul of man survives the body at death, and continues to exist in a conscious state of happiness or misery is utterly false and of mischievous tendency.

"Infidelity!" cries the sectarian bigot, "he denies a future state of reward and punishment." Well, before we have done, we will show that the very fact that the immortality of the soul is regarded as indispensably necessary to a future state of conscious being, proves the doctrine to be mischievous in its effect, inasmuch as it bases all hope of eternal life and blessedness upon a false foundation.

The gospel that was preached by Christ and his apostles does not make the hope of the Christian to depend, for its consummation, upon death and the soul's immortality, but upon the resurrection of the dead. In Luke xx. 37, 38, our Lord says, "Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush, when he called the Lord the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. For he is not a God of the dead, but of the living." Here we are taught by him who cannot lie, that inasmuch as the Lord is the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and yet he is the God of the living and not of the dead, those ancient patriarchs named, who were dead, must live again. The declaration of the Lord that he was their God, proved their resurrection. But if their souls were then in conscious existence, was he not their God even without their resurrection? Most certainly. But as without this resurrection he could not be their God, it follows that they were not then in conscious existence.

Again in John vi. 39, Christ declares, "And this is the Father's will who hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up again at the last day." And in Luke xiv. 14, he says, "thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." Thus taught our Lord Jesus Christ, and whoever teaches a contrary doctrine is antichrist. The apostles also, in all their teaching, made the second coming of our Lord Jesus Christ and the resurrection of the just, the grand theme—the only blessed hope. To the Athenian philosophers Paul seemed a setter forth of strange gods, because he preached unto them Jesus and resurrection: and in the fifteenth chapter of his first epistle to the Corinthians, he declares plainly that if the dead rise not, then they that have fallen asleep in Christ were perished. But if the soul be immortal, how does it follow that the sleeping saints were perished, even though the dead should not rise? Certainly they are not perished if in a state of consciousness and bliss. Therefore the only hope for the child of God is the coming of the Lord and the resurrection: and whoever teaches that the soul of the believer enters into a state of heavenly blessedness at death, preaches another doctrine.

Thus we see that the theology of the schools and of the professing church, and the teachings of Christ and his apostles, are directly opposed to each other. The gospel of Christ bases the hope of the church upon the sure foundation of Jesus and the resurrection, while scholastic theology places it upon the fable of the immortality of the soul, or, a spiritual entity that survives in death and is the essential personality. As the teaching of this other gospel is calculated to make the hope of the true gospel regarded as of no consequence, or at most of but secondary importance, and to lessen in the mind the value and importance of the true foundation or object of the believer's faith and hope, its natural and necessary tendency and results are evil and evil only. Therefore the doctrine is false. Let then the gospel taught by Christ and his apostles stand in all its original purity and glory; while the false and pernicious gospel of a fancied heaven at death, "beyond the bounds of time and space," (!) falls to the ground.

But it is said, that, if the human soul be not immortal, man is no better than a beast. To this we answer that there is just as much superiority in a living man above a living beast, as there is a greater degree of the likeness of God and no more. The mental faculties of man are superior to those of the brute; but this does not prove his immortality any more than the superiority of the mind of the dog to that of the snail proves the immortality of the dog. But as it regards a dead man, it is true that he is no better than a beast. And to this agrees the word of God. See Eccl. iii. 19, "For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth so dieth the other, yea, they all have one breath, so that a man hath no pre-eminence above a beast." Again, Eccl. ix. 5, "For the living know that they shall die; but the dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten." Thus by the word of God it is proved that a dead man is no better than a dead beast; and that without the resurrection there is no reward after death. But inasmuch as the sleeping saints shall rise again to eternal life and glory, God is not ashamed to be called their God. "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him." Even so, means in the same manner. There is no other way.

How false and foolish are the notions of those who imagine that to the Christian,

"Death is the gate to endless joy,
And dying is but going home."

How absurd and ridiculously horrible the description given by Watts of a soul descending to its place of eternal torment, after ascending to be judged!

"Then swift and dreadful she descends
Down to the fiery coast,
Among abominable fiends,
Herself a frighted ghost."

Such is the trash that has been palmed upon the people in the name of Christianity. Thus have even the sheep of Christ's fold been led astray and fed with spiritual poison. And, as a consequence, how often have weeping friends stood around the bed of the dying, and, as soon as the last agony and the last gasp were over, have exclaimed, "He knows more than all of us now:" whereas the word of God positively declares, "The dead know not anything." Nothing is more clearly taught in the holy scriptures than the entire unconsciousness of the dead; and that a future state of existence depends, not in part, but altogether, upon the resurrection.

It is asked if the Bible does not say that at death the spirit returns to God who gave it? It does, but what is the spirit? Certain it is, the spirit is not the soul; for Paul declares, in Heb. iv. 12, that the word of God divides asunder soul and spirit. And in 1 Thess. v. 23, he says, "I pray God your spirit and soul and body be preserved blameless." So then, if the spirit be immortal, that does not prove the immortality of the soul any more than of the body. The Hebrew word is ruach, the Greek pnuema. Both are rendered by translation, air, wind, breath, or spirit; and, as applied to man, mean the principle or power of life. In Gen. ii. 7, we read "The Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostril the breath of life, and man became a living soul." Surely this does not teach us that man was made in two distinct parts, and then joined together. Nor does it teach that a part only of man was formed of the dust. It was man—the whole man; though until the principle or power of life was imparted from God he was not a living man. As a beautiful and glorious piece of machinery, complete in all its parts, he needed only the motive power to put this perfect mechanism in action, thus constituting him a moving, sentient, reflecting, acting being—in short, a living soul. Such he became, when the life-giving God breathed into his nostrils the ruach, or spirit of life. And when the dust returns to dust, that principle or power is withdrawn, and thus returns to God. The whole fabric called man is, therefore, "of the earth, earthy," and became a living soul by having the principle of life imparted from God, by means of the breath inhaled from the surrounding atmosphere. The life is in the blood, which is kept in action by the breath, and from which life, motion, and the power of thought, are imparted to the brain and nervous system and to all the various organs of the human frame, thus producing all the phenomena of life, both mental and physical. And it is this alone that constitutes man a living soul. Consequently, when the breath or spirit is withdrawn, he ceases to be a living soul. Then every thing appertaining to man is resolved into its original condition and element. The body returns to dust, the spirit or principle of life returns to God who gave it, and as the soul, that is, animal life, cannot exist without the presence and life-giving power of the spirit, it is extinguished, like the flame of a candle. Therefore, if there be no resurrection, there is no future life.

Our Present Duty.

Every learner in the school of Christ, it is presumed, knows by experience that truth is never obtained all at once. We grow in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, step by step: our progress is "from faith to faith." It does not burst suddenly upon us in all the brightness of its glory, but, like the rising of the sun in a misty morning, it is faintly seen at first, and then little by little it dispels the darkness of ignorance and the mist of prejudice, and grows brighter and brighter to our vision as it rides triumphantly upward despite the storms of opposition, shedding the hallowed influence of its beauteous light over mind and heart.

Some suppose they are converted to truth when they have a knowledge of it. This is not quite true. When we come to a knowledge of any item of truth and yield it our support; when, through it, we read more clearly the lesson of omnipotent love, and are impressed with brighter and better conceptions of God and His whole administration; when, because of this, love to God and His dear Son and to our fellow-men wells up in the heart and flows out in deeds of godliness, then we are converted to it. And so the experience of all lovers of truth is a series of concessions. Their path is "as a bright and shining light, which shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

As with growth in the knowledge of gospel truth, so with the development of holiness, growth in grace. The Christian warfare is an unceasing struggle. The conflict is between the Spirit and the flesh. If the Spirit triumphs we become spiritual minded; if the flesh triumphs we are carnal or fleshly minded; and Paul says: "To be carnally minded is death; but to be spiritually minded is life and peace."—Rom. viii. 6. Our enemy, then, is not one that we must feel after and grapple in the dark; but it is self. Hence our most important work is to overcome self, to bring the carnal into subjection to the spiritual. This, however, is not the work of a moment; and he who flatters himself that he has so far perfected it as to be beyond danger is in a perilous position indeed. To destroy, then, the relish which the natural mind has for earthly and sinful things, and to cultivate a relish for spiritual and holy things, must be the Christian's aim, and in pursuing this object he is abundantly assisted by the Spirit of God.

Many who possess little more than the foundation stones of gospel truth have, by the Spirit's aid, achieved signal and blessed victory over self. This is undeniable, and just here appears the design of these remarks for they are directed, mainly, to those unto whom God has revealed much of divine truth. The unquestionable nature of gospel truth is to make us better acquainted with God's character and administration. The more we experience this acquaintance the more should we love Him and His dear Son, and all the workmanship of His hands; and the more should we love the truth as the medium by which we attain unto this more perfect knowledge of God. If our love is thus incited we will seek, above all things, to deport ourselves with such a degree of consistency that so far from bringing any reproach upon God's cause, that of truth and righteousness, we will strive to magnify our office and recommend both truth and religion by showing forth, through godly lives, the power of truth and the beauty of holiness. Some, there is reason to fear, who have this love burning, somewhat, upon the altar of their heart, fail to attain to the practice of consistent godliness simply through misapprehension. They desire to secure a perfect victory, but they overlook certain valuable aids which God places within the reach of all. They depend so much upon the sanctifying power of truth, that they neglect the proper use of that other and indispensable arm of service in the Christian warfare, the assistance of the Spirit. Forgetting, or, perhaps, failing to recognize that mere theoretical knowledge of truth avails little, they make small progress in that "saving knowledge of the truth" which can only be acquired through the co-operating influence of the Spirit. Truth imposes responsibility just in proportion as it is known, and if they to whom God has revealed much of truth fail to develop more perfect holiness of character than less enlightened ones, they are brought into condemnation, since their opportunities for growth in grace are better.

What, then, is the manifest duty of all to whom God has dispensed truth with liberal hand? Twofold: first, by the united aid of it and the Spirit, to secure such a victory over self that their whole life will afford unquestionable proof of the love-inspiring power of truth; and, secondly, to diligently proclaim it unto others. And it will be of little use to attempt the latter until the former is duly observed. The undertaking would be altogether likely to repel from truth the very ones sought to be won to it and to Christ. As no man can be a successful preacher of righteousness if he be not an example of godliness, so no one can be a profitable teacher of truth unless he is a living witness of its power.

Lovers of truth cannot overestimate the importance of striving to bring their will into subjection to the divine will. If this be not done, we are like a bird with crippled wings, fluttering about hither and thither, producing commotion, but making no progress. We will be very liable, too, to both run before we are sent and hold back when we ought to go forward. Neither will we exercise that charity which "suffereth long, and is kind . . . is not easily provoked, thinketh no evil." If we go to a man with some choice morsel of gospel truth and ask of him its incorporation into his faith and, upon our failure to satisfy him that it is truth, we grow impatient, unkind and denounce him as a wilful lover of error, we have for the time permitted the carnal to triumph. We have done the very thing we would not have done if we loved the truth with "a pure heart fervently," and had kept the fleshly nature in subjection; for then would we humbly and kindly present the truth in the love of it and leave the result with God. To be harsh and uncharitable toward those we seek to enlighten is to afford overwhelming proof that we have not entirely "put off the old man with his deeds;" that he still exercises authority.

One important query for us, who have been so signally blessed with unfoldings of truth, to individually answer is, are we, as a class, as much more faithful than surrounding christians as we ought to be, in view of our greater gospel light? If we are not, how can we be held guiltless? The Lord will surely require it of us. Many eyes are upon us, and all inconsistences, or short comings, of whatever nature, that may be noticed in us will be charged to so much of the truth we advocate as happens to be unpopular and not understood. Hence we should prayerfully strive to give "no offence in anything, that the" truth "be not blamed:" but in all things approve ourselves as servants of our absent Lord. Approve ourselves by "pureness, by knowledge, by longsuffering, by kindness, by love unfeigned, by the word of truth:" nay, we should approve ourselves by the putting on of the whole "armor of righteousness on the right hand and on the left."

We are a praying people. We pray a great deal in public, and it is not likely that we do any too much of it, provided we do it heartily; but it is even more necessary to individually engage in daily examination of self in order to ascertain our weaknesses and needs, and then enter the "closet" and there nestle close to the throne of grace, laying out all our heart's desires with an earnestness, a simplicity, fidelity and trust that will seldom indeed be reached except under a consciousness that we are alone with God. It is there we may meet the Lord face to face, so to speak, and talk with Him as a child talks with his father, and the communion will be blessed. It is there we may see, as it were, the angels of God ascending and descending, bearing precious burdens of heavenly blessings to strengthen our faith and love and to enable us to overcome. If we are faithful in these things the truth will indeed "have free course and be glorified." Then we shall be as living fountains from which shall flow forth continual streams of those precious things with which God, in His boundless love, does bless them that put their trust in Him, and who are willing, in all humility, to sit at Jesus' feet and learn of him who having great power was yet humble, possessing all knowledge was yet meek and lowly of heart. God help us all so to do. L. C. T.

The Rich Man and Lazarus.

The case of the Rich Man and Lazarus, Luke xvi., is urged as proof of a soul-survivance, in consciousness, when men are dead. Some contending that this Scripture is a real history, while others admit it to be a parable; but they say, "parables are taken from something that has been or may be." Before we have done with it, however, we shall show that such is not always the case.

Those who maintain that it is a literal relation, have no less difficulty in explaining it than their opponents: they cannot explain it all literally, and yet they are bound to do so to be consistent. Let them make the attempt. Lazarus, covered with sores, died and was carried into Abraham's bosom. Will they pretend that is literal? O, no, say they, it was Lazarus' soul! But our Lord says, Lazarus was carried into Abraham's bosom. Our opponents have to say—"Not so, Lord—it was his soul:" thus, they contradict our Lord to establish their "own traditions." Let us see whether they succeed any better with their real history of the rich man. He died. What became of him? He "was buried:" the rich man was buried, remember. What next? "In [hades, the grave, of course, where he was buried; improperly translated] hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torments, and seeth Abraham afar off and Lazarus in his bosom," etc. The rich man did this. They say—It was his soul: but our Lord says, it was the rich man. Thus again they make void the words of Christ to establish their traditions, if our Lord did really give a "literal history." But for the sake of showing the folly of their tradition about the soul, we will suppose it was Lazarus' and the rich man's souls or spirits, disembodied, that are in hades. We now ask—Are their disembodied souls or spirits material or immaterial? That is, are they matter, or not matter? We are answered—"They are immaterial." If so, they have no substance! Can that which has no substance be seen or touched? If not, the "literal history" advocates have an immaterial rich man, with immaterial eyes, looking afar off and seeing immaterial Lazarus, or no-substance Lazarus! Truly, these immaterial souls must have sharp eyes to see nothing! and an equally sharp understanding to know that it is Lazarus! But that is not all. The immaterial rich man desires that immaterial Lazarus should dip his immaterial finger in literal water and cool his immaterial tongue! And all this is "literal history!" We have not placed the subject in this absurd light with any other view than merely to show the "literal history" advocates that they are, at least, as much involved in difficulty in explaining this Scripture as we, who believe it to be a parable, and that it has no reference to man's state in a future life.

That it is a parable, the context shows. I is in a group of them, viz., the lost piece o silver—the lost sheep—the prodigal son, an the wasteful or "unjust steward," with an admonition against serving mammon, or riches. The Pharisees, who were covetous, heard all these things, and they derided him. Our Lord then proceeds in his discourse with special reference to the change about to take place in the dispensations. He says—"The law and the prophets were [preached] until John; since that time the Kingdom of God is preached," etc.

We state it as a principle, that no parable is to be used as teaching doctrine not elsewhere explicitly revealed. Parables are used only to illustrate some truth already known, or partially so, or to prepare the way to present a truth not yet fully developed, but about to be, either by facts or explicit instruction. The scope or design of the parable is what we are to seek, and not pervert the truth of God by the assumption that the parable is a reality that "has been or may be:" nor, yet, that every item in it was ever designed to have an application to the subject it was intended to illustrate. By such assumptions discredit has been thrown on revelation, the truth of God has been converted into food for the most fanatical, and men have turned to "cunningly devised fables." If any doubt whether parables are not sometimes purely fictitious, let them read the parable of the eagle's cropping the cedar, Ezk. xvii. 1–10; the parable of the "ewe lamb," 2 Saml. xii. 1–7; and the parable of the trees choosing a king, Judges ix. 7–15.

If it be replied that, "Jesus would not use fictitious characters and circumstances in his parables;" we answer, that JEHOVAH, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, has done it, and why not His Son? See the parable we have just referred to, Ezk. xvii. "The word of the LORD came unto me, saying, Son of man, put forth a riddle, and speak a parable unto the house of Israel; and say, Thus saith the LORD GOD—A great eagle . . . came unto Lebanon, and took the highest branch of the cedar . . . and carried it to a land of traffic; he set it in a city of merchants:" [say, for example, in the city of New York! Think you the eagle would be likely to prosper in such a literal work? But we proceed.] "He"—the eagle—"took of the seed of the land and planted it in a fruitful field; he placed it by great waters, and set it as a willow tree: and it grew, and became a spreading vine of low stature, whose branches turned toward him," [the eagle. These branches must have had "souls," doubtless, that were intelligent thinkers, to turn toward the eagle that planted the seed! But, let us see.] "There was also another great eagle . . . and behold, this vine did bend her roots toward him, and shot forth her branches toward him," etc. Thus the same vine works for both eagles, with all the intelligence of a most intellectual being. Does any one believe this is a literal history of the action of two eagles and a vine? or, that such a thing "has literally been, or may be?" No one can doubt but that it is purely fictitious. If JEHOVAH thus instructs men, shall we affirm his Son does not? Of like character do we regard the parable of the Rich man and Lazarus, because the positive testimony of Scripture is, that "there is no knowledge in sheol," the state of the dead; and that "in death there is no remembrance of God."—See Eccl. ix. 10, and Psa. vi. 5.

It is said the rich man must be conscious, for he sees, feels and talks. We reply—It was common among the Hebrews to represent things without life as knowing, feeling and conversing: see Gen. iv. 10; Hab. ii. 11; Isa. xiv. 8; Psa. xciii. 3; Prov. viii. 1–3; Prov. ix. 1–5, etc. Our Lord, then, was in no danger of being understood, in this parable, as teaching the consciousness of dead men, and especially, as the Hebrew Scriptures expressly taught, "the dead praise not the Lord"—that "their thoughts perish in the very day" they die—that, "the dead know not any thing"—and that, "there is no knowledge in sheol," where dead men go: and further, inasmuch as Jesus uses the expression in Greek, to show the state of the rich man after death, that exactly corresponds with the Hebrew sheol, viz., hades, he could be understood in no other way than as using a fabulous discourse—like that to which we have previously referred in the Old Testament—to illustrate an unpalatable subject to his deriding hearers.

[To be concluded next week.]

"For All Live unto Him."

BY JACOB GRIM.

The question is asked, What are we to understand by the above words?

1. Who are the "all," that live unto God?
2. When do they live unto God?
3. How do they live unto God?

In order to understand these three questions, it will be necessary to inquire into the language that called forth the declaration of Jesus, "For" they "all live unto him."

That some believe these words to refer to an intermediate state, we are well aware; and that others refer them to an entity, in man, that lives during the sleeping state of the christian between death and the resurrection. Now, in order to understand the full meaning of these words, we want the whole narrative before us, and the question asked of Jesus.

A woman is represented as having died having had, in her life time according to the law of Moses, seven husbands in succession; all natural brethren. The question is a plain and simple one. As though they would say to him, Master, we understand you to teach the doctrine that these men, and this woman are all coming back again from the dead. "Therefore, in the resurrection, whose wife of them is she? for seven had her to wife." Mark has it, "In the resurrection, therefore, when they shall rise, whose wife shall she be of them?" The question is not asked, Whose entity shall her entity be, in the entity land? or, whose soul shall be the possessor of her soul, in the land of souls? But the question is a plain and simple one; and we believe the Master confined himself to the simple question asked, viz., In the resurrection, when all these persons rise from the dead, whose wife will this woman be? The Saddncees thought they had asked a question which, from their stand-point, was unanswerable; they supposed that Jesus was teaching that all, without regard to character, were coming up in the resurrection; and the old laws of Moses were going to be carried into the age to come; and we may suppose they argued on this wise, "now we have Him: Moses taught in the law that one man should have one woman; now how will he reconcile the lot of this woman with the seven husbands?"

Jesus removes the whole difficulty with one expression, "Ye do err not knowing the scriptures nor the power of God. The children of this world marry and are given in marriage. But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage: neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are children of God being the children of the resurrection. Now (to prove) that the dead are raised, (not that they are awake now, in some form, and alive in entity, but that the dead are raised), Moses showed at the bush, when he called the Lord the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. For he is not the God of the dead, (which he would be if the dead rise not), but of the living."

The question is not, Do men live in the intermediate state? it is not, Are men concious now? But "that the dead are raied, Moses showed at the bush." Now if any intelligent person can inform me how, if Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are now alive in entity, or spirit, or soul land, it proved a resurrection from the dead, I should like to know it. But if we consider the promise of God to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, that they, individually and personally, for themselves, should have the land of promise, though they died, and are now dead; then if they remained dead, they would fail to realize the fulfilment of the promise of God, "I will give to thee, Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and thy seed after thee, the land for an everlasting inheritance." Paul says, in Heb. xi. 13, "These all died in faith, not having received the promises."

Now, I hear the objector say, Is he not then the God of the dead, if these persons are not alive? and did not Moses say, He is not "the God of the dead, but of the living; for all live unto him." Stop my friend: not too fast. The question is not concerning the present condition of the dead; but that the now present dead do or will rise somewhere in the future from the time when Jesus uttered the words, and the condition or status of the dead when made alive. Now we are ready for our questions, What is the meaning of the questions growing out of the saying, "For all live unto God."

1. Who are the "all" that live unto God? We answer, All that rise from the dead. For, "they that are accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection of the dead, are the children of God." Hence, all in the resurrection live unto him; and, therefore, there are no wicked in the resurrection.

2. The second question is answered in the first, when do they live unto God? We answer, the time fixed is made plain by our Saviour, when he says, Moses showed the resurrection at the bush; therefore, the time is fixed, in the resurrection they all live unto God; and not in the intermediate state.

3. How do they all live unto God? We answer, in the language of our Saviour, "They that are accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry nor are given in marriage, (according to the Sadduceean notions), and they have neither animal passions, nor will of their own to gratify; but are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection; and hence live not to gratify themselves, as you suppose, but they all live unto God, and fulfil his pleasures, and not their own desires.

Hence, we would read the text, "Now that the dead are raised, even Moses showed at the bush, when he called the Lord the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. For he is not the God of the dead," (as you suppose they are not going to rise again); but He intends raising them up again; and in the resurrection, when they are raised from the dead, (for he is the God of these living ones) all live unto him, then, and not unto themselves, as you suppose, and therefore ask the question, "In the resurrection whose wife shall she be?"

From W. H. H. McAllister.

BR. STORRS: It is rather late to do so, but I wish to say to the friends I met at Springfield, and from whom I parted on the eve of Saturday, Aug. 27, that through the favor of a kind heavenly Father, I arrived home safely Sunday morning at 7 o'clock. I found that the Lord had kept in safety the dear ones at home. How good it is to feel that we can look to God for protection and be sure that He will grant it.

Well, we have met at Springfield for the last time, as an organization. As this intelligence goes abroad, there will be, no doubt, much surprise and some disappointment; but on mature consideration I am sure all will think it for the best that the separation should take place. It should rejoice all hearts that this took place as amicably as that of Abraham and Lot of old. And now we have the whole country to choose from, and I have no doubt that the committee chosen to select our place of meeting will judge wisely in locating our future annual gathering. Our people in Vermont were better accommodated at Springfield than they will be at any place which will probably be selected. Those in the immediate vicinity of Springfield, who have attended our anniversaries for the last seven years, may be compelled to travel a little further or forego the pleasure; but we that have been favored must remember that there are others who have been denied the privileges in the past; and they should have their chance now.

I did not receive as great spiritual benefit from the meeting this year as heretofore, for the reason that so much of our time was taken up with business. All that I did was to attend to my official duties; and when our business meetings had closed, I was completely exhausted. We have labored under one great difficulty on the Springfield Campground in being compelled to sandwich our meeting in between those at the main stand. It will be vastly better to have ground over which we have full control hereafter, where we can arrange all these things according to our requirements.

In summing up the results of the meeting, I think we have taken a long step in the right direction; and I have returned home with determination to labor with renewed zeal, and live more consecratedly to God. Pray for me, brethren and sisters, that I may be "faithful unto death," that I with you may receive the "crown of life."

Yours for the truth.

ST. ALBANS, VT., Sept. 9, 1870.

From Eld. Samuel L. Walter.

BR. STORRS: My health is good for one whose clock is about to strike three-score and eleven. I am crippled in my left arm. I had one bone broken, and my wrist dislocated; so that I cannot work, and so painful that I had to give up preaching. I am in hopes to commence again soon. I shall leave home as soon as possible. I think of going to Clyde and see about the HERALD OF LIFE, for I want it to live till the LIFE-GIVER shall come, and show who only shall have life from the dead. Its light is needed in this day of fables.

There is not much light to be had from the popular preaching on any Bible doctrine. The preachers do not seem to understand what is meant by "so great salvation." They represent it to be any and everything but that deliverance that perishing man needs. God's great "salvation," not salvation*s;* no: it saves from perishing in death; and no returning to dust. No: but "deliverance from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God." One of them, a minister of the Methodist E. church, with whom I was talking about the saint's inheritance, and when I quoted the words of Jesus, "The meek shall inherit the earth," replied, "That they do." I replied, I had seen many of the meek ones in poverty and the poorhouse. "Yes," said he, "A hungry dog is always meek." How I pitied him, and those he taught.

I heard a lecture on Dan. ii. 44. The kings referred to were Babylon, Media, Persia, and Grecian kings. Rome he left out, and denied that the ten toes symbolize the divisions of the fourth kingdom; but said that John the Baptist and the Saviour set up "the kingdom of God" in their day. If that is so, we ought all to stop praying the Lord's prayer. I can't see "the kingdom" yet; so I shall still pray "Thy kingdom come," etc., until I see the "Nobleman return, having received the kingdom," and made his servants "rulers over ten cities, etc.

I have been preaching to a few souls about the nature of the resurrection, that it was literal, as Job said, "In my flesh shall I see God." A minister, arguing against a literal resurrection, produced the following as proof. "A certain minister died and was buried at the foot of an apple tree, and the root went down into the coffin, entered the dead man, and ran through the whole body, absorbed the whole of it; and forsooth the apples were a part of the minister's body; and the good people that ate the apples were a part of the minister." He asked, "How could his identical body be raised, since it formed part of so many bodies?" Another advanced the idea that the whole earth was far too small to make bodies for so great a number. So with their vain philosophy they try to make void the truth of God; they forget that the Saviour fed thousands with five loaves and two fishes. God will not be thwarted in his purposes. His word shall accomplish that whereunto it was sent. I say with Paul, "Let God be true." He has but to "speak, and it shall be done."

I worship every seventh day with the Seventh-day brethren, about three miles from this place, and also on Tuesday evening. We have good meetings. The Lord makes one in our midst. I do love Christian fellowship, and long for the communion of saints, where names are lost sight of.

I received a letter from Keenville, where I was last winter. There are some strong men in the faith of No life out of Christ there, who will do battle for the truth. They wish to know whether I am coming there, and when? I shall go whichever way the Lord may direct. I have got to have a little help for my wife. She must live, and will, when we do right in the Lord's sight. I have no doubt of that. Father has promised, "Thy bread shall be given, and thy water made sure." He will not withhold any "good thing from them that walk uprightly."

I see that Br. S. J. Branson has subscribed for the HERALD OF LIFE. I expect you will get four or more from Keenville for Vol. viii. Br. S. J. Branson says that he is to have a debate on the immortality of the soul; and one who has been a Methodist preacher affirms. Br. B. has the negative. I have no fear for the issue. Br. B. is at home in God's book, and will hold him to it, and give him, Thus saith the Lord.

I send you the name of a new subscriber; she is about 76 years old. Her husband 82 years. They lived in Indiana, near Dr. Fields. They came out in the '43 movement. They believe man is mortal, and no immortality out of Christ; and Sister Bishop has gone a step further, "No life out of Christ." They are both looking for the Lord's coming soon.

If the wicked dead are to be made alive to die again, well may they ask,

"Why from silent earth,
Didst thou awake, and curse me into birth?
Tear me from quiet, ravish me from night,
And make a thankless present of the light?
Push into being a reverse of thee,
And animate a clod with misery?"

Here is a question that neither heaven nor earth, time nor eternity can ever solve, if the theory of dying twice be true.

Adam had a moral nature, or purity, which his Maker gave him, with power and knowledge how to retain and develop a pure moral nature in harmony with God, so that he would have, eventually, become equal to the angels, deathless—hence spiritual.

Query. Is not every child born without any moral defilement, because it has not sinned? It is sin which defileth; hence, how true the declaration of the Saviour, "Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Query. The Saviour, or second Adam, did retain the purity of his moral nature; hence it is said, "He was tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin," or without yielding; so he was pure and undefiled and separate or free from sin; had nothing to repent of. He told the Jews, Except they repented and became as little children, they could not enter the kingdom of heaven. I infer from what the Saviour has said about children, they will enter into God's kingdom; for, or because, "of such is the kingdom of heaven." I may be wrong, but I think and hope not. Our Father will do right, so that none will ever murmur, and that very soon. We may lift up our heads and rejoice, for the Lord will come quickly. Amen: even so, come Lord Jesus.

Yours, in hope of life.

From Dr. John Billings.

BR. STORRS: I wish to say through the HERALD, to the brethren, that Br. Henry Perkins leaves my house this morning for the East. Brethren will, after this, write him at STETSON, Maine. He is better: his health has improved since he came here. Our trust has been in God and such remedies as he has given us, with which we are to help one another, when poor mortality is giving way under the powerful enemy that is cutting down God's children. The time is at hand when its work will be done, and then we will rejoice and say, Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ. That victory will be complete and eternal.

One word to the saints, scattered abroad. Don't get excited about the war. Remember that it is faith in God, that works by love, purifies the heart and overcomes the world, that will give us admittance into the everlasting kingdom of God; and not faith in any war struggle. We must have that union with God that makes us one, war or no war. We have seen many brethren that would be very good when some war-cloud hung over the world, and as soon as it was gone, their faith was gone.

Brethren let us examine ourselves, and see whether this is the kind of faith we have. If so, in the name of God, I entreat you to get rid of it, and occupy a position that we can say, from the heart, Not my will, but thine be done. Don't murmur at God's delays with us; for he says, As many as he loves, he will rebuke and chasten; and then exhorts us to be zealous and repent. Now, let us be patient under the chastening hand of God, and seek complete resignation to his will under all circumstances.

NEW RUTLAND, ILL, August 22, 1870.

From Helen Robertson.

BR. STORRS: Camp-meeting is over, and the children gone to their homes. I, being very tired, remained in Springfield at Br. Hastings, and visited a few days. Left on Friday, and came to Meriden to see Br. and Sister Campbell in their deep affliction.

The brethren and sisters, in the "Life Tent" especially, missed them this year, and no doubt want to know how it is with them. They have been through a long and severe affliction, Br. C. unconsciously suffering, and Sister C. untiringly watching and administering to his every want by night and by day. He was recovering nicely, until about three weeks ago he slipped, in some way, which caused the ligaments to be torn from the knee-pan. The doctor said he would much rather have come and found a bone broken, than this sad accident. The doctor said it would keep him on his back four more weeks. Three of the weeks are past, and he is hoping to be up again soon. He is weak and nervous, and feels all broken to pieces, as he often expresses himself. He sends love to the brethren and sisters, and earnestly desires an interest in their prayers. Sister Campbell, also, desires to be remembered in much love to all. She feels that the children of God have been praying for her, and the Lord has strengthened and held her up in a wonderful manner. It seems to me marvellous that she is living after what she has gone through. For the material aid sent her she blesses the Lord and thanks the ones who have sent. Amongst others, they affectionately remember Br. E. Wolcott's timely remembrance of them, and pray that that dear brother's life may be spared, so he can witness the glorious advent of the King of kings; also to be a blessing and support to his dear family. Yet with regard to everything and every one we pray in submission, saying, Not our will, but thine be done, our Father in heaven.

Br. C. has a great desire to get home to New Britain; and Sister C. hopes to be able to take him home before long.

I expect to leave here to-morrow, and intend stopping to see Br. and Sr. Percy, at Rowayton, who have been, and still are, in great affliction.

MERIDEN, CONN., Sept. 4, 1870.

From E. D. Adams.

DEAR EDITOR: I am anxious to have the HERALD OF LIFE live, and pledge to send five dollars for my next year's subscription, in a few weeks. It is truly a medium of great light in a dark world, and I hope we shall not be deprived of your experience and mind to guide the HERALD until the Lord comes.

It is true that all the readers of the paper in the West are not a unit with you on all topics. But I hope it is among the "all things possible with God" to save all who love the appearing of the "King of the Jews," and the re-establishment of Israel's kingdom.

Our heavenly Father knows full well why we do not see eye to eye in interpreting his word; and his mercy is so large, and endureth so long, I feel willing to trust him to judge us.

Some of my "faith, repentance, and immersion in water," brethren, can hardly fellowship me on account of my "too great liberality," and non-resurrection of the unjust, etc. views, which are sometimes called "Storrsism." So it seems hard to please all professing to be God's children and God at the same time. If I were to withdraw my support from all papers advocating things I do not believe, I should take none. The HERALD OF LIFE has less repulsive matter in it than any paper I read, and I should be sorry to see it die, and no prospect of having another as good.

I intend to fight the good fight as well as I can, if I have to walk alone; and confidently believe it will be but a short time before the worthy ones will receive their crowns.

Yours, hoping to be saved in the kingdom.

CEDAR FALLS, IOWA, Aug. 14, 1870.

From Mrs. E. G. Farmer.

BR. STORRS: I have often been led to contemplate the hope of those that love Jesus. We hope for many things in this life and get disappointed; but, O, the hope of being raised from the dead is a hope founded upon a rock, both sure and steadfast, and reaches to that within the vail where Christ our high priest has entered once for all; and, thank the good Lord of life and glory, he will never fail us if we endure as good soldiers to the end. I thank God I have that hope, that when our LIFE-GIVER shall come, whether I sleep or wake, I shall be made like him; for his promise never fails.

Bless the Lord for such a hope, and such blessed promises. The Bible is full of them. I feel to grow stronger and stronger in the Life views, that the wicked will remain in the congregation of the dead; they shall utterly perish; they shall consume away; no hope; all is lost. O what a thought to contemplate! Never live again! God help us to shun that awful doom. O for more love to God and more love for each other.

The dear HERALD I prize next to my Bible. I feel to thank the Lord I ever read it; it does me so much good to hear what the brethren and sisters are doing in different parts of the land. The different tracts I have had have been a great help to understand my Bible. God bless you, Br. Storrs, and give you strength to continue in the good work. May we all watch and pray, and wait until the Master comes; and if he should tarry, we will patiently wait for the Lord. Yes, yes, O yes, we'll patiently wait for the Lord. From your unworthy sister, waiting for the LIFE-GIVER to come.

From Eld. J. Lewis.

BR. STORRS: I cannot promise much help for the HERALD OF LIFE, being poor and unable to work much; but my daily prayer is that the HERALD may live to see the end of the bloody strife going on in Europe; and that it may be filled full of wisdom, so as to win souls to Christ and let it not forget to visit the old one armed man.

Brethren and sisters, stand firm and hope to the end, for we shall soon gain the port. God has arisen to shake terribly the earth (the old Roman empire). The scarlet colored beast and the false prophet are about going into a lake of fire, (the great battle of God Almighty), and will be consumed; for He will smite the (Roman) earth with the rod of His mouth, and with the breath of His lips will He slay the wicked. Let me say, it is my opinion the battle of Armageddon is begun. See Rev. xvi; see also Jer. xxv. 15 to the end; likewise Rev. xviii. 17–21. What a day to those out of Christ. Let me exhort such to flee to the stronghold (Jesus), while there is hope. Let the saints lift up their heads, for our redemption draweth nigh.

LA FAYETTE NORRIS, Campton, Iowa, writes under date of Aug. 30: Two weeks ago last Sabbath I gave a public discourse three miles north-west of Manchester; and, in four weeks from that time, I shall give another, if Providence permit. My text was, "If a man die shall he live again?" I endeavored to show that man does die, and that the righteous will live again: and lastly, that the wicked will not live again. I had an attentive audience, and they desired me to come again. I distributed a number of tracts. This is in Br. Ayers' neighborhood, and it was by his invitation that I went there. My discourse was the first that most of the hearers had heard on the non-resurrection of the wicked dead. I do not expect much to result from my public speaking, but I am in hopes the tracts will do good. I can say, truly, I feel a stronger desire than ever to press my way onward in the good cause.

My love to all the brothers and sisters who read the HERALD.

OBITUARY.—Died, Aug. 7, 1870, HARRIET D., youngest daughter of La Fayette and Harriet E. NORRIS, aged eight months and eleven days.

S. S. CALL, Hesper, Iowa, writes: The good word of Life only through Christ, and the resurrection of them who are Christ's at his coming; and the non-resurrection of the wicked dead, are established facts with many, even more than I supposed. The seed sown has taken root and brought forth fruit, in spite of the desperate efforts made to root it up. Love to all the brethren.

Envy.

And gorged the flesh of vipers for her food.
Minerva, loathing, turned away her eye.
The hideous monster, rising heavily,
Came stalking forward with a sullen pace,
And left her mangled offals on the place.
Soon as she saw the goddess gay and bright,
She fetched a groan at such a cheerful sight.
Livid and meagre were her looks, her eye
In foul distorted glances turned awry:
A hoard of gall her inward parts possessed,
And spread a greenness o'er her cankered breast;
Her teeth were brown with rust, and from her tongue
In dangling drops the stringy poison hung.
She never smiles, but when the wretched weep;
Nor lulls her malice with a moment's sleep:
Restless in spite: while watchful to destroy,
She pines and sickens at another's joy:
Foe to herself, distressing and distressed,
She bears her own tormentor in her breast.

The Burning of the Earth: Will it be Literal?

BY W. FORD.

"But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in the which the heavens will pass away with a great noise, and the elements will melt with fervent heat, the earth, also; and the works that are therein shall be burned up."—2 Peter i. 13.

That the earth is to exist throughout the ceaseless ages of eternity, and in the future unfold the power and glory of God, no one will deny who is acquainted with the Bible's teaching concerning it.

In our examination of this important text, we will confine ourself to the only rule by which men can ever arrive at a correct understanding of the Bible, that is to let scripture interpret scripture. By so doing we hope to arrive at a correct understanding of the text under consideration, and abundantly show that the Bible does not as much as intimate that the literal earth will be burned up.

That God speaks of the earth in a figurative sense, no one will deny. The first place that such an expression occurs is Gen. vi. 12. "And God looked upon the earth and behold it was corrupt." God certainly would not have us to understand that the literal earth was corrupt, but that the people whom he calls the earth were corrupt. Such seems to us to be the true sense of that passage.

The next place of importance where God uses the word earth for the people is in the covenant that he made with Noah, as recorded Gen. ix. 11. "And God said, I will establish my covenant with you, neither shall all flesh be cut off any more by the waters of a flood. Neither shall there any more be a flood to destroy the earth." No one will pretend to say that the literal earth was destroyed by the flood; and we have just as much right to contend from the literal reading of this passage that the earth was destroyed in the day of Noah by waters, as our opponent has to contend that the literal earth will be burned up from the reading of the 3d chapter of 2 Peter.

Again. "The whole earth was of one language, and of one speech."—Gen. xi. 1. "And the Lord did there confound the language of the whole earth."—Gen. xi. 9.

It would be easy to multiply such passages as these; but these are enough to show that the earth is frequently spoken of in a figurative sense. The advocates of the burning of the world became very much in favor of literal interpretations when they read 2 Peter iii. 10.

Well, says B., "Peter says the earth shall be burned up, and it is God's word, and if I can't take it just as I find it, I will have nothing to do with it." Pretty good conclusion, if you will only stick to it.

We will now give you a small trial and see if you will stick to your text. "For behold the day cometh that shall burn as an oven, and all the proud, yea, all that do wickedly shall be stubble, and the day that cometh shall burn them up, saith the Lord of Hosts, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch."—Malachi iv. 1. Now, Mr. B., what do you think of this? It seems to me that this will destroy your immortal-soul-ism. "Oh," says B., "that don't mean it will burn the wicked entirely up, and be as though they had not been." There, I thought you were only in favor of literal interpretations just as long as it would favor your theory. But we will try you a little further, and see how your theory will work. "This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof and not die."—John vi. 50. There, now, you and your theory have made Christ out nothing but literal bread. How would it look for me to contend for the literal interpretation of this? I certainly have as good right to do it, without regard to its connection, as you have to contend for the literal interpretation of 2 Peter iii. 10, without regard to its connection.

Again, 53d verse, "Then Jesus said unto them, Verily, verily I say unto you, except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." The literal interpretation of this would compel us to eat the flesh from off his bones, and drink the blood from his veins. Shall we contend that such should be the case? Surely not. We should like enquiring men—men desiring to learn the way of life—ask the Bible to tell us what Christ means by telling us that we must eat his flesh and drink his blood. By turning to Matt. xxvi. 26, 28, we find this fully explained. "And as they were eating, Jesus took bread and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples and said, Take, eat, this is my body. And he took the cup and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it, for this is my blood." Thus it will be seen that by letting scripture interpret scripture, we have ascertained just what Christ meant. Now let us try the rule upon 2 Peter iii. 10. Well Peter, you say that the elements shall melt with fervent heat. Now, Bible do pray tell us what Peter means by saying the elements shall melt with fervent heat. It seems from the Bible that the time is coming when things will get pretty hot. In order for us to understand what Peter means by the word elements it is necessary for us to call up Paul as a witness. We have his definition of the word elements in Gal. iv. 3, 9. It will be observed from Paul that part of the church at Galatia, after having been brought over to the gospel faith, was about to return to the old Jewish ceremonial law, and Paul in chapter iii. 1, exclaims, "O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you that you should not obey the truth, before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been evidently set forth crucified among you. Are ye so foolish, having begun in the Spirit are ye now made perfect by the flesh?" In chapter iv., he still goes on with his argument, and says, "Now I say, that the heir as long as he is a child differeth nothing from a servant, though he be lord of all; but is under, tutors, and governors until the time appointed of the father. Even so we, when we were children were in bondage under the elements of the world:" the elements, the Mosaic ceremonies or law. In verse 9, he adds,

"But now, after that ye have known God, or rather are known of God, how turn ye again to the weak and beggarly elements (the Jewish law) whereunto ye desire again to be in bondage." Here, then, is positive evidence that Paul uses the word elements to denote the laws that existed under the Jewish dispensation. As the word elements occurs but twice in the Bible, we are shut up to this conclusion, that Peter uses the word elements to denote the laws of the land that exist at the coming of Christ; these elements, or laws that oppress the poor and exalt the rich; all the unjust and oppressive laws that exist upon the earth at the coming of Christ, are the elements that Peter says shall melt with fervent heat; a vivid description of their entire dissolution and destruction from off the face of the earth, and the establishing of new laws that will give judgment and justice in the land, with Christ as King. Then the glorious time will have come, prophesied of by Isaiah: nothing shall exist in all my holy mountain, saith the Lord; for the earth shall be full of the glory of Lord as the waters cover the sea.—Isaiah xi. 9, and Hab. ii. 14.

After these elements have passed away, there is to be a time of universal peace, even to earth's remotest bound. Glorious time; happy thought, that the time is coming when the earth is to be full of the glory of the Lord, and all its corrupters have passed away as the dew before the morning sun.

Having plainly shown that the elements that are to melt are the existing laws, we will now try to ascertain what Peter means by saying, The heavens and the earth are now by the same word kept in store, reserved unto fire, against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men.

We will apply the same rule to this we did to the others; that is, let scripture interpret scripture. By so doing we hope to arrive at a correct conclusion of this important subject. The key to the whole lays in verse 5, where Peter says, "The heavens were of old, and the earth," and then sums it up in one sentence and calls it, "the world," and says, it "perished." Thus it is seen by the honest enquirer that the old heaven and earth, or dispensation, perished. The advocates of the literal burning of the earth, unwilling to give up their theory, try to make it appear that the word "world," as used by Peter never means earth. They are both unmindful of the fact that the first meaning of the word (world), as given by Webster, is, earth; universe; and it is so used by the prophets and apostles. "He made the worlds." Heb. i. 2. Here he speaks of the whole planetary system, and calls them worlds. "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared from the foundation of the world," or earth.—Matt. xxv. 34. "The kingdoms of this world," or earth, "have become the kingdom of our Lord."—Rev. xi. 15.

Similar passages might be multiplied, but these are enough to show to the candid that God frequently calls the earth, world; and more would not avail those who deal in mere assumptions. It is clear that the heaven and earth that Peter says perished was the age or dispensation that existed between the creation of the world and the flood. It is necessary to notice that Peter speaks of three heavens and three earths. It is also plain that from the creation of the world down to the coming of Christ there is just three dispensations; and Peter calls each dispensation a heaven and earth. The old heaven and earth, or dispensation, is perished. This heaven and earth, or dispensation, in which we live will perish just as completely as the old heaven and earth; and the new heaven and new earth, that Peter speaks of, is that new age or new dispensation that will take place after the coming of Christ, when the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. It is in the time of that new heaven that the earth shall be full of the glory of the Lord as the waters cover the sea.—Isaiah xi. 9; Hab. ii. 14. Then the time will have come when every man shall sit under his own vine and fig-tree, and none shall make him afraid.—Micah iv. 4. Then the earth will unfold the power and glory of God, and become as the garden of Eden.—Ezk. xxxvi. 34.

Thus we have examined the main texts relied upon to teach that this earth will be burned up; and we fail to find the least intimations that such will be its doom; but we find plenty of evidence that it will exist throughout the ceaseless ages of eternity, and be restored to its Edenic state, and be the final abode of all Christ's redeemed hosts; and we rejoice that the time is hastening on when these glorious promises will be realized and enjoyed by those who are earnestly contending for the faith once delivered to the saints. As each tick of the clock tells how swiftly time is passing away, it also tells the speedy return of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, when all the kingdoms of this world will be his.—Rev. xi. 15.

So Many Calls.

It was a brisk, clear evening in the latter part of December, when Mr. A. returned from his counting-house to the comforts of a bright coal fire, and warm arm-chair, in his parlor at home. He changed his heavy boots for slippers, drew around him the folds of his evening gown, and then, lounging back in the chair, looked up to the ceiling, and about, with an air of satisfaction. Still there was a cloud on his brow. What could the matter be with Mr. A.? To tell the truth, he had that afternoon received in his counting-room, the agent of one of the principal religious charities of the day, and had been warmly urged to double his last year's subscription; and the urging had been pressed by statements and arguments to which he did not know well how to reply. "People think," soliloquized he to himself, "that I am made of money, I believe. This is the fourth object this year for which I have been requested to double my subscription; and this year has been one of heavy family expenses—building and fitting up this house—carpets, curtains—no end to the new things to be bought—I really do not see how I am to give a cent more in charity. There are the bills for the girls and boys—they all say they must have twice as much now as before we came into this house. Wonder if I did right in building? And Mr. A. glanced up and down the ceiling and around on the costly furniture, and looked into the fire in silence. He was tired, harassed and drowsy; his head began to swim, and his eyes closed—he was asleep. In his sleep he thought he heard a tap at the door; he opened it, and there stood a plain, poor-looking man, who, in a voice singularly low and sweet, asked for a few moments' conversation with him. Mr. A. asked him into the parlor, and drew him a chair near the fire. The stranger looked attentively around, and then turning to Mr. A., presented him with a paper. "It is your last year's subscription to missions," said he. "You know all of the wants of that cause that can be told to you. I called to see if you had any thing more to add to it."

This was said in the same low and quiet voice as before; but, for some reason, unaccountable to himself, Mr. A. was more embarrassed by the plain, poor, unpretending man, than he had ever been in the presence of any one. It was some time before he could reply at all, and then in a hurried and embarrassed manner, he began the same excuse which had appeared so satisfactory to him the afternoon before—the hardness of the times, the difficulty of collecting money, etc.

The stranger quietly surveyed the spacious apartment, with its many elegancies and luxuries, and without any comment, took from the merchant the paper he had given, but immediately presented him with another.

"This is your subscription to the Tract Society; have you any thing to add to it? You know how much it has been doing, and how much more it desires to do, if Christians would only furnish the means. Do you not feel called upon to add something to it?"

Mr. A. was very uneasy under this appeal, but there was something in the mild manner of the stranger that restrained him; but he answered that, although he regretted it exceedingly, his circumstances were such that he could not, this year, conveniently add to any of his charities.

The stranger received back the paper without any reply, but immediately presented in its place the subscription to the Bible Society, and in a few clear, forcible words, reminded him of its well-known claims, and again requested him to add something to his donations. Mr. A. became impatient.

"Have I not said," he replied, "that I can do nothing more for any charity than I did last year? There seems to be no end to the calls upon us in these days."

The stranger took back the paper, rose, and fixing his eye on his companion, said in a voice that thrilled through his soul:

"One year ago to-night, you thought your daughter lay dying; you could not sleep for agony. Upon whom did you call that night?"

The merchant started and looked up. There seemed a change to have passed over the whole form of the visitor, whose eye was fixed upon him with a calm, intense, penetrating expression, that awed and subdued him. He drew back, covered his face and made no reply.

"Five years ago," said the stranger, "when you lay at the brink of the grave, and thought that if you died then, you should leave a family of helpless children entirely unprovided for, do you remember how you prayed? Who saved you then?"

The stranger paused for an answer, but there was a dead silence. The merchant bent forward as one entirely overcome, and rested his head on the seat before him.

The stranger drew yet nearer, and said in a still lower and more impressive tone:

"Do you remember fifteen years since that time, when you felt yourself so lost, so helpless, so hopeless; when you spent days and nights in prayer; when you thought you would give the whole world for one hour's assurance that your sins were forgiven you? Who listened to you then?"

"It was my God and Saviour!" said the merchant, with a sudden burst of remorseful feeling; "O, yes, it was he."

"And has He ever complained of being called on too often?" inquired the stranger, in a voice of reproachful sweetness; "say," he added, "are you willing to begin this night, and ask no more of him, if he, from this night will ask no more of you?"

"Oh! never, never!" said the merchant, throwing himself at his feet; but as he spake these words, the figure seemed to vanish, and he awoke, with his whole soul stirred within him.

"O my Saviour, what have I been saying? what have I been doing?" he exclaimed. "Take all, take everything! What is all that I have, to what thou hast done for me?"

[The following communication it seems was written for the "Crisis," but by some means was directed to us; possibly because the author thought it might be lost on its way, or after it reached there, if sent to that paper.—Ed. of Herald of Life.]

"Life Views."

Br Grant: In a recent No. of the "Crisis," a good Bro. (in discussing upon the "Life Views," and the certain resurrection of the of the wicked,) says "I have never seen any scripture statement that even seems to clash with, or militate against it."

Now one would suppose that the said brother could not be a very good student of the Bible; if he were not occupying an enviabl position as a Bible teacher, and a veteran soldier in the little corps of observation that is standing upon the crumbling ramparts of a world in distress, and waiting for the "Crown Prince" to appear, and assert his right to the promised inheritance. But how are we to account for this strange declaration of his? Shall we say (as we say of the whole orthodox fraternity who clamor for the senseless dogma of the soul's immortality,) that he is willingly ignorant? and is so determined to have things in his own way that he cannot see, that he will not hear? Nay, we will not judge the brother so rashly, but will relate a historic fact, as illustrative of the strange phenomenon of thought, and of the total absorption of one's mental faculties, while gazing upon a cherished object, and fancying that there is no obstacle in his line of vision.

In the State of New York, and before the introduction of railroads, the people traveled west upon the Erie Canal, and it was the duty of the steersman to warn the people, upon the deck of the boat, upon approaching a bridge, that they might stoop down and go under safely, Upon one occasion a stalwart negro was standing upon the neck, with his arms folded and gazing ahead, as if a bridge in the distance was the only thing that attracted his attention. The usual sign of approaching danger was given at the proper time, and repeated with a loud voice, "Bridge! Bridge!" but the darkey stood firm in his tracks, until the bridge struck him fair in the forehead, and laid him hors de combat, upon the deck. Rising, and rubbing his head, he exclaimed, "Go— golly, massa, why didn't you tell me the bridge was coming?"

This was indeed an extraordinary case of mental phenomenon: but how strikingly illustrative of the weakness of human nature, and of our inability, (under peculiar circumstances,) to see the most obvious things in nature.

Our dear brother says that, he has never seen any Scripture that even seems to clash with the resurrection of the wicked dead. Taking this for granted, and believing that he is standing in the same quiet and unconcerned condition that we found the negro in, we take this occasion to call his attention to the following passage of Scripture, (one in a thousand), and ask him, in all sincerity, in love, in faith, in charity; if it does not seem to "clash" with the resurrection of the wicked.—Isa. xxvi. 14. "They are dead, they shall not live: they are deceased, they shall not rise. Therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish."

Dr. Angus on Future Punishment.

In a letter inserted in the Rainbow for June last, we respectfully called upon Dr. Angus to acquaint the public with the place in the writings of Clement of Rome where he had met with a passage which he quoted as the composition of Clement, in his lately published work on "Future Punishment." We said that we had read the writings of Clement, and had not seen in them the passage in question. To our letter Dr. Angus has made no reply.

In our article, "The Fathers on Future Punishment," in the Rainbow for July, we followed up the subject. We showed our readers that the passage which Dr. Angus quoted as from Clement was not written by Clement, but by a nameless forger. This statement of ours Dr. Angus treats as he treated our letter—he makes no reply.

The conclusion we, and our readers probably, draw from Dr. Angus's silence is, that he has no defence to make. He attributed to Clement of Rome what Clement of Rome never wrote, and he now knows that he has done so. Were we only concerned with Dr. Angus himself, we would allow the matter to rest; but in the interests of truth we cannot do so.

Dr. Angus's work has a large circulation. We hear that the first edition of it, which is the only edition we have seen, has had a circulation of several thousands. It has been read, therefore, probably by thousands of readers to whom the exposure of his statement in the Rainbow is unknown. These readers are told, on the authority of Dr. Angus, that Clement of Rome, the companion of St. Paul, stated his belief in the immortality and eternal misery of the wicked, when Clement of Rome, so far from stating anything of the kind, has affirmed the contrary.

To all these readers Dr. Angus has done a wrong, which we now call upon him as an honest man to repair. We call upon him in the name of truth and religion to let the readers whom he has misled, know that he has misled them.

Remark by Ed. Her. of Life.

We long since rejected appeals to "the Fathers" as proof of that which cannot be established by the Bible alone. "Forgery" was the order of the day, when argument failed, in the early history of the church, as falsehood, misrepresentation and slander are now among such as have only traditions to bolster them up in their opposition to the truth of "Life only in Christ."

Children's Department.

A Blind Girl Feeling for a Sunbeam.

The sun has just burst out through the clouds, and a heavy golden beam comes in at our window. How bright and cheerful! It comes in so silently, yet it speaks to the heart. Thank God for sunshine! Ages on ages it has illuminated and gladdened a world, yet we hardly think of the great fountain of light and beauty.

Writing of sunshine brings to mind a touching incident which came under our observation as we were traveling in the cars. Opposite was seated a family of four, consisting of a man and his wife, and two children—boy and girl—twins, totally blind. Two lovelier children we never saw. The family were from the South. A Southern sun had given each cheek a rich olive complexion, relieved by a beautiful bloom upon the children's countenances. The boy lightly built, had finely chiseled features, and hair of a dark brown, clustering in rich curls around his neck. The girl was yet more slender, and fragile as a leaf, and of the most spiritualized beauty. Her habit was dark. Her hair was black as night, its heavy glossy tresses confined by a golden band, which glittered brightly upon the dark background. They both seemed happy, conversing with an intelligence beyond their years. The train stopped for a moment upon their route. The windows were all raised, and the children leaned out as if to see. The little girl heaved a long sigh, and then leaned back in the seat exclaiming, "O mother! I cannot see anything." A tear trembled in her eye, and her voice was so sad and low, that it went to the heart of every passenger who heard the beautiful and unfortunate creature. "Neither can I see, Belle; but I acknowledge that everything is beautiful," said her brother, as the light wind lifted the thin locks. "You are beautiful, are you not, Belle?" Just then a flood of sunshine gushed from the white clouds in the west like a flash, and fell full and warm upon the cheek of the sad girl, and upon the tears in her eyes. Quick as thought she put up her hand and attempted to grasp the golden pencils that were playing upon her neck and cheek. Eagerly she shut her hand upon vacancy, and a shadow fell upon her countenance as she failed to touch the sunshine. "Mother, I cannot feel it; has it fled out of the window?" "What, Belle?" "The sunshine, mother. It touched my cheek, but I cannot touch that." The mother's eyes swam in tears, as did those of nearly all in the cars. A blind girl feeling for a sunbeam upon her cheek! That beam was radiant with beauty, yet she could not behold it. It gleamed upon a world, yet all was night to her. Its silver bursting in the east, or its golden fading in the west, followed as day followed day; but it burst upon her vision, or faded at decline of day. It glowed in the sky, upon forest, and field, and lake, and river; but not in the blue orbs of the sightless girl. By a singular coincidence, the boy tried to feel of the breeze that came cool upon the cheek as the cars sped swiftly on. The breeze swept over the yellow fields and meadows, and still waters, and coquetted with the locks of the blind boy; but its footsteps were unseen by him. We involuntarily thanked God that we could look upon the beautiful world he has made, and dropped a tear to the hapless children who must grope their way to the grave through a long night. But the light of bliss will burst upon them. Long shall we remember the two blind children.—Selected.

A boy watched a large building as the workmen from day to day carried up bricks and mortar.

"My son," said his father, "you seem much interested in the bricklayers. Do you think of learning the trade?"

"No," he replied; "I was thinking what a little thing a brick is, and what great houses are built by laying one brick upon another."

"Very true, my son; never forget it. So it is in all great works; all your learning is but one lesson added to another. If a man could walk all around the world it would be by putting one foot before the other. Your whole life will be made up of a succession of moments. Learn from this not to despise little things. Be not discouraged by great labors. They become easy if divided into parts. You could not jump over a mountain, but step by step takes you to the other side. Do not fear, therefore, to attempt great things. Always remember that the large building rose by laying one brick upon another."—Selected.

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures." The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

FROM SAMUEL MASON.

BR. STORRS: I send you herewith a letter from the Superintendent of a Steel Works, in Pittsburg, Pa. The circumstances which led to it were these: I had given an order for an anvil to be made at the Works, and it was broken in the process of tempering. This gentleman came down from Pittsburg to see us in regard to it, and remained over Sunday. Of course, I always make a practice when opportunity presents itself, to talk of our glorious hope of Life only in Christ. He had never heard the doctrine before. He was a preacher in the Methodist church in my native town, Sheffield, England; but was branded as an "infidel," and expelled from the church of man's making, and has remained out until this day; but he is a member of the church of Christ. Please send him the HERALD OF LIFE.

Yours, in Christ.

NEW BRIGHTON, PA., Sept. 8, 1870.

The following is the letter Br. Mason speaks of, only we omit the writer's name, not knowing if it would be agreeable to him to have it made public now.—EDITOR.

PITTSBURG, PA., Sept. 4, 1870.

MR. MASON—Dear Sir: The past week has been one of extra labor; has afforded but little time for theological investigation: I have, however, scanned the HERALD OF LIFE, and find sufficient for deep and exclusive meditation; and I must confess to do justice to its contents would consume more time than I can at present command. First: because therein are contained the sentiments of my mind, the result of unbiassed thought before I came to this country, and which earned me the unenviable sobriquet of infidel.

Secondly: Because the non-existence of any person, book or paper that I had met with, entertaining my ideas, together with the so-called orthodox sentiment instilled in my mind in childhood, raising up in battle array against the light of reason and development of truth.

First. My investigations so far as capacity would allow, led me to the rejection of the so-called orthodox hell, as inconsistent with the character and description of the God of the Bible; so that while I was considered capable of reasoning on church secular matters, for some time before I finally left, I was deemed imbecile and dangerous in theology.

Second: My ignorance of any book, person, or paper of like mind with myself. With the talent of the past and present, combined with early tuition enforcing themselves on my mind, I confess, sir, it was war, indeed, to gain the victory and walk alone in what was considered, by my best friends, as the dangerous path; while it was quite, in my own mind, certain it was the only safe road to light, reason, truth, and consequently happiness.

Hence you will perceive the love I have for the paper, and how glad that I came to your house. Why, sir, I told my wife it was a providential affair, that anvil breaking, and the man could not help it. Any way, I would almost be willing to break two more for the same results and real enjoyments of last Sabbath afternoon.

Just a word about this poor "Devil." I pity him. He's blamed for every petty mischief. Well, sir, if sin originated in heaven by the devil, and he was instrumental in such a depopulation and ruin, what assurance have they who get there that another angel may not turn devil and have another war, and be turned out and they with him, or get killed in the fight?

This appears strange logic:

Eternal happiness,	War in Heaven.
Songs of delight,	Groans of agony.
River of Life,	Seas of blood.
Jasper walls,	Battlement and loop-holes.
Golden streets,	Torn-up R. R. tracks.
Pearly gates,	Broken bridges.
Peace and plenty,	Horrors of war.
No death,	Starving children.

Sure, sir, heaven must be a queer place and strangly paradoxical. What wonder at infidelity!

Shall be happy to see you at any time when you can make it convenient to come and spend a Sabbath with me. Accept my warmest gratitude for your kind entertainment.

"OUR TABERNACLE," ETC.

THE following passage in the writings of Paul is one upon which very considerable stress is laid by the advocates of the popular theory. "Therefore we are always confident, knowing that whilst we are at home in the body, we are absent from the Lord. We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord."—2 Cor. v. 6–8. It is readily allowed that this passage seems to teach the doctrine of the soul's separate state, and immediate felicity in that state. But this apparent instruction is to be attributed to the fact that such doctrines are so generally taught and accredited. Holding the traditional belief that the soul of man is his personality, and is capable of existing, independently of the body, it is natural to put such a construction upon this text as that which commonly obtains. But I cannot think that the believers in Corinth, who had read and understood the Apostle's first epistle, could have so interpreted his meaning. Such an interpretation would have been in direct contradiction to the very clear and cogent reasoning contained in the 15th chapter of their first epistle. Let the text under consideration be taken, not as is generally the practice, apart from, but in connection with, its context. The chapter contains, in its first half, a profession of the believer's faith in his survivance of his mortality. The imagery—for the language is obviously figurative—is that of an "earthly house of this tabernacle," which is condemned to be "dissolved," and was the Apostle's appropriate image to describe the mortality of the creature man. Man, the one compound being, is compared to an "earthly house" or "tabernacle," which will be "dissolved." Nothing is here said nor implied about an immortal, and essentially permanent part of man, which, in its own nature, is independent of this general and complete dissolution, which is most unaccountable, as on the popular supposition this immortal part is the human personality. The believer is here taught that he himself, in his one totality, not a part of himself, must be "dissolved." But he knows that if like an "earthly house," he must crumble in dissolution, he will be restored again in the beauty and durability of a "building of God, a house not made with hands," and which is impressed with the mortality of its builder; but one that is "eternal in the heavens." Here the two states of the believer's existence are described by an "earthly house" or "tabernacle," which must dissolve, and "a building of God, a house eternal in the heavens." Paul is undoubtedly speaking of the two bodies to which he alludes in the 15th chapter of his first epistle—"there is a natural body, and there is a spiritual body;" and hence he says, in the second verse, "for in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house, which is from heaven. For we that are in this tabernacle—[dwelling as mortal creatures]—do groan, being burdened, not for that we would be unclothed—[we desire not to die]—but clothed upon—[with our eternal house from heaven]—that mortality may be swallowed up of life." "Therefore, we are always confident;" for we know that if, on the one hand, as mortal beings we must dissolve in death—on the other hand, as beings upon whom God has conferred for Christ's sake and through him, the gift of immortality, we shall, when we are raised from the dead and receive our spiritual natures, live again as immortal beings "eternal in the heavens." "We are always confident" of this, and know "that whilst we are at home in the body"—whilst, that is, we are existing as earthly tabernacles, mortal and perishable, "we are absent from the Lord," with whom we cannot be until we have put off our mortality, and assume our immortality; which will be when we are raised from the dead in our "spiritual body"—our "building of God"—our "house" which is "eternal in the heavens." "We are confident," I say, of so glorious a re-creation in Christ Jesus awaiting us; and are, therefore, "willing rather to be absent from the body," that is, from our "natural body"—our present mortal and corruptible nature which separates us from the Lord—and to be possessed of our "spiritual body," our new incorruptible nature, in order "that we may be present with the Lord," which cannot be until the resurrection, when "mortality shall be swallowed up of life."

The Apostle desired to "be" present with the Lord, not as a disembodied soul, for he says, "not for that we would be unclothed;" and hence, in harmony with this desire, he says, "in this we groan earnestly, desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven;" and, therefore, since this clothing upon, or re-creation of the human nature, cannot take place until the resurrection, "when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality"—his desire to "be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord" cannot be gratified, and he evidently did not expect it from his reasoning, until the dead in Christ shall rise.

So far then from inculcating the doctrine, that at death the soul of the believer is present with the Lord, this text forms part of an important passage in the Apostle's writings in which he exhibits an utter disregard of such a doctrine, and declares that his own earnest longing was for the day of resurrection; when, being "absent from the body"—having parted forever with his mortality, he should possess his new immortal nature, in which he should behold and be forever "present with the Lord."

I leave then the teacher of the popular doctrine to explain this remarkable fact, that here the Apostle Paul says nothing of the blissful interval between death and resurrection—expresses no desire in reference to this interval; but as if impatient of it, he groans and earnestly desires to be "clothed upon" with his "house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." The conclusion is unavoidable, that the Apostle Paul knew of no such state of intermediate blessedness for the soul; the consummation of his wishes is thus expressed—"if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead."—Philip. iii. 11.

Some, in their determination not to yield this, the citadel of their favorite dogma, endeavor to make something plausible of it by what is termed riding a metaphor to death. The figurative expressions, "clothed upon," and "at home in," and "absent from the body," it is alleged, must signify something distinct from the clothing and the body. That which is "clothed upon," and which is "at home in or absent from the body," is the immortal soul. Now this looks very specious; but admit it, for the sake of argument, and it is obvious what a strange and unmeaning confusion of language the whole of this part of the chapter exhibits. Paul sets out with expressing the strong confidence which he and believers generally had in their triumph over mortality when they should receive their "building of God"—their "spiritual body" which he had shown in his first epistle, will be bestowed at the resurrection. Groaning under the burden of a present mortality, he earnestly desires that the time may soon arrive when, possessed of his "spiritual body," "mortality shall be swallowed up of life." Until this clothing upon—that is, until the resurrection—it is obvious that mortality reigns—it is not "swallowed up of life." But how does this instruction of Paul's agree with the popular belief that the immortal soul at death escapes from its prison-house of clay, and that at this moment—

"There is a land of pure delight,
Where saints immortal reign?"

The Apostle is evidently at variance with the modern theology on this point, when he teaches that not until we are "created in Christ Jesus"—invested with our "spiritual body"—"clothed upon" by our "building of God"—the grand result is accomplished, mortality is swallowed up of life.

Besides, on the supposition that the being "absent from the body" and "present with the Lord," refers to the immortal soul leaving its corporeal abode and ascending to God, how, I ask, does this statement follow as an inference from what the Apostle had been previously discoursing upon? Why does he preface it by a term which shows that it stands connected with the foregoing observations as a consequence, and say—"Therefore, we are always confident," etc.? The substance of Paul's statement is, that he earnestly desired the arrival of resurrection, that he might be possessed of his spiritual and immortal nature. What logical connection is there between this emphatic desire, and the statement that, when he died, his disembodied soul ascended to the presence of God? According to the exposition given above, the connection is obvious and natural; but such an exposition of the passage, the only possible one as it appears to me, gives a most decided contradiction to the doctrine which is so fondly and furtively reared upon it.

But further, if we are to understand that apparent something which is clothed upon to be the spiritual nature or soul, then the Apostle plainly avows that he had no desire for this intermediate state; for he says, "Not for that we would be unclothed." Even with this gloss his longing is for the "redemption of the body" at resurrection. Let it be noted, that according to this exposition, Paul does not pass over in silence the popular notion of an intermediate state of bliss, as in the true exposition of the passage as given above; he is made to affirm that he would rather not participate in it: he does not desire disembodied bliss—"Not that we would be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life."

Once more, if it be affirmed that the imagery of being "clothed upon" represents the popular notion of the soul as something within which is "clothed upon" with its "earthly house" or "building of God," then consistency demands that the doctrine of the soul's incorruptibility and immortality be forthwith discarded from the orthodox belief; for it is written—"This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality."—1 Cor. xv. This something within—the soul, must put on incorruption and immortality, and is itself called "this corruptible, and this mortal." "So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying that is written—Death is swallowed up in victory."

The attempt to evade the proper meaning of the Apostle's language, does but involve the disconcerted polemic in greater perplexities, and in the end lead to his being entangled and taken in his own net. Candor must compel the acknowledgment that the very prevalent custom of quoting this text of Paul's for the purpose of teaching that he expected to be with Christ immediately at death, is most unwarrantable; a very gross and mischievous perversion of his meaning.—Selected.

WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT?

"The burden of Dumah. He calleth to me out of Seir, Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night? The watchman said, The morning cometh, and also the night: If ye will inquire, inquire ye; return, come."—Isa. xxi. 11, 12.

"Jerusalem and other cities of Asia had watchmen night and day who went round upon the walls to watch over the city; to whose hourly cries Isaiah refers in illustration of the vigilance required by God in his ministers. At this day, the watchmen of Jerusalem keep not silence, nor do they hold their peace, day nor night—especially at night, or when danger is apprehended. They are required to call to each other every few minutes, and the cry passes from one to another entirely round the city. They are required to respond to the inquiry, 'Watchman, what of the night?' To tell the hour of night, as well as the approach of danger."

The safety of the city depended upon the vigilance of these watchmen; if found asleep, or off their watch, the city was liable to be taken and its inhabitants slain in an unexpected hour, and in that case their blood would be required at the watchman's hands (Ezek. xxxiii. 1–9); but if vigilant, and the sword was seen coming, and warning was given, and the people would not hear, then would he deliver his own soul, and be clear of the blood of all who might perish. This is a just principle of law, recognized by the great Lawgiver of the universe, and man cannot escape the penalty.

The responsible office of watchman illustrates the position of the watchmen whom God has placed upon the walls of Zion to tell the people the hour of night, to warn them of approaching danger, and of a coming judgment. The people expect much of them, as their future welfare and eternal interests are to a very great extent committed to their care. Therefore, if the watchman fails to do the duty which he owes to God, the church, and the world, he must suffer the penalties of a just law; the blood of souls will be found in his skirts and will be required at his hand.

There are dangers within and without—on the right hand and on the left. Day and night is the enemy seeking some unguarded avenue of the heart, whereby he may infuse principles antagonistic to those of the Christian religion—a spirit of hatred to God and everything sacred, a spirit of the world, of covetousness, selfishness, pride, rebellion, variance, emulation, and obscenity. Such are some of the dangers to which we are hourly exposed, and it is the watchman's duty to keep the people apprised of the enemy's design, and to keep himself ever on the watch-tower, that he may be able to observe the slightest indication of danger, and by giving warning, to save the flock.

But there is another danger to which I would call special attention. I allude to the coming judgment and the consequences of being found unprepared for that great and solemn event. It is the watchman's duty to study the prophetic word, and to watch its fulfillment and the signs of the times, that he may answer the question, "Watchman, what of the night?" A failure on his part to do so would peril his salvation, and fasten the blood of his people upon him. Let us look at this question. What do the signs of the times portend? is only another form in which it may be put.

All classes of men confess that the signs are ominous, and the question is, What do they portend? There rests with weight upon the minds of all intelligent people an idea (though to some a vague one) that a general crisis is impending. The statesman, politician, theologian, philosopher and scientific man, as well as the more illiterate, are deeply impressed with the conviction, that something unusual is about to happen. So they have expressed themselves as they have witnessed the unrest of nations. The people of every government is restive and impatient of restraint. The present organizations, civil, political and ecclesiastical, are like a loose-built craft upon the stormy ocean, ready to be broken up and engulfed in the angry waves below, so that it requires all the wisdom and skill our best statesmen possess to guide the ship of state amidst the dangers which threaten her on every side; so distrustful are earth's leaders of their own wisdom and influence that they dare not trust themselves, much less others, hence they resort to the invention and manufacture of implements of war and the enrollment of men, that they may use them to accomplish what they cannot by legislation and diplomacy. But with all this precaution doubt and uncertainty prevail on every hand.

The last desperate effort of the Papacy, in her Ecumenical Council, to devise some plan for regaining lost power over the world, to enslave men, and bind them with everlasting chains so that she can lead them captive at her will, is also significant. We have felt the earthquake's throes, and a mountain has been seen to leap from its ancient seat "and remove to yonder place," while the unprecedented tidal wave has been sweeping far inland, bearing upon its mighty crest ponderous vessels to be left upon dry land as a witness of the great power of God. Signs in the sun, moon and stars, distress on earth, famine, plague, war, and the changes in the seasons have also been very remarkable.

As to morals there has been a change, but not for the better. Both the secular and religious press assert that crime is rapidly on the increase, and that life and property are to an alarming degree insecure. The thief and assassin are becoming exceeding bold and relentless, and what is worse, the masses are fast becoming callous and indifferent to this state of things. A theft or a cold-blooded murder creates but a momentary sensation, and the occurrence is forgotten nearly as soon as read. Men occupying posts of honor and holding charges of sacred trust—regarded with respect in society—are fast developing the darkest shade of character. Now and then the vail is raised and the world has an opportunity of looking within; but I drop the vail and pass on.

Still it is an "age of progress" in some respects. New and useful inventions are constantly coming before the public. New discoveries are made—no more wonderful than frequent—and knowledge is increasing on every hand, in the secular and religious world. Light is sweeping over the earth in a manner to dazzle the eye. In a religious point of view, it would seem as though light and darkness had engaged in a mighty struggle for the mastery. Centuries are crowded into years, events succeeding each other so rapidly that our brain becomes dizzy while watching the whirl of events.

Our minds are filled with fear while contemplating these things, and we anxiously inquire, How and when will all these things end? The answer to these inquiries must be that which the prophet has put into our mouths, "The morning cometh, and also the night." The text being a prophecy, must have its fulfilment subsequent to the time of writing. The inquiry came not from ancient Israel, but from the Gentiles, "he calleth to me out of Seir"—and the question and answer are applicable to the present time.

God foreseeing that a time would come, when men's minds would be exercised with the things coming to pass on the earth, and that the inquiry would be made, "What do these things presage?" clearly intimates that he would raise up watchmen who would answer these anxious inquiries in the light of his word.

No man can answer the question correctly but the student of prophecy; he can and will do it if a faithful watchman. The true watchman makes himself acquainted with the prophetic word. He watches the fulfilment of prophecy and carefully observes the signs of the times. He neither slumbers nor sleeps, for he knows the responsible position he occupies, that he is amenable to God and must answer to him for any neglect of duty. He encourages investigation, saying to the people, "If ye will inquire, inquire ye, return, come;" and this he does that he may keep them apprised of coming events, and that the judgment may not come upon them in an unexpected hour, and their blood be found in his skirts. The slothful and worldly shepherd, on the other hand, will try to quiet the minds of the people by assuring them of continued "peace in this place." He discourages investigation, and uses his influence on the side of darkness.

There are two classes of men on earth—men of righteousness and men of the world. To the first there is about to dawn a glorious Sabbatic morn: a morning without clouds, and a day that knows no night; a day of peace, rest, life and immortality. To the other class a night is about to set in which knows no morning—a night wherein the slightest rays of light never penetrate—a night of darkness so great that the human mind cannot form any correct ideas of its density.

To the godly this world has been one of tears and sorrow. It has been, as it were, a long night; but the light of the gospel has penetrated the darkness and they have been able to walk by it. The ungodly, rejecting the light, have rejoiced and enjoyed themselves while rioting in sin. Eternity is opening up to both classes—to one bright and glorious, to the other dark, dark, dark! an eternity without one ray of hope!

Reader, this is no fictitious tale, but a solemn truth that may be realized much sooner than you are aware of. Certain it is that the morning and night of our text are near at hand. Let me therefore inquire of you, To which class do you belong? Is it to them "who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory, honor, immortality? or to those who, having rejected the word of life against themselves, are about to enter upon an endless night? To one or the other of these classes you certainly belong, and it is to the one of your choice; for your own sake, make a wise choice, and make it now.

I must leave you with the solemn, yet glorious declaration of St. Paul, which is ever my answer to those who inquire of me "Watchman, what of the night?"—"The night is far advanced, the day is at hand, let us therefore cast off the works of darkness, and put on the armor of light; let us walk becomingly, as in the day."—Rom. xiii. 12, 13. Farewell.

PREACHING.

THE vice of preaching at present, in most of our pulpits, is that we do not aim correctly. We strive to please the few, and not the many, and the result is that the conscience of both parties is unmoved. The pulpit is dying of the proprieties. We dare not introduce an anecdote into a sermon. We shrink from an illustration unless we can count it classical. We are averse even to the delineation of character. lest we should detract from the dignity of the pulpit. When a man is afraid of losing his dignity by attending to his own business, we generally think that he has very little to lose. We fear that the pulpit is liable to create a similar impression. Look at the highest example of preachers. How simple is the teaching of Christ, how perfectly adapted to the audience by which he was surrounded. How it abounds in illustrations, parables, and even every-day proverbs, so that the common people heard him gladly. Paul tells us himself how he preached at Corinth and Ephesus, and he is surely a good model for a cultivated man Look at Bunyan, one of the most eloquent and effective preachers of his time, how plain, how simple, how earnest, and yet how full of incident and illustration were his discourses. Observe President Davies, how plain, forcible, earnest and direct were his discourses. We sacrifice vivacity and interest to a vague pedantic notion of what is proper for the pulpit, as though a preacher of the gospel were lecturing to a class on the proprieties of rhetoric. Is it not time that a change came over us, and that a preacher aimed more at interesting and converting men, and less at the reputation of refinement of style, and exquisiteness of propriety? A minister once said that a sermon without a fault would spoil a revival. Are not such sermons the reason why revivals are so rare among us?—Dr. Wayland.

SYMPATHY FOR THE ERRING.—Of how much of our indignation against even a deliberate wrong would be disarmed if we could know for ourselves a tithe of all the sorrow, and trouble, and disappointment the poor erring heart had passed through! What efforts are made in youth to stand up against the pressure of the world, and how, when fallen, from miscalculation, or an over-confiding nature, or want of tact, it bravely rose up and tried again; and when hard necessity came and drove it to the wall, how it looked around for help, and waited, still striving to stand upright, and fell while striving; and even when fallen, how it yearned for one more chance to rise and be a man, how loth at last to give up all for lost! Could we but see a thousandth part of these struggles, as they rend our brother's bosom, and almost break his heart, how should it disarm us of our vindictiveness, and incline us even, to run to him, and raise him up, and stand by him, and with god-like forgiveness bid him, "Try, try again!"—Selected.

A GENTLEMEN one day conversing with a watchmaker upon the dishonest practices of persons in his way of business, was thus addressed by him:

"Sir, I served my apprenticeship with a man who did not fear God, and who, consequently, was not very scrupulous in the charges which he made to his customers. He used frequently to call me a fool, and tell me I should die in a work-house, when, in his absence, I used to make such charges as appeared to me fair and honest. In the course of time I set up in business for myself and have been so successful as never to have wanted a dollar, while my master, who used to reproach me for my honesty, became so reduced in circumstances as to apply to me for ten dollars, and did at length die in a work-house.

IT is the greatest of all blessedness to know the blessedness that is to be had in the Lord Jesus Christ.

CHILLS AND FEVER:
OR, "FEVER AND AGUE."

As the above complaint is very prevalent in Brooklyn, N. Y., and vicinity, this fall, and we understood Br. Spencer, of Rochester, had a recipe he considered invaluable in such cases, we wrote to him for it, and received the following answer:

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Sept. 15, 1870.

BR. STORRS: I will send you the best prescription that I ever became acquainted with, which completely cured me of the "fever and ague" over ten years ago, after many doctors had tried their skill in vain. I have never known an instance where it has failed when thoroughly tried; but the same medicine will not always act the same upon different individuals; I will therefore send you two prescriptions, one of which, I have no doubt, will have the desired effect.

First.—Take a good quality of brandy and grate wild turnip into it, perhaps to the consistency of cream, so that it will pour freely from a bottle. Shake well before using. A tablespoonful may be taken two hours apart, or so, through the day; upon the approach of the chill, the dose may be repeated every thirty minutes until the patient perspires freely. In my case the first chill yielded to this treatment, and I have never had one since. A person can use his own judgment in this according to the nature of the case. In connection with this treatment, I would advise the patient by all means to move the bowels gently with Dr. Schenk's Liver Pills, to be had at any drug store. The benefit from these will be very great. By all means let quinine alone.

Second.—The second prescription I do not know so much about, but is a great favorite with my mother-in-law, who had much experience with fever and ague in the earlier history of Rochester. It is simply a tea made from the roots of wandering milk weed (the botanical name I have forgot, but druggists know it), given every thirty minutes, or more, until it moves the bowels freely. It is very bitter, and will make the patient feel some sick until it operates.

Let me remark, that upon the approach of the chill in connection with the Wild Turnip, etc., the patient should be warmly covered in bed, and hot bricks applied to the feet are often very beneficial. For a long time I have been assured that derangement of the liver and often jaundice are the sure accompaniment of fever and ague; and hence the necessity of the liver pills I mentioned. If the M. D.'s will produce any thing that will control ague better than this simple treatment, then I will admit that my observation and study on this subject has been in vain.

WM. H. SPENCER.

"MRS. S. S. BUSSIER, 1202 Passyunk Av., two doors below Federal street, Philadelphia, Pa."

The above is the address of the worthy sister, who is poor and afflicted, of whom Br. F. H. Burbank spoke in our issue of Aug. 24. From information we have, she is truly needy, and unquestionably worthy of Christian aid and sympathy.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

SR. BUSSIER has received from a friend in Salem $1; one in Newark, $2; one in Chicago, $5; for which they have her heartfelt gratitude. May the Lord bless them for their kindness to the worthy and the needy.

F. H. BURBANK.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Sept., 1870.

WM. H. SPENCE, Bristol, R. I., writes: It is sometime since I have written anything to the HERALD OF LIFE, that lovely paper, for the truth and words of truth it contains; though it is more or less sprinkled with chaff: but I do not expect to see that all swept away till we all come to the unity of faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God; unto a perfect man, to the measure of the fulness of Christ. God bless you; and may He help us all, of the dear little flock of God, that we may double our diligence to make our calling and election sure. O, how we prize the glorious Life views; and how much they have done for us. Yes, glory be to God in Christ Jesus—our LIFE-GIVER; for we believe the life views have opened our eyes, and the scales have fallen from them, and now we see, we believe, as God requires of us. Glory forever, to His blessed name, be given by us. Amen. We thank God for the continuance of our paper, and pray the Lord to bless, in a special manner, those dear brethren and sisters who have given of the Lord's money so freely for the blessed cause; and we believe He will bless them. Your brother, in hope of the resurrection from the dead to eternal life.

JAMES W. MCCAGG, Warsaw, N. Y., under date of Sept. 12, writes: On receipt of my HERALD this morning, I was rejoiced to see how much was subscribed by the brethren and sisters for the coming year; but saddened to think I could not do anything with them, at present. I am still a cripple from my railroad injury, and have not been able to do anything since last March. Soon as I can get funds, I will pay what I think the Lord approves, as my offering, for what I regard as one of the best means of shedding the glorious truth—"Life only in Christ." I bless the Lord for his goodness to me in my affliction, and am looking with great comfort to the soon coming of Jesus. My prayer is, "Come Lord Jesus quickly."—P. S.—My injuries are, concussion of Spinal cord, entirely disabling me.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, SEPTEMBER 21, 1870.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

ONE number more closes volume vii. The first of October opens with volume viii. Our mail books must be arranged by that time; and all persons who have not renewed their subscriptions for the new volume are desired to do so during this month: do not delay.

A few persons have received the whole of the present volume and paid nothing; others have paid only in part. All of these must now make a remittance, or expect to find their papers discontinued. We shall be as lenient as possible to old paying subscribers, but hope they will remit for the next volume as early as possible.

BR. GRIM ON JOHN V. 28, 29.

AT our late anniversary Br. Grim spoke at some length on the above text. A number, who heard his remarks, urged him to write them out for the HERALD OF LIFE. He has commenced that work; and next week we shall give our readers the first instalment on the subject.

ELD. S. W. BISHOP.

THIS brother writes us to withdraw his appointments in the HERALD of last week, saying: "I am sick, and cannot fill them at present."

We trust his illness may be short, and that he may soon be able to go forth bearing the precious seed of life.

THE EUROPEAN WAR.

THE news continues as contradictory as ever. That which is heralded for truth one day, is contradicted the next; especially, the cry of "peace, peace." One thing is certain: The Prussians are gathering for the siege of Paris, and are fast closing around it. Its fate remains to be seen. Republican France is a more hateful thing to the aristocrats of Europe than the Imperial one; and all the crowned heads of the Continent ache at the sight. They begin to feel "the halter draw" that is to end the race of earth-born dynasties; and their "hearts are failing them for fear, and looking after the things that are coming on the earth."—Luke xxi. 26. Let them fight and war on: but let us "stand still and see the salvation of the LORD." He will "break in pieces" these images of true government, and place His Son on the throne of David.

A KING AND POPE IN TROUBLE.

IT seems the King of Italy—Victor Emanuel—very reluctantly has made up his mind to take Rome, and thus deprive the Pope of the last remnant of his temporal power: a sorry portion for a Pope just declared "infallible."

A telegraph from London, dated Sept., 15, makes the following statement:

His Holiness, the Pope has received a letter from King Victor Emanuel, in which the latter explains the course he has taken. "Any delay on his part," he says, "would have occasioned the proclamation of the republic in every Italian city, and his army would not have fought the republic, which would have been fatal to the Papacy. As it is republicanism is so rampant that it may prove irrepressible."

The king and pope both dread republicanism; and well they may, for it is likely to destroy both kings and popes—such seems to be the order of God. Corrupt governments—civil and ecclesiastical—have run their course, and their end is at hand.

Will republicanism do any better for the world than kings, emperors and popes? It will give more liberty; but corrupt human nature cannot be trusted with unrestrained liberty, and it will not allow of any restraint from man or God. Having overcome the obstacles the civil and ecclesiastical rulers have exercised, and abused their power in so doing, republicanism will next bid defiance to the authority of God himself: hence, its devotees "will make war with the Lamb"—God's appointed King to rule the world. Here republicanism will fail, and "be broken in pieces with a rod of iron"—being as worthless for the government of the world as popes, kings, or emperors. Then will "Theocracy"—the government of God by his Son—be established over all the earth, and "the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ; and He shall reign for ever and ever."—Rev. xi. 15.

That day is now at hand, and the word of the Lord appears to have commenced its fulfilment, wherein he has said, "Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also heaven" —all civil and ecclesiastical powers, like as if the firmament of heaven were departing; "And this word, Yet once more, signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken . . . that those things which cannot be shaken may remain. Wherefore, we"—the people of God, in Christ—"receiving a kingdom which cannot be moved," etc.—Heb. xii. 26–28.

Such is the government we look for, and which will ere long be developed to the consternation of kings, popes, emperors, and republicans: all of these governments will depart as if "the heavens were rolled up" and "departed as a scroll." Then will Christ, the world's rightful Lord and King, have "dominion from sea to sea, and from the river to the ends of the earth."—Psa. lxxii. 8. Then shall "the whole earth be full of the glory of the Lord."—Num. xiv. The oath of the LORD God has made this event certain; and in vain will "The kings of the earth . . . take counsel together, against the LORD, and against his Anointed" to defeat the establishment of "Theocracy," soon to be established on the earth to their utter dismay and eternal overthrow.

"IS SAUL AMONG THE PROPHETS?"

No one can contemplate the extraordinary events of the time without asking if there be not a Providence directing them. History affords no parallel to them. The ambitious plans and designs of the foremost man in Europe are shattered almost in an instant. The Cæsarism which Napoleon had been trying to erect upon the ruined liberties and blood of the people has vanished like a dream. The oldest sovereignty of Europe—that of the Pope—is rapidly passing away like a mist before the sun. The Prussian monarchy, in defending itself, has raised a revolution that threatens its own existence. The conqueror is embarrassed by his own success and knows not how to allay or direct the storm he has evoked. The crowned heads and aristocracies are greatly alarmed and at their wits end. All Europe is in a ferment. The light of intelligence is penetrating through the masses of the people, and they are clamoring for their rights and liberties. Evidently we are at the dawn of a wonderful transformation in the world. The people of this age may be able to say, with Simeon of old, we have seen the salvation, now let us depart in peace.

The paragraph throughout is written in such style as would indicate the writer had been among the prophets, if not of them. He does not, however, seem to understand that the prophets have clearly foretold that a time would come when all "the thrones" of human governments are to be "cast down," and the government of earth to be given to God's anointed King; and "that all people, nations, and languages shall serve him:" and that "His dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and His kingdom that which shall not be destroyed." When that kingdom is set up there is no further use for these human and proud tyrants of earth, whether as kings, emperors, presidents, or popes; for, "The law shall go forth from Zion, and the word of the LORD from Jerusalem;" and "the nation and kingdom that will not serve" God's anointed King (Jesus), "shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted."—Micah iv. 2; and Isa. lx. 12.

That will, indeed, be a day in which those who delight in peace, and in a good and righteous government "will be able to say," not like "Simeon of old," exactly, but like Peter on the mount of transfiguration, "It is good to be here:" and, though their eyes, who love the Lord, will have then "seen Thy salvation," they will have no desire to "depart," even though it were "in peace;" but, to remain forever under the government then established over the whole earth; which government is not to be "shaken" or overturned, but will abide forever; and men will have no more use for weapons of war; and no more "garments rolled in blood" will ever be seen.

Hail, blessed day; and the signs indicate its near approach. The carnage inflicted by haughty monarchs, in their last struggle for earth's dominion, shows that the devil has come down in great wrath, knowing that his time is short; and that the dominion "under the whole heaven" is about to pass out of his hands, by the deposing of all earth-born governments and dynasties. "Amen. Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

TRANSPIRING PROPHETIC EVENTS.

GREAT events have transpired with such astounding rapidity in Europe, during the past few weeks, that beholders have scarce been able to direct their bewildered gaze backward long enough to realize the immense strides that have been taken. Very many students of prophecy have been agreed that the Napoleonic dynasty was the power represented in Revelation as the "beast" on which the "woman, drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus," did ride. As such, they have looked for its downfall during the time of Napoleon III., but so brilliant had become his career, such power did he possess and so generally was he at one time conceded to be the star among European monarchs, that not a few were inclined to the opinion that the overthrow would not occur until the reign of the late Prince Imperial.

For years past the military and naval workshops of the empire have been reported active beyond all precedent, turning out vast quantities of the most destructive engines of war and arms of most approved and deadly nature. Its navy had come to be thought by many the finest in the world; its army was regarded as better drilled and better equipped than any other, and its mighty genius was believed to be second to none. So wide spread was the feeling that the Emperor was massing his strength to the utmost for some mighty effort, that from lip to lip went the question "what is Napoleon about to do?" But no satisfactory reply could be obtained; and ever and anon, above the hum of busy preparation for war, was heard the voice of the cruel, lying monarch crying, "peace! peace!" At last the answer came. Without a cause, and with no claim to one, worthy of a pretext even, he proudly and defiantly broke the peace, and round the globe and across and throughout continents the electric spark with lightning swiftness flashed the news, while millions of trembling lips muttered curses on the hated name of war. War, however, was the watchword and when a million brave men were brought into battle array the conflict began.

From the striking of the first blow, confusion and dismay began to cover Napoleon and his hosts, and defeat to crouch upon his gilded banners and soil them with trailing through France's own dust. Disaster followed disaster closely on that sea of flame; and soon the cunning, ambitious despot sank forever, as we think, beneath the surging waves. As an individual, he still lives. As the man of power, the haughty monarch, the "beast" of prophecy, he has been destroyed in a lake, burning with fire and brimstone; while the language of the "woman," sitting upon the beast, "behold I sit a queen, and am no widow, and shall see no sorrow" still resting upon her tongue, is left mourning, alone and without support. How wonderfully has God wrought! How has He brought to nought the counsels of the great!

But the work is not finished. The "rider" must follow the "beast." To Italy and Rome are the eyes of students of prophecy turned. Says the Spirit, concerning the harlot power, "they shall eat her flesh, and burn her with fire." Long has she been burned with fire, and long have they been eating her flesh (taking away her dominions), and now from all parts of Italy goes up the last and crowning demand for the little there is left. Already have Italian troops crossed the border and occupied papal territory. The Pope, having no French troops to protect him, must, with or without a struggle, yield. The work may not be wholly done now, but the finishing stroke will soon be given. If Victor Emanuel compromises with the Pope he may soon himself, in consequence, be swept away. The present indications are that Papacy, after a rule of eleven hundred years, is, as a temporal power, about to pass out of existence.

"During the reign of the Emperor Constantine the Catholic Church began acquiring property in Rome. In 726 the Popes possessed considerable power and influence. Elected by the popular vote, they had endeared themselves to the people, who finally paid them that allegiance which had been extended to the emperors. When, in 741, the Lombards laid siege to Rome, the Pontiff, Gregory III., sent an embassy to France imploring the aid of Charles Martee. Subsequently Pope Stephen II. obtained the aid of Pepin, who marched an army into Italy, defeated the Lombards and compelled their king not only to abandon his design upon Rome, but also to cede to the Pope a great deal of territory, situated principally on the Adriatic. From this time the Popes became temporal sovereigns and their territorial possessions were greatly enlarged by Charlemagne after his destruction of the Lombard monarchy. Ever since the Popes have been the rulers of Rome and a great part of Italy."

Of the manner in which Papacy has used her power much is known, but a vast deal will never be known while time lasts. She has tortured and killed the saints and cursed the world with her lies against God; and now the fiery judgments of heaven are upon her. In 1859 the Pope's dominions covered more than fifteen thousand square miles, and contained a population of over three millions. In 1860 he was deprived of the greater part of it, and in his rage thereat he sent what he conceived to be a terrible "bull of excommunication" against Victor Emanuel; but we did not hear that the ferocious creature gored the king very grievously; and now, when the Pope had thought to solace himself with the pomp and glitter and flattery of Ecumenical surroundings, the excommunicated king steps in, without even knocking at the door, and coolly demands the little he did not get before. And mark how God works. Latest cable dispatches report that Victor Emanuel has written a letter to the Pope, by way of explaining his action in which he says, substantially, that the strength of republican feeling in Italy, has compelled him to his present course.

When the States of the Church are united to Italy, and the oldest government in Europe is thus swept out of existence, much indeed will have been accomplished, but even that will not fill up the prophecy respecting that great city, "BABYLON THE GREAT, The Mother of Harlots." "And a mighty angel took up a stone like a great millstone, and cast it into the sea, saying, Thus with violence shall that great city Babylon be thrown down, and shall be found no more at all."—Rev. xviii. 21. Let us labor and wait and watch and pray, for just beyond these impending events is that greatest of all events the return of Zion's King to "reign with His ancients gloriously."

"THE AGE TO COME."

THIS is a question on which there is an honest difference of opinion among Life Believers, and about which the friends of the HERALD OF LIFE may be nearly equally divided; but we really do not see why either class should wish the subject excluded from our paper. It is a question which relates to the object for which this paper was started, as our title shows, viz., "THE COMING KINGDOM." If this subject cannot be discussed among us, why continue such a head to our paper?

We have said, there is an honest difference of opinion on the question of what relates to the matter of the "Coming Kingdom." Have we not grace enough to bear with one another in considering the subject, though we differ? Certainly we ought to have. It is doubtless true that the EDITOR of this paper has sometimes failed in the grace spoken of; but he has not felt to disfellowship those who hold an opposing view of the question to his own; and, so far as he is personally concerned, is not anxious to press the question; yet he cannot fail, when he speaks at all on the subject, to indicate his real sentiments on the question, and he expects his brethren who differ from him to do the same; yet it is desirable that both sides should be as brief as possible in the expression of their views, and be sure to use only words of kindness. Long articles, on this question, are clearly undesirable, and read but by few on either side of it.

As to ourself, we see not how we can maintain our view of the literal destruction of the wicked, and deny the literal return of literal Israel. The principle of interpretation, as it appears to us, is the same in both cases. If compelled to give up this principle, we could find no difficulty in adopting the spiritualistic one in regard to the return and reign of Christ and kindred subjects.

The words of James, Acts xv., when taken in connection with the prophecy from which he quotes, seem to us to make a clear distinction between those concerned in "building again the tabernacle of David," and the heathen (Gentiles) that are called by the name of the Lord. The prophecy referred to is found in Amos ix., and reads thus: "Behold the eyes of the LORD are upon the sinful kingdom, and I will destroy it from off the face of the earth, [land]; saving that I will not utterly destroy the house of Jacob, saith the LORD. For, lo, I will command, and I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall on the earth." . . . "In that day I will raise up the tabernacle of David that is fallen, and close up the breaches thereof; and I will raise up his ruins, and I will build it as in the days of old, that they may possess the remnant of Edom, and all the heathen (Gentiles) that are called by my name, saith the LORD that doeth this." . . . "And I will bring again the captivity of my people Israel, and they shall build the waste cities and inhabit them" . . . "and I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land, which I have given them, saith the LORD GOD."

It seems to us—and we cannot help it—this is clearly a prophecy, the latter part of which is to be as literally fulfilled as we know the former part has been: and we dare not transfer the promises here made to gentile christians; for, it seems to us, it would destroy the harmony of the word; for those gentile christians are distinguished from the "house of Israel," being expressly named the "heathen upon whom my name is called," in distinction from "they," who are employed in raising up the tabernacle of David.

Hence, our view is briefly this: "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world," (aionos, that age; i. e., of Messiah's reign on the throne of his father David), "and the resurrection from the dead," etc., will be the saints of all nations, and all previous ages, from Abel down to the time of Messiah's second advent; who will then be made alive from the dead, or changed if living, and "shall reign with Him," as He hath said, "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame. and am set down with my Father in his throne."—Rev. iii. 21. To such, Jesus has said, "I will give him power over the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron; as the vessels of a potter shall they be broken to shivers: even as I have received of my Father."—Rev. ii. 26, 27. Whatever view may be taken of the latter part of this text, two facts seem clear to us: First, there are "left of the nations" after the saints are made rulers with Christ; and second, the nations to be ruled are not immortal; and we may add, Their subjection or destruction is clearly set forth.

We have thus briefly presented our view of the subject; and we ask all who may wish to speak on the question, pro or con, to do so as briefly; and let us show to all men that we can differ in love, by carefully avoiding all personalities and words calculated to disturb the general harmony that exists among us. Let us love as brethren who are mutually looking for the return of our common Lord and Master: then shall we "see eye to eye" and be accepted of our LIFE-GIVER and King.

WE trust we shall not incur the censure of heresy if we state our conviction of the true intent and scope of this parable.

The key to a parable is either in itself or in the discourse connected with it. In the case before us, it is in the context. The scope, or design of the parable was to teach the effect to follow upon two classes of men by a change from the Mosaic, or Law-dispensation to the Christian, or Gospel dispensation; which new dispensation was "the mystery, which in other ages" [or dispensations] "was not made known unto the sons of men," but being now about to be "revealed unto holy apostles," would change the condition of both Jews and Gentiles. This fact is clearly set forth in the 17th verse, which is the key to the parable. and unlocks it perfectly. That verse reads thus—"The law and the prophets were" [preached] "until John; since that time the kingdom of God is preached." That is, a new dispensation of God's favor is now opened; no longer to be confined to the Jews, or one nation, but to embrace "all nations" in its offered benefits. This change would affect very differently two different classes of men, viz., the Jews, who were under the law, and the Gentiles, who are to be embraced under the gospel, or to be made partakers of those peculiar blessings which had been hitherto so exclusively confined to the sons of Abraham. The effects of this change are illustrated by the parable under consideration. Let the reader note how our Lord introduces it.

After having spoken of the law and the prophets being preached until John, and that since that time the kingdom of God was preached, he intimates that the law was about to have its last and perfect accomplishment—that the last "tittle" of it was about to be "finished:" that then the Jews would be like the wife whose husband was dead, the law not binding them any longer; and that God, who had dealt with them under the title of husband, would be at full liberty to select a new bride out of all nations. Thus Paul reasons, Rom. vii. 1–4. "Know ye not, brethren, (for I speak to them that know the law,) how that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth? For the woman which hath an husband is bound by the law to her husband so long as he liveth; but if the husband be dead, she is loosed from the law of her husband. So then, if while her husband liveth she be married to another man, she shall be called an adulteress: but if her husband be dead, she is free from that law; so that she is no adulteress, though she be married to another man. Wherefore, my brethren, ye also are become dead to the law by the body of Christ; that ye should be married to another, even to him who is raised from the dead, that we should bring forth fruit unto God."

Now read the verse with which the parable of the rich man is introduced, Luke xvi. 18. "Whosoever putteth away his wife, and marrieth another, committeth adultery: and whosoever marrieth her that is put away from her husband, committeth adultery." So long as the law given by Moses continued, the Jews were chargeable with adultery if they lacked in fidelity to that law as unto God their husband; but nationally they had often been wanting in fidelity, and the law was no longer to be the marriage contract; a new covenant, ratified by the blood of Christ, and not by the blood of bulls or goats, was to form the ground by which the new bride was to hold her relationship to God, and through which she was to receive the blessings promised. The law being dead "by the body," or death, "of Christ," still to cleave to that law, as the Jew did, was to commit adultery, and bring upon themselves all its curses: they died unto Christ, by rejecting him and putting him to death, and "were broken off" from Abraham's bosom, or from all spiritual connection with him, and have been in "torments" unto this day in consequence: while the believing soul, who received Christ, even though he had been a polluted Gentile, "full of sores, died" unto the law [see Rom. vii. 4,] and was grafted into the good "olive tree," or was translated through the instrumentality of angels [messengers, or ministers of Christ,] "into Abraham's bosom," became a child of Abraham and an heir, according to the promise, to the kingdom of God.

The parties concerned and to be affected are distinctly marked. The items relating to the rich man clearly mark him as the representative of the Jews, as a people. We note his case first. His dress. He was "clothed in purple and fine linen." Now turn to "the law" that was "until John," and see what was the clothing of the priests under that law. See Exodus xxviii., where Moses was commanded to make for Aaron and the other priests "garments for glory and beauty." Verses 5, 6, 8, and 15—"And they shall take gold, and blue, and purple, and scarlet and fine linen. And they shall make the ephod of gold, blue, and purple, scarlet, and fine twined linen. . . . And thou shalt make the breast-plate . . . of purple . . . and fine twined linen." Such were the peculiarities of the dress, or clothing of the representatives of the law and the Mosaic dispensation, or Jewish system. These peculiarities our Lord commences with in his description of the rich man; and they are sufficiently striking to satisfy the unprejudiced inquirer after truth that the Jews, nationally, were to be represented by the rich man in the parable. The Jews were rich in those abundant communications of truth, knowledge, and peculiar privileges which God had endowed them with by direct communications, or through the prophets whom he had raised up to instruct them from time to time, till at length he spake unto them "by his Son." Rich were they, indeed, in these high and exalted advantages over all other nations and people. It were easy to enlarge here, but we forbear. The period of their exclusive enjoyment of those peculiarities was their "life-time:" but the time came that those peculiarities were to pass away; and that period is represented as a death. It was the death of their whole ecclesiastical polity—it was now to be superseded by a more spiritual and universal system, embracing other people: the "life-time" of their peculiarities is ended—the change has come over them, symbolized by a death and burial. Where next is this once rich man found? Is it in the theological hell? No: it is not even in gehenna; but, in hades. We have spoken so often and fully on hades, elsewhere, that we do not deem it necessary to say any thing more here than simply to state, it is the Greek word corresponding to sheol of the Hebrew, and signifies the covered state, or state of death; in which, the Old Testament positively affirms, "there is no knowledge."—See Eccl. ix. 10; Psa. vi. 5.

The rich man is alive after his ecclesiastical death; but is stript of all his peculiarities and reduced to a state of wretchedness and torment. And does not the history of the Jews, as a people, from the overthrow of their temple, city, and sacrifices there, unto this day, or present century, fully justify the parabolical description given by our Lord of the misery to which they would be subjected under the new dispensation which was to follow theirs? No one can doubt this who has any knowledge of their history for the last eighteen hundred years: and if we have not understanding of their history, read the prophecies of the judgments threatened them, Lev. 26th and Deut. 28th chapters, and "be no longer faithless but believing." "Wrath has come upon them to the uttermost."—1 Thess. ii. 16. And Jesus said, relative to the overthrow of their city and the tribulation to attend and follow that event—"These be the days of vengeance that all things which are written may be fulfilled."—Luke xxi. 22.

Since the ecclesiastical and national death of the Jews—the rich man—there has been a claim maintained among them that "Abraham" is their "father;" but no relief has come to them from that quarter.

The desire expressed by the rich man, that further light or information should be given to convince the nation or people of Jews, by a resurrection of one from the dead, is met, in the parable, by showing that no further information would avail with those who had rejected all the previous light God had given them: and the answer—"neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead"—was shown to be true by the conduct of "the chief priests and pharisees" when Jesus actually raised a "Lazarus" from the dead, [John 11th,] they called a "council," and "from that day forth took counsel for to put Jesus to death." How true that they would not "be persuaded though one rose from the dead;" and after they had accomplished their bloody purpose, and put Christ to death, and he also had been raised from the dead, under such circumstances that there was no chance to doubt the fact, the same obstinate unbelief remained; and they gave large sums of money to the soldiers to tell the most silly and improbable lie that was ever invented; viz., That the disciples of Jesus came by night and stole Jesus away while they slept!

The Jews, as a nation, had their "good things" in their "life-time," or while they held the relation of bride to their Maker; but now being dead, nationally, in reference to that relation they are tormented, grievously and sorely tormented; and all their appeals, as to their relation to Abraham, have proved unavailing; and it has added not a little to their torment and sorrow to see the Gentiles enjoying rich blessings from which they find themselves shut out. We speak, of course, particularly of social, civil, and political blessing, in which they possessed "much" advantage "every way," in the days of their national prosperity. But an impassable gulf exists between them and the Gentiles now: but even that is nowhere said to be eternal. It will indeed continue to the end of this age, or dispensation; or till the Redeemer returns to Zion. Till that time there will be no national repentance; but, then will be fulfilled the prophecy of Zech. xii. 10–14.

The Jews, as a nation, hitherto have professed that their rejection of Jesus as the promised Messiah was want of evidence; like the rich man, in the parable, they have constantly cried, from the days of Jesus, for more evidence. "Let him come down from the cross and we will believe." But when he "rose from the dead," as the rich man is represented as desiring one to do, to convince the unrepenting Jews, instead of repentance being produced in them, as a nation, they put to death the witnesses of that glorious event. Who can contemplate the untold sufferings of that nation from the time Jerusalem was compassed about with armies, and their city destroyed, to the present generation, and not discover the propriety of the parable our Lord employed to illustrate those torments and their hopeless state?

Thus the parable, so far as the rich man is concerned, has a fair and full application, and illustrates the obstinate unbelief and consequent misery and torment of that people, after their final refusal to receive Jesus as the Messiah. Well did Jesus say to the Jews—"Had ye believed Moses, ye would have believed me; for he wrote of me: but if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words."—John v. 46, 47. These words illustrate what is said in the parable—"They have Moses and the prophets, let them hear them;" and "if they hear not" them, "neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead."

It only remains now briefly to consider that part of the parable relating to the poor man, or Lazarus. Prior to the change in the dispensations, from the Mosaic to the Christian, the Gentiles were poor indeed in religious knowledge, and excluded from the peculiar privileges of the Jews—the rich man. They could only approach the "outer court"—or "gate"—of the Temple service: where some of them sought the "crumbs" of knowledge which might better their condition. Still their general condition in regard to divine "things" was "evil." The time at length arrives when they are no longer to remain in this condition, and that change—to keep up the harmony of the parable—is represented by a death. They pass out of their previous state and find themselves in "Abraham's bosom"—partakers in that covenant God made with Abraham; for, "If ye be Christ's then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise."—Gal. iii. 29. To this honor they are brought through the ministration of angels—angellon—messengers. Christ gave his messengers commission to "go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Under this commission they brought many Gentiles into the Abrahamic covenant; for, "the Scriptures foreseeing that God would justify the heathen [the Gentiles,] through faith, preached before the gospel unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be blessed."—Gal. iii. 8. And the apostle adds—"So then they which be of faith are blessed with faithful Abraham:" they are in "Abraham's bosom:" a phrase which imports a partaker of his blessings and being in the same covenant relation to God. In this condition are all believing Gentiles, and are now "comforted;" while the obstinate unbelieving Jew from the time of Christ, or from the introduction of the Christian dispensation, has been "tormented:" and the "gulf" between the two dispensations is "impassable"—they cannot be joined in one: to come into the blessings of the Christian dispensation is impossible to any one still cleaving to the Mosaic for justification; and to return from the Christian to the Mosaic, is to "fall from grace," and to be swallowed up in the gulf.

We might greatly enlarge the proof that the foregoing is the true scope and design of the parable; but we believe enough has been said to satisfy the candid inquirer after truth, and we have no expectation that obstinate bigotry will be removed, even though another Lazarus should arise from the dead and affirm the truth of the exposition we have here given.

DIFFICULTIES.

FRIEND STORRS: If I get the right impression of your views, that the wicked have all their punishment whilst they live on earth, that death comprises this punishment, I fail to see that they have any more than the good, since all die. If you make their punishment to consist in the loss of the good the just receive, must they not have a conscious existence thus to suffer? How can the Queen of the south, or the men of Nineveh rise in the judgment and condemn a generation too wicked to be raised from the dead? or does the judgment precede death? And who are they that shall see Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven, and themselves cast out? and when shall they see it?

If we lay a great stress on certain portions of Scripture, do we not find ourselves embarrassed with others, that seem to stand in conflict? Has this not been the cause of so many creeds and sects in the world?

That man is limited in his ability to know and to do, and that within quite narrow bounds, is to us, often, painfully true; but when we attempt to set limits to the Almighty, we get quite beyond the commission assigned to the finite. The man that has existed in human form, a few years, died, and disappeared beyond all power of recognition. To appear again, as the man that was, is a sublime, a wonderful thought; learned only by revelation. So mysterious, that in the most enlightened nations of the world, there were those that thought Paul a babbler for preaching that doctrine. The day that shall reveal to us the manifested resurrection, will probably bring to our mind, that here we see in part and know in part. But let us thank God that when that which is in part shall be done away, that which is perfect shall come.

"Blessed day," as Dr. Scott says, when we shall receive a blessing as large as our capacities, durable as immortality, and surpassing our largest expectations.

MADISON, N. Y. Aug. 26, 1870.

WE hold that "The wages of sin is death," as Paul saith, Rom. vi. 23. The "loss" the wicked sustain is, they fail to "enter into life;" (Matt. xix. 17), because "Ye will not come to Me that ye might have life," saith Christ, John v. 40. "All" do not "die" alike. "The wicked is driven away in his wickedness," and his death is eternal; but "the righteous hath hope in his death;" for God and his Christ are pledged to restore them to life again "at the last day," and "they cannot die any more;" hence their restored life is eternal.

The life of the wicked is never restored. Would you say, the wicked must "have a conscious existence" to know they are in death? Do not forget, the punishment is not "to suffer," but it is death—a state in which there is neither consciousness nor suffering. Divest your mind of human traditions about torment being the wages of sin, and you will be relieved of the idea that death is no more to the wicked than to the righteous.

Your questions about the Queen of the South and the men of Nineveh, are sufficiently answered by saying, It was their conduct, and not their persons, of which our Lord spake. They showed an interest in the truth, and their actions proved their sincerity. In both these respects the Jews, of that "generation," failed; and Jesus tells them, that these heathen believers condemned the unbelievers before Him, who with far greater light remained unbelieving and impenitent; and that the judgment, then coming on that generation, would be justified and they condemned by the conduct of the Ninevites and the queen of the South.

You ask, "Does the judgment precede death?" The Scripture doctrine of judgment makes it twofold, viz., An investigating judgment, and an executive one. The first passes on all men while they live, or are on "probation" (which means, trial), and ends at death. The executive judgment takes place at the resurrection, when Christ, who has "authority to execute judgment," declares the final destiny of all men, and executes the sentence by raising those from the dead who are "justified unto life," and sealing up in the dominion of death all who have failed to secure this justification while they were in probation or on trial. The resurrection, therefore, is the judgment executed, and determines the eternal condition of both the righteous and the wicked: the first to life; the wicked, "not" to "see life:" death reigns over them eternally, because they refused the offered life when set before them.

You ask, "Who are they that shall see Abraham . . . in the kingdom of heaven and themselves cast out? and when shall they see it?" Your reference is clearly to Luke xiii. 28. If you will turn to Matt. viii. 11, 12, you will get a clue to the answer. Jesus there speaks of many coming from the east and west (Gentiles), and sitting down with Abraham . . . in the kingdom of heaven; and adds, "But the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness; there shall be weeping," etc.

Now, who are "the children of the kingdom" here spoken of? Can there be any doubt but what Jesus meant the Jews? If so, then Jesus is not, in the language referred to, speaking of the kingdom of God in the world to come, but of it in its embryotic state here. This kingdom belonged to the Jews, or Israel, according to the flesh, previous to our Lord's first advent; and He now tells them, for the rejection of Himself, "The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof."—Matt. xxi. 43. That is: the promises of the kingdom made to Abraham and his seed are no longer to be confined to the Jews or literal Israel, seeing they have rejected the King of this kingdom; but "many shall come from the east and west" and share with Abraham and all the prophets the blessings promised to him and his seed, while "the children of the kingdom"—the Jewish people—will be in "outer darkness," which will result to them in "weeping and gnashing of teeth"—untold misery. How exactly has all this been fulfilled; "many" Gentiles sharing in the blessings of Abraham, while the Jews—or, "children of the kingdom"—have seen the prosperity of such as accept Jesus, (whom they rejected), and have been themselves filled with sorrows unnumbered.

We think our friend will see in these things an answer to his inquiries, as to who should see Abraham . . . in the kingdom of God, with many from the east and west, while others find "themselves cast out," and when they shall see it. Those cast out were "the children of the kingdom"—or the Jews, as a "nation:" and the time when they saw it was from and after the time when that people were given up, and no longer owned as God's peculiar people or kingdom. Since then, Gentiles who believe, have become Abraham's seed, and share with him in his promised blessings, and are now, embryotically, in the kingdom of God, soon to be developed in all its glory.

This developed kingdom no man can see unless he is "born again." Saith Jesus, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God,"—John iii. 3. A man to be born again must first be begotten: and men are only begotten again "by the word of truth, and the Spirit of God;" so that no man can ever "see Abraham" . . . in the developed kingdom of God who dies in his sins; for, not being begotten again, before death, he has no life-giving principle in him to quicken him from the dead, and cannot, therefore, see the kingdom of God, and will not see Abraham, nor any other saint in that kingdom.

To be born again, in the strict sense of that expression, is to be made alive from the dead. In this sense, Christ was "the first-born from the dead;" Col. i. 18; "the first-born among many brethren;" Rom. viii. 29; and, "If the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."—Rom. viii. 11. By that Spirit Jesus was "born again," and was "the first-born from the dead:" without such a birth "no man can see the kingdom of God" in its development and glory; and such a birth no man can have till he is first begotten again by the Spirit of God; hence, no man who is destitute of the Spirit of God, or has it not dwelling in him, will ever be made alive from the dead "at the last day."

"IS ANYBODY CONVERTED BY THE LIFE VIEWS?"

THIS is a question often asked. We know the truth of "Life only in Christ" is powerful with some to lead them to Christ, who otherwise cannot be reached at all. A few years since, when we were preaching in Botanic Hall, this city, a gentleman called on us, and said: "You have been a great blessing to me. I came to this city an infidel and a blasphemer—I was led by curiosity to hear you preach at Botanic Hall—it was on 'Life only through Christ'—it was new and strange to me, and I became deeply interested, and determined to seek that life—I did so, and found the Saviour, and am now filled with joy in him. I went to my home, in another city, and told my wife I had given my heart to Christ to love and serve him, and she was induced to seek life, also; and now we are both rejoicing in the LIFE-GIVER. The Bible to us is a new and most interesting book, and so plain and easy to be understood—how different from what it used to be."

Such was a part of his conversation with us, and we could not refrain from praising God with our whole heart: bless his holy name. Here was given us living evidence that the doctrine of "Life only through Christ," presented and pressed home for the acceptance of the sinner, is made effectual by the Holy Spirit in leading to seek life. Again, we praise our Redeemer for his love and mercy.

Other instances are not wanting in which we have witnessed a like result to that named above; but we seek not to know how many are converted, but to be satisfied the doctrine we proclaim is the truth of God and honorable to his character and government. We are not, however, indifferent to the result, but we can trust that to the Author of the truth.

We desire all, who hold with us on the life theme, may not only present the glorious truths we have received, but urge it on sinners to seek life in Christ without delay; for, if death sets in on them before a union is established with Christ, they will sink in endless night, and "never see the light" again. Hasten, sinner, whoever thou art, to Christ for life. The theory is good, but you must have the experience or perish without hope. Delay not then another hour; take hold on Christ; consecrate yourself to him without reserve, and he will take away your sins and enroll your name in his "book of life." May that, dear reader, be your happy lot. Come now; make the consecration while you read these lines; let there be no delay—no putting the matter off for an hour. Be the Lord's now and forever. So shall you be raised "up at the last day," and live to die no more.

FROM EMELINE WOOD.

BR. STORRS: This is the third time I have attempted to write since campmeeting; but my head is so bad from erysipelas that I have been prevented. I praise the Lord for his loving kindness to us, Life Believers, in making all things work for our good. May He bless you and dear Br. Thorne abundantly with wisdom, health and strength, is my daily prayer. I am glad that so many consecrated themselves anew to God at our late meeting: for them it was a precious season, and we received the blessing, and, glory be to our Father in heaven, I feel it yet. May we all put on the armor anew; for we will need it, as we do not know what we may be called to pass through before our LIFE-GIVER comes.

I trust my health may be better soon, so that I may be able to do more for the Lord and his truth than ever before. I sent a large number of the "Campaign Documents" to Chicago a few days since; and now I will send a new subscriber to the HERALD OF LIFE—our blessed paper; and may it prove as great a blessing to the receiver as it has been to me. I bless the Lord that Sister Robertson ever said to me, "Sister Wood, it will be such a comfort to you:" and so it has; and God has blessed and prospered me so much since I took it that I now want everybody to have it. The subscriber I send is too poor to pay for it and is sick, so I send $1 for six months, hoping it will be as great a blessing to him as Sister Tubbs said it was to her when she received it: she said to me, "I have been a Christian twenty years, but I never heard of such love for one another as the Life believers have: and such letters. Do tell them, my heart is with them all; and how I should like to see them; but I shall in the coming kingdom." As she is an invalid and cannot go out, the paper is a great comfort to her. She is a sincere child of God.

FROM HELEN ROBERTSON.

BR. STORRS: I came here to Br. Percy's one week ago to-day, and found Br. and Sr. Percy well. The impression was at campmeeting that Br. P. was very sick, and that was the cause of their absence this year. He was sick last spring, nigh unto death; but the Lord blessed means used for his recovery, and his health has been better this last summer than it has been for many years in the past; for which, he and Sr. P. praise the Lord.

They were both very desirous to go to camp-meeting, but circumstances were such that they could not; but they are watching the signs of the times, and are hoping to be gathered with the redeemed out of every nation, very soon.

O what a hope! What a precious hope! And it really looks as if we would get home soon. My heart rejoices, and I say,

Come and reign,
Jesus, on thy throne.

The rest and the home will be sweet.

ROWAYTON, CONN., Sept. 16, 1870.

FROM J. S. POTTER.

BR. STORRS: I was very much disappointed in not being at the Anniversary of the "Life and Advent Union," where I could have seen our Editor, with many others whom I have not yet seen in the flesh, but who contribute from week to week such precious things to the HERALD OF LIFE. They have been food to the soul.

I love the paper much. It grows better and better. I am pleased with its Editor and his Assistant, Br. Thorne; may they both have wisdom from above, whereby they may be able to give the household meat in due season; for it seems we are living in an eventful time of the world's history. The beast that carried the woman, according to my mind, is gone into "perdition," and the rider will soon have to follow, for the Italians are after her in earnest. I am watching the events.

I inclose $5 for the HERALD OF LIFE. May it long live to herald forth the great plan of redemption—life from the dead to believers only.

MRS. SALLY DILLINGHAM, Ashland, Mass., sends $5 to renew her subscription, and writes: I prize the HERALD OF LIFE very highly, and hope I shall be instructed by it, as I have been the past year. I cannot do without the paper. I love its coming: it is all the preaching I have. I have no one to converse with on our Life views. With others I rejoice at the soon coming of my blessed Saviour. I do not feel like turning back from the blessed truths of the Bible, as held by us. The scales fell from my eyes, and I saw a little at first; then I began with your "Six Sermons" for my help, and found things therein which I thought were not in the Bible; but, by searching, found I was mistaken, for they were there. Some told me, I would be alone if I believed that doctrine, and I have been; but the Lord is with me and on my side, so I need not fear. O how I would like to converse with you awhile. Much love to all the brethren and sisters. I request an interest in all your prayers, that I may grow in grace and be fitted for the kingdom which is to come.

Take courage, aged pilgrim; for though you are far advanced in life, and a lone widow, God, thy God is near thee always; and He will bear you safely through: so, "fear not," but keep thine eye steadily on thy LIFE-GIVER, who knoweth all His sheep, and careth for them all, however alone they may be here. Soon He will gather his flock; then follows eternal joy, and "sorrow and sighing will flee away" forever.

MRS. R. W. PIERCE, Milwaukee, Wis., writes: I herewith remit a Draft for $40, the amount of my pledge. I was much pleased to hear how soon and willingly you got the sum you needed for the HERALD OF LIFE. May the good Lord bless all those dear ones that have given so liberally to this glorious cause. I am so glad that we do not have to resort to the "Festivals and Fairs" to get money "for the Lord"—as they say. When there is a willing heart, there is a way; and if we make a deposit in our dear Saviour's Bank, it shall never fail. Yours, in hope of soon seeing that "dear Friend."

J. HAMILTON, SR., Fredonia, N. Y., writes: I have been made happy while reading the report from the Brethren of the seventh anniversary of the Life and Advent Union, for the good spirit that prevailed, and for the strong evidence that the blessing of God rested upon the effort to hold forth the word of Life. I believe, with Br. Thorne, that God will direct.

FORGIVENESS.

MY heart was heavy, for its trust had been abused, its kindness answered with foul wrong—so turning gloomily from my fellow-men, one summer Sabbath day, I strolled among the green mounds of a village burial place; where pondering how all human love and hate find one sad level, and how, soon or late, the wronged and the wrong-doer, each with meekened face, and cold hands folded over a still heart, pass the green threshold of a common grave, whither all footsteps tend—whence none depart—awed for myself, and pitying my race, our common sorrow like a mighty wave, swept all my pride away, and trembling, I forgave.—J. G. Whittier.

I Shall be Satisfied.

Fade into mocking sands as we draw near;
Where in the wilderness each footstep falters—
I shall be satisfied—but O! not here.

Not here! where every dream of bliss deceives us,
Where the worn spirit never gains its goal;
Where, haunted ever by the thoughts that grieve us,
Across us floods of bitter memory roll.

There is a land where every pulse is thrilling
With rapture earth's sojourners may not know,
Where heaven's repose the weary heart is stilling,
And peacefully life's time-tossed currents flow.

Far out of sight, while yet the flesh infolds us,
Lies the fair country where our hearts abide,
And of its bliss is naught more wondrous told us,
Than these few words, "I shall be satisfied."

Satisfied! satisfied! the spirit's yearning
For sweet companionship with kindred minds—
The silent love that here meets no returning—
The inspiration which no language finds—

Shall they be satisfied? the soul's vague longings—
The aching void which nothing earthly fills?
O! what desires upon my soul are thronging,
As I look upward to the heavenly hills.

Thither my weak and weary steps are tending—
Saviour and Lord! with thy frail child abide!
Guide me toward home, where, all my wanderings ending,
I then shall see thee, and "be satisfied."

Can the Soul be Killed?

"Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul: but rather fear Him which is able to destroy both soul and body in hell."—Matt. x. 28.

These words are commonly supposed to teach that the essential nature of man resides in his soul, which is said to be a subsistance quite distinct from the body, which is only, we are told, a machine, constructed for the purpose of enabling the soul to live in, and hold intercourse with this material world. They are further asserted to imply the indestructibilty and deathlessness of the soul, which, it is affirmed, is altogether beyond the reach of any mortal injury, and that the utmost man can do is to destroy the material machine, or body, and effect its separation from the soul, which soars away to some new place, and in a new condition of existence.

Now I ask the candid and intelligent reader on what authority does he suppose that the soul is a distinct subsistence—a complete organization in itself—and constituting the human personality, apart from the body? Is this extensively prevalent notion derived from the Bible? Will the reader pause to recal any portion of the Sacred Scriptures, where the soul is so described as containing in itself the essential properties of the human being, and capable of a separate state of existence?

If we are not to hold the popular opinions about the human soul, what does our text mean? In reply to this question, I request the reader to examine the parallel passage as recorded in Luke xii. 4, 5: "I say unto you, my friends, be not afraid of them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do; but I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear: fear Him who, after He hath killed, hath power to cast into hell." In this version of our Lord's words, the word "soul" does not occur; and instead of "are not able to kill the soul," we have the words "have no more that they can do." The meaning then is clearly the following: Although wicked men are able to kill the Lord's people, they can do no more than this—they have no power to keep them dead,—they cannot destroy the soul or life which the Lord has promised to give his people, by raising them from the dead to die no more.

The word "soul" is to be understood in this passage as the same in meaning with the word life: in proof of which I ask the reader's consideration of the following passages which occur in Matt. xvi. 25, 26: "Whosoever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it: For what is a man profited if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul, or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" Now the word translated life twice in the 25th verse, and soul twice in the 26th verse, is one and the same Greek word in all four places. Why should one word receive different translations in two such closely connected and current texts? The answer is plain. The translators of the Bible held the popular heathen notions about the human soul, and therefore to have used the word soul in the 25th verse would have grated upon their ears. "Whosoever will save his soul shall lose it (!), and whosoever will lose his soul (!), for my sake shall find it." Hence they employed the word life in this verse, and the word soul in the verse following! But there is evidently no good reason why one Greek word, occurring as it does in this passage, four times consecutively, should be translated by two different English words. If the reader will substitute the word life in the 26th verse for the word soul, as is done in the previous verse, he will find a natural, and as I believe, the strictly correct meaning of our Lord's words, "Whosoever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it: For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own life, or what shall a man give in exchange for his life?" What our Lord says here is very plain; "Whosoever will save his life (in this world at the expense of his duty to me) shall lose it (in the world to come). And whosoever will lose his life (in this world) for my sake shall find it (in the world to come). For what is a man profited if he shall gain the whole (present) world and lose his own life (in the world to come); or what shall a man give in exchange for his (future and everlasting) life?" To lose the soul then, does not mean that the soul as a separate being, without a body, goes away to be everlastingly tormented; but means to lose the blessed privilege of endless life. When the soul is lost, the man himself, in his entire and complete nature, is lost, or cast away from conscious and endless existence, as Luke, in the parallel passage to that we are now considering, most clearly represents. "For what is a man advantaged if he gain the whole world, and lose himself, or be cast away?"—Chap. ix. 25.

The text at the head of these remarks is but partially and imperfectly understood by those who quote it with so much assurance in proof that the soul, as a separate being, cannot, and will not, be ever destroyed. What our Lord says is, that man is not able to kill the soul, or destroy the life which He will give his people; but He himself is able to kill the soul, and cut off the wicked from having endless or a future life. "Fear Him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell." And as our Lord warns mankind to fear Him as having the power to destroy the whole man, he evidently implies that such is the punishment which he will visit upon the wicked. The subjects of the future punishment will not be perpetuated in conscious sin and suffering, but shall be burnt up as chaff or stubble.—Selected.

The Probation or Trial of Adam.

BY JOEL A. SIMONDS.

In the beginning God prepared a kingdom, Matt. xxv. 34, which is to have no end.—Dan. vii. 14. He made the earth to be the territory of this kingdom, (Zech. xiv. 9,) and adapted it to this end. He laid its foundations so that it never can be removed.—Psa. civ. 5. He prepared it to bring forth grass and grain and fruit.—Gen. i. 11. This adaptation of the earth to be inhabited, was to be inseparable from its existence.—Gen. viii. 22. He made man to inhabit it, to have dominion over it, and over all the animals below him; to multiply and replenish it, and to subdue it. He made him to serve him as long as the sun and moon endure, throughout all generations, Psa. lxxii. 5. He made him of the dust of the ground; an earthy man, to adapt him to the position he was to occupy, and to the work he was to do. He gave him a law, to which he was to be amenable. It provided that by being obedient, and by having access to the tree of life, he might live for ever. It also provided that if he should be disobedient he should be excluded from the tree of life, and surely die.

When this preparation for the kingdom was complete, and all the elements of it were prepared, and their relation to each other established, then, God took the man whom he made and put him into the garden he had prepared for him, and gave him his instructions, and set him to work. In this position, and while engaged in the work assigned him, he had his probation or trial.

What kind of probation or trial did this impose upon him?

He was not on trial for any future good, to be given him when his time of trial should expire. No such object was indicated in any of the provisions made for him. He was not on trial for his life. This he already possessed; nor for any other life than that which he had, for nothing was said about any other kind of life. His probation was not for dominion over the animals below him, or over the earth itself. This had already been given him. He was not on trial for any better position than the one he occupied, and the developments which must legitimately grow out of it. He could not look for any better position, or higher destiny than was involved in his present surroundings, because no other was indicated by any thing that was made.

What, then, was he on probation for?

Simply, to retain his life and his position which he then had, by continued obedience; or to lose his life, and consequently his position, by disobedience. He ought to obey; he ought not to disobey; but he could do either, being responsible to God for his choice. This was the kind of probation imposed upon him. He had his life, he had his dominion, he had free access to the tree of life, his legitimate business was assigned him, and if he had continued obedient, he would have continued to live. His obedience and his blessings would have been at all times exactly equal. Each moment's obedience would have secured the blessings for each moment. He could not have earned by his obedience to-day the blessings for to-morrow. His unforfeited life and blessings depended on his continued obedience. His obedience and his blessings are inseparably joined together. God gave him the position, and the blessings prepared for him, before he was tried. The question in his probation was not, If you will be faithful, I will give you a good position with its blessings; but, I have given you the blessings I prepared for you. Now be obedient and retain them, and not disobedient and lose them. Such was the probation of Adam; but such is not our probation. We have lost the life, the position, and the blessings. The question in our probation is, He that believeth the gospel, and is baptized, shall not perish, (finally), but have everlasting life. Our position is to be gained. Adam's was to be retained. We have our position only by faith: he had his in fact.

How long was Adam's probation to continue?

As long as he continued obedient. When he disobeyed, his probation ceased. His life, and consequently his position and blessings, were forfeited. If he had continued loyal forever, his probation would have continued forever. It is not so in our probation. With us, probation continues only through the present life.

A restitution must restore the probation that Adam lost.

Total Depravity.

We speak of some men as being good men, but how does this accord with the idea that all men are totally depraved? In goodness there is virtue, and virtue is moral goodness. So if some men are possessed of moral goodness, how are all men said to be totally depraved, since total depravity admits of no goodness whatever?

There is a passage in Jeremiah xvii. 9, which reads as follows, "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." This is taken as the base of the above doctrine. Now, let us inquire, what is it that calls from the prophet such an expression? It would seem that Jehovah, the Almighty—is expostulating with Judah about their sin and, warning them lest they put their trust in man, urging them to trust in Him. The contrast used may be seen in this: "Cursed is the man that trusteth in man" . . . "For he shall be like the heath in the desert," etc. "Blessed is the man who trusteth in the Lord." . . . "For he shall be like a tree planted by the waters." Thus Judah was taught the utter helplessness of man and the almighty power, as well as mercy of God; and then, as if to remove whatever of doubt might remain, we find very abruptly declared the famous passage under consideration: which, let us examine, and perhaps a proper exegesis of it may dispel from our minds all doubts upon the subject.

First let us look at the two prominent words in the text, viz: "Heart" and "desperately." The former is defined, "The muscle in which is the seat of life." The latter is defined, "Hopelessly" and "incurably." There is another word in the text which equally demands our attention, it is, "Deceitful;" which means deceptive, and also has the sense of, uncertain. Now the word "heart" was used, by the Jews, often to express the whole man; sometimes the mind and, the affections; but in this case to express the seat of life, or that part which moves man to action.

By searching we learn that there are passages in the Old Testament where the word "desperately" is used, but translated differently, as in Jer. xv. 18, "Why is my pain perpetual, and my wound incurable" (desperate) "which refuseth to be healed." Another instance is in Micah i. 9, "For her wound is incurable," or desperate; or again—as the word will admit of such a definition—mortal; that is, past the help of humanity.

Again: the word "wicked" we are all familiar with; but what does it mean? We believe the following definition will bear close examination, to wit: A man who is wicked is one that is contaminated with evil. To be contaminated with evil is to be polluted or defiled; and to be defiled is to be diseased; therefore we conclude to be wicked is to be diseased. Now let us put this and that together and we will have the following paraphrase: "the heart (state of life) is deceitful (uncertain or deceptive) above all things, and desperately (incurably or mortally) wicked (diseased). Here we have the doctrine of total depravity in its simplicity; and when we speak of some men as being good, we do not mean that they are so intrinsically, but only as having certain traits in their character which renders them so in our estimation. Men are not totally depraved in regard to each other, for they possess the power of helping or assisting one another; and sometimes we hear of men dealing honorably and fairly with each other. It is only toward God that we consider them totally depraved.

Once more. When we speak of a man as being totally depraved, we do not mean that he is as bad, naturally, as he can be, but only as possessing within himself "no good thing;" or, to be more explicit, as having no power of salvation to save himself; and therefore we conclude, inasmuch as the seat of life is deceptive and incurably diseased, that man who puts his trust in man is like the "heath in the desert," good for nothing but to be parched and come to nought. But the man who feels that his wound, caused by wickedness, is incurable or his heart mortally sick, and looks to God and trusts in him for the great universal panacea of all disease to be applied to his heart, is indeed like "a tree planted by the waters." M. L. F.

Plain Words.

Men are generally willing to hear the Bible when it accords with their early instilled ideas; when it differs they often, and that unconsiously at times, set aside its teaching, as if they believed it to be destitute of authority.

If anything is to be gained by retaining dogmas and institution, the clearest statements in Scripture will, as a rule, be obscured and twisted by individuals and ecclesiastical corporations, sooner than they will yield to the voice of truth.

To speak of giving others the liberty of thinking for themselves, is to pretend to grant what we cannot withhold.

Quarrelling with one who differs from us on a question of philosophy, or Scripture interpretation, is immense folly; for if our opponent is wrong, the step we take is only fitted to confirm him in his error; and if we are wrong it will bind us to ours.

When men rail in argument, it is strong proof that they lack reason.

To conclude that men are bad because they differ in opinion from us, is to prepare ourselves for the blackest deeds of persecution, did not the civil arm restrain our passions. Hatred has wielded many a sword, and kindled many a flame.

If you blame a man who changes his views, you are virtually condemning him for not being God, who alone is incapable of growing wiser.

When a manufacturer adopts new plans, when a philosopher alters his conclusions to suit a fresh importation of facts, he is deemed worthy of approbation; when a student of the Bible renounces what he finds to be erroneous, and advances in the knowledge of Scripture, he is pronounced a fool by the unspiritual, the priest-ridden, and the vain, who, as yet, constitute the majority of mankind.

He who conceals a truth, robs the world.

It is far easier to be furious for othodoxy, than to be gentle and merciful for the honor of Jesus.

You are afraid of truth! If you were afraid of error, you would have none of that fear.

It was once in the eye of the world, disreputable to belong to a Christian congregation, it is now respectable to belong to one.

There are many friends of the poor slave abroad, who oppress their wives, children, and servants at home.

There is a way of smoothing over and down those who are beginning to search after truth for themselves, by assuring them that the points, however great they may be, attracting notice are of no moment.

Did he say "he would keep no more company with you as long as you held these views," then what was his company worth?

See how Jesus acted toward his apostles, who for a long time were most unteachable, and learn how to bear with the dull apprehension and the prejudiced around you.

Many profess to be trusting God for their eternal salvation, who cannot depend on him with child-like confidence for the supplies of to-morrow.

The safest place to lay up money is heaven, where moth and rust do not corrupt, and thieves do not break through and steal.

Keep your promises: what would you think of God if he could break his?

Obedience produced by the fear of hell, is the homage of the slave, the convict, and the serf.

Prayer: Its Object and Efficacy.

The object of prayer is understood by a knowledge of prayer. Prayer consists of adoration and supplication. These united constitute true worship. Therefore the great object of prayer is to "worship God."

In proof of the assertion that prayer consists of adoration and supplication let us examine the Lord's prayer. The expression, "hallowed be thy name," is the highest form of adoration—the sentence, "thy will be done," is the purest expression of praise; and the request, "give us this day our daily bread," is the most humble, confiding and child-like supplication.

Having thus investigated the object of prayer, we come now to consider the efficacy of prayer. As its object is understood by a knowledge of prayer, so is its efficacy.

The efficacious power of prayer is in accordance with the spirit of supplicating love. If ye forgive not, neither can ye be forgiven. The reason why men ask and receive not, is because they ask not in the spirit of prayer. Praying always, is to maintain the spirit of supplicating in love, and of trusting in hope, and believing in confidence. If we possess the spirit of prayer, when we supplicate the forgiveness of our sins, we "shall obtain mercy;" and if we ask for "daily bread," it shall be "measured" to us according to our willingness to bestow it on others. Therefore, "give to him that asketh," and do as you would have it done unto you: for so shalt thou receive, according to thy trustworthiness.

The christian spirit of prayer is to do to others in the same manner as ye would have it done to you, and to be as ye would have others be. This spiritual principle is that which produceth a reward, and also determines the kind of reward. God will grant all righteous requests made in the spirit of prayer, even to the plucking up of a mountain; and to ask in faith is to ask with that understanding of heart which would make the request a righteous one. We can never pray to God for that which is not in accordance with his will, because prayer is the desire of faith. Hence we conclude that the efficacy of prayer produceth a blessing.—Selected.

Nobody Sorry for Being Polite.

I am now an old pastor, and as I cannot preach any longer, I take great pleasure in thinking over the events of my long life. When I preached in the city of B——, I had two neighbors. One of them, who lived at the right of my cottage, did not seem friendly to anybody. He seldom spoke to any one on the street, and the boys disliked him very much, because he was very cross and crabbed. He was noted for being penurious, and seldom did any poor person receive a gift from him.

To the left of my cottage there lived a poor shoemaker, whose whole time was occupied in taking care of his large family. He had a very pleasing face, was friendly toward everybody, and was just the opposite of my neighbor at the right. Among the old shoemaker's eight children there was a boy about eight years old, who had blue eyes, red cheeks, light hair, and was as cheerful as a squirrel. His name was Little Peter, and though his father was poor, he had trained him to be very polite; and Little Peter was one of the most polite boys I ever knew.

For my part, I thought a great deal of him, and when his school teacher, who was a member of my congregation, told me how industrious and talented he was, I felt very anxious to see him have a good education. One winter evening, as I was sitting at my desk preparing my sermon for the following Sunday, I heard a rap at the door. "Come in!" I said: and what was my astonishment to find my neighbor who lived at the right of the parsonage.

"Please, sir, do not be offended that I trouble you to-night. I have an important matter which I thought to lay before you."

"I am very much pleased to see you," I replied, "and I hope you will speak freely."

"You know," replied the neighbor, "that I take a walk every day, and as often as I pass the door of the shoemaker who lives close by us, his little boy Peter salutes me with so much kindness and such a pleasant face that he has deeply affected me. Though he has kept it up for a year or two, I have never returned his salutation, and yet he is as pleasant as ever. So I have been thinking to myself that his politeness must be natural to him, and that the boy has a good heart. One day I thought that I would test him; and, accordingly, as I went by the shoemaker's shop, I dropped my money purse right near where Little Peter was standing, and then I hurried on. I thought I would see whether Peter was honest as well as polite, but I had not gone a dozen steps before he came running after me, and, handing me my money-purse, said to me; 'This is yours, sir; please take it!' Now, this circumstance has affected me very deeply, and I have thought that I ought to do what I can to help that poor family. I am advanced in life, and am rich, and need but little to live upon. So, in the first place I would like to help the shoemaker and his family; and in the next place, I would like to do what I can especially for Peter. What I desire of you, sir, is to give me your advice."

I took hold of my neighbor's hand, thanked him heartily for revealing to me such good desires, and then told him that I thought the poor shoemaker and his family were very worthy objects of his attention. I then told him that little Peter was a boy of unusual talents as well as of great politeness, and of undoubted honesty, and then advised my neighbor to provide for his education. He then promised that he would pay especial attention to the wants of the shoemaker and his family, and after half an hour's time, he bade me "Good-night;" but the remarkable circumstance so affected me, and led me to think over the change that God had wrought in him, that it was a late hour before I went to sleep.

The next week this same neighbor went into the shoemaker's little shop. The ceiling was so low that he could hardly stand up in it, and he found out that the shoemaker did not make shoes at all, but only mended them, for there were piles of old worn out shoes all around the room, but there was not a sign of any new leather, or of any new boots or shoes. Of course, the shoemaker was almost beside himself with astonishment to see the man who had passed for a cross and ugly person, and who seldom spoke to anybody, come into his shop, and especially address him in the pleasant manner in which he did.

The rich gentleman then said: "I am needing a new pair of boots, and I would like you to make me a pair. Can you do it at once?"

"Well—well—I can make shoes, and boots, too, but—but—really, I don't know—I believe I haven't got—I haven't got leather enough."

The truth was, the shoemaker did not know what to say, yet he knew that he had no leather in his shop that was fit for making boots, for it had been many months since he had made a pair, and he was really too poor to lay in a fresh stock of leather.

As soon as the rich man saw the poor shoemaker's difficulty, he said to him:

"Oh! well; never mind the leather; I will take care of that."

The shoemaker hardly knew what to think of him when he insisted upon his taking his measure. But the measure was taken, and the rich neighbor bade him "Good-by." That evening there was brought to the shoemaker a large roll of leather, and if his name had not been on it, he would certainly have thought it was designed for somebody else.

The next day a supply of flour, meal, potatoes, and beef was brought to the shoemaker's little shop, and he and his family were rejoiced beyond measure at the good fortune which they had met with.

But little Peter's education was yet to be provided for. My rich neighbor saw the school teacher in regard to him, gave him a sum of money to pay great attention to him, to teach him in special hours of the day, to provide him with all the books that he needed, and to prepare him for the University with the greatest care.

Now, I am glad to say that all the kindness which this rich man showed to the poor shoemaker and his family did not have the slightest effect toward making them lose their politeness or kindness of heart. The tide now turned greatly in the shoemaker's favor, and as he began to put one new pair of boots or shoes on another in his little bow window, his customers began to multiply, and after a few months he had to move into a larger shop, and his business increased constantly. Little Peter progressed very finely at school, but nobody could say to him that the good fortune which he had met with had spoiled him.

Now, when the rich man saw that his kindness was not misplaced, but that the shoemaker and his family, and especially Little Peter, deserved all that they had received at his hands, he determined to continue his kindness toward others. In fact, he spent the whole of his remaining life in seeking out and aiding the poor and neglected worthy persons in the city of B——. But it was his regret, to the latest day of his life, that he had not commenced such kindness before. Still, his regret was sweetened by the fact that God had used Little Peter's kindness and politeness to soften his heart, and to lead him to devote the last of his life to a high and worthy purpose.

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures." The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

REMARKS ON JOHN V. 28, 29.

BY JACOB GRIM.

WE have been asked if we would not give our views of John v. 28, 29. If we can be of any help to any one in understanding the meaning of the above text, we are willing to do so.

We answer, in regard to the literal interpretation of this text, we have no faith in it, from the fact, that it makes Jesus at variance with himself in John vi. 39, 44, 53, 57; and also, Luke xx. 35, 36; in fact there is not another expression of Jesus that is in harmony with it.

Is there any interpretation that will make this text in harmony with the rest of the Scriptures? We think there is. And first, we would inquire, What was the mission of Jesus to the world? In John vi. 38, He says, "I came down from heaven not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me." This agrees with Heb. x. 7, 9. "Then said he, Lo, I come (in the volume of the book it is written of me), to do thy will, O God." And what is this will? "Then said He, Lo, I come to do thy will, O God. He taketh away the first (covenant) that he may establish the second (covenant)." Here then we have the will of God stated plainly, and the mission of Jesus Christ to be, to take away the first covenant, or ministration of death, and establish the second covenant of Life. And in harmony with this, Paul says in Gal. iv. 4, "But when the fulness of the time was come (to make an end of the first covenant), God sent forth his own Son, made of a woman, made under the law." (What for? Paul), "To redeem them that were under the law. Here are some persons that need a Redeemer; and Paul says, Jesus came to redeem them; and he states that it is from under the law that he came to redeem them. This agrees with Heb. ix. 15, "And for this cause, he is the mediator of the New Testament (covenant), that by means of death for the redemption of the transgressions that were under the first covenant, they which are called (from under that covenant), might receive the promise of eternal inheritance." For many are called from under this first covenant, but few are chosen to eternal life under the second. "He came to his own (under this covenant), and his own received him not. But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become (under the new covenant), the sons of God, even to them that believe on his name. Which were born, not of blood (of Abraham's descent), nor of the will of the flesh (of man), but of God."

Now that the whole house of Israel were under this law or covenant we have the words of Jesus. John vii. 19: "Moses gave you the law, and yet none of you keepeth the law." And "Moses describeth the righteousness which is of the law, that the man which doeth those things shall live by them."—Rom. x. 5. Now as Jesus said, none of them had kept the law, therefore they were all guilty under the law. This law required the blood of the guilty, as we find in the example of the offering under the law; the bullock for the time being was made the victim for the sins of the people. Paul describes this law in Rom. v. 13: "For until the law, sin was in the world; but sin is not imputed when there is no law. Nevertheless death reigned from Adam to Moses," even though there was no law. "Moreover the law (of Moses) entered that the offence (or sin against the law) might abound."

Here we are prepared to make our starting point. Adam sinned under his law, and there was no redemption clause in the law; hence, we read, "In the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." But in the other, or Moses' law, there is a redemption clause by which the sinner by a substitute may have his sins remitted from year to year, and finally, if a suitable substitute can be found, he may be delivered from the curse of the law entirely. And has such a substitute been found? We answer, as God told Abraham, and as Abraham informed Isaac, "God will provide himself a lamb."

Now in order to be a proper substitute it must be one of the same family, made under the same law, and one who has kept the law in all its parts, in order to make the law and the law-maker honorable; that is, to show that the law exacts nothing but what can be kept, thereby justifying the law-maker, and condemning the law-breaker. Such an one we find Jesus to be. Born of a woman, born under the law, and then keeping the law, when condemning those under the law. He says, "Moses gave you the law, and none of you have kept the law."—John vii. "Which of you convicted me of sin?"—John viii. 46. Here Jesus openly calls upon them to convict him if they could. But we have the strongest testimony of the purity of Jesus under his trials for his people. Paul says in Rom. v. 14, "Adam was a figure of him (Christ) that was to come." Now, God bore testimony to Adam's transgression by condemning him to the dust and driving him from the "tree of life." And God bears testimony to the obedience of Jesus, under his trial, by raising him from the dead and showing him to many witnesses.

We have Jesus then a minister of the circumcision to minister to those under the law, who were condemned under the law. And Paul says, "that the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth."—Rom. vii. So that there are only two ways for a man to get from under this law; either by the abolishing of the law, or the death of all under the law; so that in winding up the Adamic law, it demanded the lives of all under the law; so in winding up the law, of which we are speaking, it demanded the lives of all under it. But God had made provision for the redemption of all under this law if a proper substitute could be found. We have shown that such an one has been found. Now for the result. "Because we thus judge that if one died for all, then were all dead."—2 Cor. v. 14. "Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree."—1 Pet. ii. 24. "For Christ hath once suffered the just for the unjust."—1 Pet. iii. 18. "Christ our Passover was sacrificed for us."—1 Cor. v. 7. "So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many."—Heb. ix. 23.

Here, from these passages, it is evident that Christ died in the room and place of some person. The next inquiry is, Who were those persons? "He died to bear the sins of many." "Because we thus judge that if one died for all, then were all dead." Here we have all dead in some sense, and one dying for all. Now, what says the Apostle, Gal. ii. 19–21? "For I (a Jew) through the law am dead to the law, that I might live unto God. I am crucified with Christ." Why Paul! was you put to death on the cross, literally? "O, no; but we as Jews or Israel, were all dead under our law; and as Christ died for all, I as an Israelite died with him; therefore I was "crucified with Christ; nevertheless, I live." Why, Paul! what do you mean; have you been raised from the dead? Just now you said, you were crucified; and now you say, you live! "Not I, but Christ liveth in me." Then you mean that you expect to live in the future, through Christ, do you? That is not what I am talking about now: but "the life which I now live in the flesh (as an Israelite) I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me (as belonging to the house of Israel) and gave himself for me;" for, says Jesus to his disciples, "Go not into the way of the Gentiles; but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel; for to them only am I sent;" and as the High Priest said, "Nor consider that it is expedient for us (Israel) that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not."—John xi. 50.

Now, if Israel was the nation under covenant with God, and they were at variance with God through the broken law, and the law condemned them to death, unless reconciled to God, and made one again—either by redemption or paying the debt they owe to God, it follows that the nation or the substitute must die. If the substitute's dying is satisfaction, then it is equivalent with God to the nation's dying. Then we can understand the Apostle, "If one died for all, then were all dead;" and Paul was of the all who were crucified with Christ; for, if the death of Christ was satisfaction to God for the demands of the law, then it was equivalent to all dying—"For, he hath made him sin for us who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him."—2 Cor. v. 21.

It follows, then, that if Christ died for the nation, then the nation was crucified with Christ; and Paul, as one of the nation, was crucified with him; and when Christ was dead the nation, in the sight of God, were dead in Christ; and when Christ was buried, the nation, in the eyes of God, were buried with him so far as the demands of the law were concerned. Hence, says the Apostle, "the life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me (an Israelite), and gave himself for me. I do not frustrate the grace of God: for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead in vain."—Gal. ii. 21.

Now, then, if Israel were all dead under their covenant, and were all crucified in Christ, it is manifest they must have had a resurrection of some kind in order to be alive in the flesh; and as Christ died for them, under their covenant, and his mission to the world was to do the will of God, and as the will of God, as we have shown, was, to take away the one covenant of Moses and establish the new covenant of Christ, so we understand the House of Israel, politically under Moses, died, and with it all that belonged to it. So we understand that all that were dead under that covenant were resurrected from under it, with a right to a life in the flesh, the same as Paul and any other Jew or Gentile, and free from all the penalties of the first covenant; and the establishment of the new covenant Jesus becomes the head of the House in the new covenant, as a Son, the same as Moses was of his house as a servant. "And now if any man be in Christ Jesus he is a new creation; the old things have passed away: behold they have become new."—2 Cor. v. 17. (E. P. Dis.)

We then understand Jesus as referring to the time of the removal of the law covenant in John v. 28, 29, as the time coming when all under that covenant, who were dead in a capital point of view, should hear his voice as the Son of man, appointed as Israel's Judge to execute judgment upon that nation; and they should all come forth; those that have done good, to the new covenant or new creation; wherein, also, ye are risen with him, through the faith of the operation of God, who hath raised him from the dead. Here we are said to be risen with Christ. Moreover the law entered that sin might abound. But where sin abounded (in this first covenant, and not outside of it), grace did much more abound. It came over to the Gentiles in the new or second covenant: "that, like as Christ was raised up from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we should walk in newness of life;" or, the new life: and as we—Jews under the broken law—were without strength, in due time Christ died for the ungodly, . . . and we also joy in God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the at-onement: as we understand it, by removing the covenant by his own sacrifice—and thereby removing the cause of estrangement; so we are made one, or at-onement with the Father by getting into the new life in Christ Jesus. Hence, Jesus has become the end of the law for righteousness to all them that believe (in him).

What of those that come forth to condemnation? "Moses says, a Prophet shall the Lord your God raise up unto you of your brethren like unto me. . . . And it shall come to pass, that every soul, which will not hear that prophet, shall be destroyed from among the people."—Acts iii. 22, 23. Were they all destroyed from among the people? You answer, No. What then are we to understand by this plain declaration of Moses? I answer:—The house of Israel, to whom Moses spake, were made the house by the first covenant, and they were destroyed from being partakers of the blessings of Israel, when Israel's house under the first covenant was transferred unto Christ, and his house under the new covenant. Israel under the first covenant lost their King, and became scattered as a byword. They that heard and obeyed came forth from under the old covenant and were transferred unto the blessings of the new covenant, and became members of the house of Christ; and thereby children of Abraham in the covenant of faith: of which we may say more at some other time.

IN CHRIST JESUS.

BY HELEN ROBERTSON.

"There is therefore now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit. For the law of the spirit of life, in Christ Jesus, hath made me free from the law of sin and death."—Rom. viii. 1, 2.

He speaks here of a law; calls it holy; also the commandment holy, and just, and good. He says the law is spiritual, too. Paul makes this law out pretty good. What is the matter? Why can't he and the law live in harmony, since it is all right? "I am carnal, sold under sin." Here is the trouble. The law is "weak through the flesh." This law throws light. "I had not known sin but by the law," says Paul. "For I had not known lust except the law had said, Thou shalt not covet." This law was light to Paul. It manifested what was before there only in a latent condition. Now he would like to keep it, but he can't. Evil is up in arms at once, and the terrible conflict goes on. Paul is taken a captive by the law of sin in his members. He can fight no more, but cries out, "O wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" He has seen his utter helplessness, and that there is no confidence in the flesh, so seeks it outside, and deliverance comes, "through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Paul has now got into Christ, and he says, there is no condemnation there, if ye keep away from the flesh, or the desires of the flesh, and walk according to the teachings of the Spirit. He has got into Christ, and there has got his eye fixed on another law. What is it? It is the law of the Spirit of life. A new law altogether. And what is better than all, it is "in Christ Jesus." Did not Paul desire at this point to have this law of spiritual life transferred from Christ to himself, to form a sort of spiritual or immortal entity in himself? No, no. He knew it was in better keeping. He had also got a thorough knowledge of himself, which was one important point gained; and of another he could also say, "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him against that day." What had Paul committed for safe keeping? Let him answer. To the Colossians he writes: "Ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God." Double safety here, "with Christ in God;" and, as Br. Grim said in his sermon at camp-meeting, when the time comes due, God will remember his children, for he has the note in safe keeping. Paul had this same confidence, for he says, "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory."

We think John teaches the same thing in his epistle: "He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself." Mark you, he don't say, he hath the life in himself, but the "witness in himself." "He that believeth not God, hath made Him a liar; because he believeth not the record that God gave of his Son." Let us look at this record. God has given it. Don't let us dare to trifle with it. "And this is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life."

Let those who were once enlightened take care, and not go back to the flesh, for what they once saw plainly was only in Christ. The only safety is in pressing forward toward the mark for the prize.

Jesus Christ is God's own beloved Son. And it hath pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell. This special gift of God, even eternal life, is also in his Son. No two interests, no two parties. All is a oneness. All is in Christ; and if we have the Son we have life. Abiding in ourselves, does this mean? No, no. God himself has recorded it, and he says, "This life is in his Son."

If we have been tempted through philosophy and vain deceit, and have got into the dark, and are laboring and heavy laden, let us go to Jesus, and learn of him. There all is light, and his yoke is easy, and his burden light. He is the vine, we the branches. Cut the branches off from the vine, and where is their life? Gone! They have no independent life of their own. The life is all in the vine. So with us. We are nothing separate from Christ. The life is there; the sap is there; the strength is there. Yes, all is there, even in Christ. He says himself to us, "Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself except it abide in the vine, no more can ye, except ye abide in me. I am the vine, and ye the branches. He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit, for without me ye can do nothing."

What could there be more beautiful? What more simple? The vine and the branches that we are all so familiar with. Let them remain united in a natural condition, and the branches bear fruit. Sever them, and the branch is henceforth good for nothing.

Lord help us to abide in Christ, and have his words abiding in us at all times; so we can bear good fruit, and be his disciples indeed.

Striving for the crown of life.

THAT BIBLE CLASS, NORMAL, ILL.

BR. STORRS: The accompanying communication to "That Bible Class," will probably explain itself. But I will add a few lines. After the reading of my third article to-day, there seemed to be increased interest manifested by some, and the discussion had commenced, when a gentleman arose and said, that he did not like that part of the paper that wanted all arguments from reason and nature left out. Also, that he did not like these anonymous communications. This was near the close of the meeting. He then moved, that the subject be dropped and the class take up the regular lesson for next Sunday; which motion was passed, though I know very well that many persons were opposed to it. But in this church, as in almost every other, there are a few ruling spirits, that have things pretty much their own way. Dr. S., the gentleman referred to, said, "The writer had probably come in for speculation," etc. I thought his remarks entirely uncalled for, and I know they were not approved by many present. When I came home, I wrote a copy of what I now send you, and it was handed to Mr. Leiper in the evening. Dr. S. is not a member of the church, but is one of the faculty of the University, and has considerable influence. He is a believer in final restoration, after a limited punishment. Of course I do not know but this will end the matter for the present, but the probability is that the subject will come up again after President E. comes home, as I have heard, from some of the class, that he made them a promise to this effect, some time ago. The fact is, there are some here who are "afraid" of this subject, although Mr. Leiper has said several times, "Don't let us be afraid of it."

Another gentleman present this morning (one of the teachers here), said he had no doubt my view could be supported by Scripture. It depended altogether on how the advocates of these different views interpreted certain texts; said that about a year ago he had heard Miles Grant in a debate, and considered him a very able man. For himself he could not at present give the subject the necessary study to enable him to decide. He knew what destruction meant, and he knew what everlasting meant, but he did not know what "everlasting destruction" meant. This gentleman was the leader of the class to-day, and was much in favor of the discussion. He said the spirit of the paper just read was right, and he thought we should all "search the Scriptures" more diligently on this point.

Yours, in hope,
E. H. PECK.

NORMAL, ILL., Aug. 21, 1870.

[We omit the communication read to the Bible Class, and give the following letter of Mrs. Peck's, sent to the leader of the class, afterward, which will explain matters in the vicinity of the "Normal University." All schools and colleges must meet the question of man's nature and destiny, willing or unwilling.—ED.]

NORMAL, Aug. 21, 1870.

MR. LEIPER: As my former communications to the class were sent to you, I will trouble you with just this one more. I was informed before service this morning, that I was suspected of being the writer of the papers recently read before the class. I did not suppose it probable that in so small a company the writer could remain unknown very long; and now a love for what seems to me to be the truth compels me to acknowledge that they did come from me. It seemed to me this morning that one ought to have considerable courage to bear all the weighty words that were uttered in regard to the writer; but the fact is, a natural nervous timidity causes me to shrink from everything of the kind. My whole nature is opposed to making myself prominent or conspicuous in any way; and this is the reason why I preferred taking some little part in our discussion, if I could, under an assumed name. But as I said, my love of truth is stronger yet than this feeling, and induces me to give my real name a little sooner than I had intended.

It seems to me I could not have made myself understood in my paper of this morning. I thought I said that "our only object is to find out if possible what is truth?" and also, "If I am wrong I desire above all things to be set right;" and yet it was remarked that I had "probably come in for speculation, and merely to hear what could be said." Now it seems to me that I am entitled to some little credit for honesty and veracity; and it also seems a little strange that the class should decide on one Sunday to go into an examination of a subject of great importance to us all, and on the very next Sunday, without any good reason, as it seems to me, conclude to drop it at once and altogether. I may be mistaken, but I thought there was a desire on the part of some members of the class to take up this subject, before "Truth Seeker" had written a word. But some of our number were not willing. Now, as I asked once before, why is this, if we are not afraid of it? Here in this little company of Bible students are individuals holding no less than three different views of the Bible doctrine of future punishment. We all know that the word of the Lord is not yea and nay. "Thy word is truth," said Jesus; and he prayed that his disciples might be sanctified by the truth. If God's word is not yea and nay, it follows that only one of these views can be the right one; and why should we not study to know which it is?

Dr. Sewell said, not long ago, that he cared so little to make proselytes, that he would not turn his hand to get any one to believe as he did. Now it seems to me the Dr. would be willing to do very much more than turn his hand, if he really knew that his fellow-creatures would be made happier by believing as he does. I have that much confidence in the Dr.'s benevolence and goodness of heart. Believing as I firmly do, now, I am very much happier than when I used to believe that the Bible taught endless torment; and I can see the goodness and mercy of God as I never saw it before. I think it would have the same effect on other minds to see this truth clearly; and for this reason, and this only, I feel anxious to do the little I can do to help them see it.

Another point on which I think I was misunderstood this morning. I did not object to bringing into the discussion any arguments from "nature," "reason," etc., excepting those that seemed to be opposed to the Scriptures. If there are such arguments that agree perfectly with the word, in support of any view, I should say, let us have them, by all means; and if Dr. S. can show me from reason, nature, and the Bible that final universal holiness and happiness is the true doctrine, I shall be glad to believe it.

So far as this class is concerned, I am now perfectly willing to drop the subject; but if it should be decided at any time in the future to reconsider it, I shall be ready to give my understanding of the Scriptures bearing on it, which were read before the class this morning.

I think that in justice to myself, this concluding paper ought to be read before the class next Sunday.

Yours, respectfully,
MRS. J. E. PECK.

A SOUTHERN METHODIST'S HOPE.

THE following extract from a Sermon, preached by a Methodist "Presiding Elder," on the 21st and 28th of August, with the attending remarks, was received by us from Dr. J. F. Lee, Union Co., N. C.

TEXT. Rom. viii. 25.—"The objects of hope are legion. Three only shall be the subject of the present discourse, (28th ulto.,) namely, 1st. The resurrection of the body. 2d. The immortality of the soul. 3d. We shall know each other when we get home to heaven."

He said, "This same body will be raised at the last trump—thank God—I do know this same body of mine will be raised and united again with my immortal soul. I thank God for this hope."

Nearly all he said on the resurrection is comprised in the following quotations:

2. "The Immortality of the Soul." "We have presumptive evidence of its immortality from the testimony of Plato, Socrates, etc. The classical scholar may readily call to mind the passage in Homer, relative to the spirits conversing, etc. One passage from Scripture is sufficient to prove the immortality of the soul, viz., 'The wicked shall be turned into hell and all the nations that forget God.' David said—The child could not come back to him, but he would go to it!"

On the 3d division: "he declared he would see his wife the first of any when he went to heaven, and know her, and love her; that he did not believe with Fletcher, that he would be one hundred years in heaven and not know or see his wife, though she was all the time by his side! O, no! the love we have on earth—special, particular love, will be renewed in heaven. Our memory will not be lost. We shall recognize all in heaven whom we knew on earth. Thank God for this hope! We love some more than others. Christ loved Peter, James and John; but he loved John the most of any. I thank God for this particular special love. This same body will be raised at the last day, and my immortal soul will be united with it; and I will see my wife again in heaven—thank God."

He repeated the words, "I thank God—and thank God" so frequently that I hardly know how often, whether fifty or one hundred times.

One text was sufficient to prove the immortality of the soul! and the fact that the rich man saw Abraham and Lazarus in heaven and knew them was all-sufficient to prove all he said!

He solemnly declared, "he could not see how any man could preach the gospel, who did not believe in the immortality of the soul"—"he believed it was impossible to preach the gospel, unless we believe in the immortality of the soul! nor could we comfort or console the sorrowing souls, at the death of their departed loved ones, unless we believed it!" "I thank God for the privilege of visiting the sick and the dying, to tell them they are going home to heaven, and will then see, and recognize their loved ones, who have gone thither before them. I thank God for this privilege—I thank God ——."

I decline making any remarks on his sermon, and send you the foregoing brief sketch of it, nearly in his own words. Had it been taken down, (the whole sermon)—it would not give you a more correct view, or a more exalted opinion of the preacher, so far as his knowledge of the text is manifested throughout his discourse. "If our Gospel is hid it is hid to them that perish." Paul in his epistles, or in the Acts of the Apostles, shunned to declare the immortality of the soul. He never once mentioned it; nor did he, nor any of the inspired, illuminated penmen of the Scriptures name it; no, nor nine tenths, or ninety-nine hundredths of what this Presiding Elder advanced in his sermon.

According to his statements, the sequence of which would be, that Abraham, Dives and Lazarus were cotemporaries; that they were acquainted, and that Abraham and Lazarus died previous to the death of the rich man. All, says this Pres. Elder, "who were acquainted with each other, will recognize, (when they go home to glory), one another." I must confess that in the multitude of words, contained in his sermon, he gave utterance to one truth, i. e., "that of all the words in the English language, there is not one word so commonly misapplied, or so little understood, as the word hope." His discourse is a proof of the truth.

Methodist ministers seem to be illuminated far beyond the bounds of Revelation, and rely on Heathen writers for the proof of this belief; they sermonize on eternal torments, woe and misery, and on the immortality of the soul almost in every discourse; and, according to Elder Black, it is impossible for them to preach the Gospel, unless they believe it. Well, I suppose there is such a thing as, The Gospel of Methodists: and The Methodist Gospel is very different from what Paul preached. SUFFICIT.

P. S.—I want to procure "Documents." Tracts teeming with the weapons that will annihilate the fancies of heathen philosophy, the fictions of poets, and the fallacies of Theologasters. The tracts and documents are in harmony with the Bible.

Note by the Editor.

Let us know what "Documents" you desire, and we will endeavor to furnish the supply at short notice. We think you have good mission ground, if the sermon reported is a sample of Southern preaching. Pagan darkness!

DEATH AS A MOTIVE.

"THE Advent Herald," in an editorial headed, "Death not the Mighty Motive," justly rebukes the practice, so common among believers in the immortality of the soul, of representing death as a motive to repentance, etc. It says:

"From the frequency with which death is referred to in preaching and prayer-meetings, books and conversations, one might suppose that it must be presented in the Holy Scriptures as the mighty motive to lead men to repentance and a life of godliness. On examination, however, it will be found that it is seldom if ever thus used. The only passages which with any show of reason are often quoted as leaning in that direction are Isa. xxxviii. 1, and Rev. ii. 10.

"The Advent Herald" then shows, very clearly, that the two passages named have no such meaning as is attributed to them, and will admit of no such construction; and its argument is conclusive. It concludes its remarks as follows:

Sometimes the words, "Therefore be ye also ready, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh" (Matt. xxiv. 44), are quoted as referring to death. But this is a perversion of the text—an exposition that is unwarranted by the context. The coming of the Son of man means the coming of the Son of man, the descent of "the Lord himself" from heaven (1 Thess. iv. 16), and not an event that occurs almost every second of time.

When will men learn—especially public teachers—to give "that blessed hope" of the glorious appearing of Jesus Christ, the resurrection from among the dead, and the establishment of the everlasting kingdom of our Redeemer, the place in their teachings which it occupies in the Oracles of God? If "our beloved brother Paul" "in all his epistles" speaks "of these things" (2 Pet. 3d chap.,) why should not ministers, now-a-days, in all their sermons allude more or less to them? By what authority is the coming of the Christian's best Friend placed so far in the distance that a telescope is almost needed to see it, while his "last enemy" is perpetually paraded before him? Why are the apostolic "words of comfort" to bereaved ones (1 Thess. iv. 13–18; 1 Cor. 15th chap.,) if read at all on funeral occasions, treated as silent letters, and not as living burning verities? Why is the mighty, Scriptural motive to godliness, drawn from the crown as well as the cross of Christ, thrown into the shade, and the fancied fable of the world's conversion and our liability to die at any time dragged into the foreground? Is it not because the prophecy of 2 Tim. iv. 3, 4 is being fulfilled before our eyes? Read, reflect, and answer.

FROM W. H. WHITMAN.

TO THE READERS OF THE HERALD: We are living, it seems, in the last days of Gentile rule. We may attend the meetings of the sects, and we will never hear them speak of the signs of the times, the coming of Christ, nor the resurrection of the dead. Why is it so? Because they have substituted an "immortal soul" to go to heaven or hell at death, instead of preaching the coming of Jesus and the resurrection of the dead. We cannot enjoy ourselves with them, because they deny the great truth of the Bible.

It seems the French dynasty has gone down, and the harlot woman's destruction is now pending. What next? Will not the Man of sin be revealed, whose coming is after the working of Satan, with all power, and signs and lying wonders, and with all deceivableness of unrighteousness in them that perish, because they receive not the love of the truth, that they might be saved? Does not this show the workings of "Spiritism?" Has not the Mother of harlots, and her daughters, set at naught the truth of man's nature, the coming of Christ, and the resurrection of the dead? Is not the world now ripe for "Spiritism" to come in and take the lead? Is not the world about ready to accept the coming man of "Spiritism?" Has not Romanism and Protestantism ignored the great truth of Life only in Jesus Christ?

We feel certain some will object to these questions, for they think the Man of sin has been revealed in Romanism. Now let us all wait, watch, and pray. For if the Man of sin is yet to be revealed, it can be done in a very short time. And there is no telling how soon God's trump will raise the dead saints, and change the living ones. So let us wait, and be ready.

"EARTH'S PURIFICATION."

To the article on the last page, under the above head, we call the attention of the writer to what seems a discrepancy, if not a contradiction of Paul's testimony. While the earth is undergoing a purification by literal fire, he says:

"The people of God during this fiery ordeal . . . will be caught away to meet the Lord in the air," and this will be what Isaiah means when it is said, "Come, my people, enter thou into thy chambers . . . until the indignation be overpast," etc.

He then represents these, "waiting in those chambers," as keeping "the feast of the tabernacles," and remaining there, "until the new earth is prepared for their reception." He then speaks of "many of them that sleep in the dust," awaking, and adds,

"But ere they awake, the . . . heavens shall depart as a scroll, revealing our glorious LIFE-GIVER as he descends to perform the last act in the great scheme of human redemption, viz: to raise the dead."

The discrepancy is this: The writer seems to teach that the living saints will be "caught away to meet the Lord in the air" before the purifying fire sweeps over the earth; and that the dead, or sleeping saints will not have their resurrection till after that purification of the earth.

If this is his meaning—even if we believed in the burning being a literal fire, we could not accept such an exposition, because Paul saith, "The dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air," etc. The Apostle is here very explicit in stating that the saints who are sleeping in the dust of the earth shall rise from the dead before the living ones shall go to meet the Lord in the air.

THE TREE AND ITS FRUIT:

OR, LIFE FROM THE DEAD TO TORMENT AND KILL AGAIN A SPECIOUS HERESY.

IF a resurrection from the dead with torment after and dying a second time "is the wages of sin," or the penalty of the law, then how is an atonement to be made? Did Christ die twice? Did He rise from the dead and suffer torment for awhile and then die again? If not, how are his sufferings and death once an atonement for sin? or, how did He vindicate the claims of the law, seeing He did not come under its penalty at all? Surely, this new invention of penalty strikes down the atonement, as Christ did not come under any such "curse of the law." In this sense of the penalty, He was not "made a curse for us." But the Apostle affirms, "Christ hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us."—Gal. iii. 13.

Here then we plant ourself—Christ has not "redeemed us" at all—as He did not suffer such "a curse" as that of life from the dead to be tormented and die again—or the penalty for sin was to die "once," and not two deaths, as maintained by the advocates of a future life to the wicked, with torment and another death. Such a doctrine is a virtual denial of the atonement, and "Christ is become of no effect" for salvation "from the curse of the law," according to that theory. But "Christ being raised from the dead dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over Him" . . . "He died unto sin once"—"Christ was once offered for sin."—Rom. vi. 9, 10. Heb. ix. 28. If once in death is not "the wages of sin," we repeat it, no atonement is made, and there is no deliverance for any child of man from the curse of the law.

To our mind it is a self-evident truth that no wicked man, dying in his sins, will ever live again: his death is final and eternal: "he is "holden with the cords of his sins," and "utterly perishes in his own corruption."—Prov. v. 22. 2 Pet. ii. 12.

WHAT IS DEATH?

CRUDEN, is his Concordance, under the word Death, thus expounds its meaning, and the nature of the curse which Adam has transmitted to his posterity.

"Death," he says, "signifies the separation of the soul from the body,—this is temporal death. A separation of soul and body from God's favor in this life, which is the state of all unregenerated and unrenewed persons, who are without the light of knowledge, and the quickening power of grace, — this is spiritual death. The perpetual separation of the whole man from God's heavenly presence and glory, to be tormented forever with the devil and his angels,—this is the second death, or eternal death. To all these kinds of death Adam made himself and his posterity liable, by transgressing the commandment of God in eating the forbidden fruit.

This strange and unnatural definition of the Scripture word death, is that which is generally held by modern Christian teachers. Can such extravagances fail to shock the understandings of an intelligent and truth-seeking people? Who can be surprised that such teaching should furnish a theme for the severest sarcasms of the skeptic, and enable him to point the finger of scorn at the Christian profession? If the above be the definitian of the Scripture term death, then it must be applied, to be consistent, to other passages where this word occurs. "We see Jesus, who was made a little lower than the angels for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor, that he by the grace of God should taste death for every man."—Heb. ii. 9.

According therefore to the definition given by Cruden, Christ must have suffered this threefold death. 1. Temporal Death, or the separation of soul and body. 2. Spiritual Death, or the separation of the whole nature from God's favor in this life. 3. Eternal Death, or the perpetual separation of the whole man from God, to be tormented forever with the devil and his angels! Can any one believe that Christ suffered this? Of course not; not even the "orthodox" believe this, though in consistency they should. They urge a commutation theory to remove their difficulty.

In the following passage the word death occurs three times. "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, he also himself likewise took part of the same, that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil; and deliver them who through fear of death were all their life-time subject to bondage."—Heb. ii. 14, 15.

Now the common sense principle of interpretation requires us to understand that the death mankind feared, the death the devil had the power of, and the death which Christ died, are all the same. If, therefore, it is the threefold death which satan had the power of, and mankind feared, Christ must have suffered this threefold death. But this would have made redemption impossible, because one element in this death is eternal torment in a state of perpetual banishment from God! Modern theologians and Scripture are as much at variance, on this topic, as their theology is at variance with common sense. The passage just quoted, moreover, obliges the conclusion that death in the apostolic age, and prior to that period, had no such mystic sense as that which now has the accredited seal of popular theology, viz: a separation of the conscious and immortal soul from the unconscious body; that, on the contrary, it was regarded as a complete and dreaded dominion over the entire conscious humanity, which blasted the hopes, froze the energies, and broke the spirit of the race so far as no clearly defined views of a future life by resurrection were possessed. Under such circumstances, its melancholy anticipation sat like an incubus upon the life-loving heart of humanity—it was a "bondage" which clung with dismal and oppressive tenacity to them all their life-time, and from which they could only be effectually delivered by a sure and certain hope of resurrection from the dead, through the resurrection of Christ. Surely, it was the fear of this all-engulfing death, not of the threefold death of modern theology, which begat the "bondage" of which the text speaks.

DOES THE SPIRIT LIVE WHEN MAN IS DEAD?

WE never expect to satisfy those who, like the Sadducees, think a resurrection impossible because they cannot comprehend "how the dead" are "raised up." As to the state the spirit of man is in while dead, it is in vain to speculate; and we can know nothing about it further than God has been pleased to make known. The offence with our opponents is, that we maintain the dead are unconscious—that there is "no knowledge in sheol"—the state of the dead. This is what strikes the death-blow to their natural immortal-soul theory.

The idea that because consciousness may cease in this present state and yet the spirit be alive, therefore the spirit may be alive, though unconscious, after the man is dead, is not well founded. A fact is undeniable. While the man is alive the signs of life are evident; but when the man is dead, there is no sign of life, and therefore no evidence of the spirit being exempt from death; to pass beyond that point, looking for life still existing, is to launch into an unknown land. That the identity of the man is maintained by the power of his Creator, we have never doubted, and have always contended. But that life is essential to maintain that identity is what lacks proof. And to assume that if the life of the entire man is suspended, God cannot restore the same man to life, is a palpable denial of the resurrection of the dead; it is an error that originates in "ignorance of the Scriptures and the power of God." It has been said that the identity of the body depends not upon the same particles of matter of which the body was composed, but "upon organization." The same identical organization must of necessity, when made alive, develop the same identical mind, and we have no occasion to suppose the mind or spirit had been kept alive to re-inhabit a house built for it. Not to philosophize about this matter, we regard the objection, that if the whole man dies, then to resurrect would be to create anew, which cannot be the same thing, just as we would the objection of an unbeliever in the days of Abraham, who might have said to that Patriarch when about to offer up his son as a burnt offering—"Abraham, if you thus sacrifice your son, the promise of a multitudinous posterity through him can never be realized; for if God raise him up from the dead, as you say, it will not be your Isaac—it will only be one like him; and you can never know certain that it is Isaac that God promised should 'come forth out of thine own bowels;' surely it will not be that Isaac, and God's promise will fail after all."

The truth is, unbelief is never satisfied, and never can be. All we have to inquire is—What has God said? Has he said he will raise the dead? Has he told us that any part of man is exempt from death? Has he said, that in order to enable him to raise the dead, man must be only half dead? If so, there is to be only half a resurrection; for that which is not dead cannot be raised to life.

The expression "breath of lives" (Gen. ii. 7), is not expressive of a "double life." The original is ha'yim, and is the same in Gen. vii. 22, where, in speaking of the death by the flood, "of fowl, of cattle, beasts and every creeping thing, and every man," it is added, "all in whose nostrils was the breath of ha'yim." The expression, Gen. ii. 7, therefore, imports nothing more than that man was made to live by the same breath which was common to fowls, beasts and creeping things. It was the breath of all lives, or of every living creature as well as man. Many examples of this truth might be urged from the Scriptures, but we think this is sufficient.

As to the text, Job xxxiv. 14–15, we think it is God's Spirit, and God's breath that is there spoken of. In the previous chapter, verse 4, Elihu had said, "The Spirit of God hath made me, and the breath of the Almighty hath given me life;" thus showing how we are created and by what means man lives. Then, in the same discourse, he says, "If he (God) set his heart upon man, if he (God) gather unto himself His spirit and His breath," [by which man was "made" and had "life," what would be the result?] "all flesh shall perish together, and man shall turn again into dust." That would be man's destiny, if God withdraw His spirit and breath from man. This text, therefore, we regard as decidedly against the idea of a "double life" in man. The same explanation is applicable to Isa. xlii. 5, as to that by Elihu.

The text, Zech. xii. 1, has a rational exposition without resorting to the preposterous idea that there is a man within the man formed of the dust of the ground, or a distinct entity, called spirit or soul. The Mosaic account of man's creation gives no countenance to such an idea.

The term "spirit," Zech. xii. 1, is ruach. Turn to Prov. xxix. 11, and we find the same word translated mind: "A fool uttereth all his mind—ruach—but a wise man keepeth it till afterwards." Does a fool utter—yotso, bring out—all his internal entity when he speaks? Again: God saith, Hab. i. 11, of the Chaldean—"Then shall his mind—ruach—change?" Did the Chaldean's "second," or internal "entity" change?

To assume that the mind—ruach—is a distinct entity, and so constituted as to form a second man, which may live independent of the man formed of the dust of the ground, is an unfounded assumption.

The text Zech. xii. 1, means no more than that God formed an intelligent being with mind—a mind of a higher order than other animals.

The text Job xxxii. 8, expresses the fact that there is a spirit—ruach—mind "in man," in consequence of which he is capable of receiving "the inspiration of the Almighty," and so obtain "understanding;" but proves nothing of a distinct entity, or real being in man, called a spirit. The very idea, to us, is a palpable absurdity. Man is man, and not two men. This notion has filled the theological world with confusion. "The spirit of man within him" is the mind, and not an entity. "Our spirit" with which "the Spirit bears witness," is our mind. "Understanding and knowledge are ascribed to" man as man. If there is in us an entity, called a spirit, that is capable of receiving "understanding and knowledge" independent of our organization, let it be proved. It never has been proved; though it has been and still is often assumed. Again we say, man is man—he is a unit; when, therefore, it is said—"the Spirit beareth witness with our spirit," it is but saying, that its testimony is in agreement with our own consciousness of the fact.

The text Eccl. iii. 21, taken with its context proves that man and beasts "all have one breath"—ruach—spirit, or breath, "so that man hath [in death] no pre-eminence above a beast, . . . all go to one place." Surely, in the very next verse he does not contradict himself! A foolish man might, but a man wise as Solomon did not do it; hence he did not affirm (verse 21) what is so often alleged, viz: that man's spirit goes up and a beast's down at death! No: the verse is an affirmation of the truth of what he had just said—"Man hath no pre-eminence above a beast," [in death;] "all go to one place." He then challenges any man to produce the knowledge in evidence that the spirit of the one goeth upwards and the other downwards at death. The verse is a question and challenge. "Who knoweth the reverse of what I have just stated?" That this is the sense is obvious from the context, and also from the 9th chapter, where he affirms "there is no knowledge in sheol"—in the state of the dead.

On Eccl. xii. 7, the same remarks are applicable that we have made on Job xxxiv. 14–15. "The Spirit" may be understood of the Spirit of God, by which man was made of the dust of the ground, which, when God resumes or withdraws to himself, "who gave it," man shall return to the dust as he was. We are further confirmed in this view from the language of Solomon in Eccl. viii. 8, "No man hath power over the spirit to retain the spirit . . . in the day of death." Here the man is one, and the Spirit is another. The man cannot control the Spirit. It leaves the man—God withdraws His Spirit—man dies; and unless God again "sendeth forth" His "Spirit," they will remain dead.—See Psa. civ. 29–30.

"Her spirit came again," Luke viii. 55, evidently means no more than the spirit of life; i. e., she revived. In this sense the term spirit is often used. Thus it is said of Sampson, when he was fainting with thirst, Jud. xv. 19, "when he had drunk his spirit came again, and he revived." Also, 1 Saml. xxx. 12, it is said of a man who was found faint in the field, that they made him drink water, and gave him figs and raisins to eat, "and when he had eaten, his spirit came again to him:" i. e., his vitality, or vital energy was restored. So in Luke viii. 55, Jesus said, Maid, arise, and her vital energy returned, and she arose straightway.

The "grain of wheat," 1 Cor. xv. 36–37, to our mind, teaches an actual death; and that whole chapter is a clear statement of no future life without a resurrection; and that the first Adam was not spiritual, (verse 46,) but was of the earth, earthy, (v. 47,) and such are they also who are only of the first Adam, (v. 48.) We do not question but what there is a "germ" from which God will bring up the resurrection man; but admitting that to be a fact, it does not prove that germ is a living spirit; it is quite as likely the germ is to be found in some portion of the bodily organization, which the power and omniscience of God preserves till the time it shall come forth at the call of the Son of God, quickened once more by the life-giving Spirit of God.

"Your life is hid with Christ in God," Col. iii. 4, has no bearing on the subject to favor the view of the spirit of man being alive when the man is dead, as we can see. Paul was addressing Christians who were living; not talking about "disembodied spirits." The life of these living saints, to whom he wrote, was then "hid with Christ in God;" hence, he adds, "When Christ, who is our life"—the author of that life of which he spake—"shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory." Christ never did—and we have no authority for supposing he ever will—appear a "disembodied spirit." The Christian's life spoken of in this text is clearly that eternal life of which Christ is the author, and which he is coming again to bestow on those who now "die unto sin." This "life exists when the" man is dead, who dies united to Christ. To say, simply, it "exists when the body is dead," it seems to us, falls short of the truth.

To say "these spirits will God bring with him"—Christ—is not speaking, in our judgment, as the oracles of God. God brought Christ "from the dead," (Heb. xiii. 20), and Paul assures the Thessalonians that so certain as "Jesus died and rose again, even so them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him"—from the dead, of course; for that was the place from which "God brought that great Shepherd of the sheep." The apostle teaches us that this work is a work of resurrection; for, saith he, "the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God, and the dead in Christ [not the alive] shall rise first, then we who are alive, and remain—unto the coming of the Lord—shall be caught up together with them [the resurrected ones] to meet the Lord in the air." Their spirits did not come down from heaven with Christ; but the dead saints are "brought again from the dead" at the voice of Christ and by the power of that Eternal Spirit which brought Christ from thence. Thus, when Christ returns from heaven, "whether we wake or sleep," i. e., dead or living, then shall we "live together with him:" i. e., when he returns—not before; for the life spoken of is eternal life—"Christ dieth no more;" and they who are accounted worthy to attain that age, and the resurrection from the dead, cannot die any more.—Luke xx. 35–36; Rom. vi. 9; 1 Thess. iv. 14, 16, 17.

Having said thus much on the subject suggested, we leave it for each one to satisfy his own mind as to what is truth on the topic; feeling assured that nothing is gained to the cause of truth by an admission of a spirit entity in man. and those who do it will find our opponents will give them no rest by such admissions. They will find it is only an apology for their unbelief and lack of knowledge of the power of God: and it will be used by them to push the admission that the spirit lives, when men are dead, to an acknowledgment that it is also conscious. We could very easy believe the latter if we admitted the first. But we firmly believe the man is dead: in other words, the entire life of the man is suspended; and if there is no resurrection, there is no future life.

REVIEWERS REVIEWED.

THE "Star in the West," a Cincinnati journal published in the interests of the doctrine of final restoration, reviewing some arguments affirming the endlessness of future punishment, put forth in the "Standard," a Baptist publication, of the same city, says:

"We object to the doctrine of the endlessness of punishment, and make bold to affirm of that, that from its nature it cannot commend itself, nor be commended by others, to the affections of the world. True punishment is filial in its character, and although it may not be 'joyous but grievous,' nevertheless, as the apostle teaches, 'afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them that are exercised thereby.' It is because the doctrine of endless suffering permits no afterward, and is cruel, vindictive, and malignant, serving no good end in the divine economy, and violating the first principles of the Eternal Love- that we object to it.

Our friend, of the "Star," has fallen into the common error of using the terms "endless punishment" and "endless suffering" interchangeably. This, of course, is not surprising, since he looks at the matter from the stand-point of inherent immortality, but it is seen to be far from reasonable or logical when viewed from the stand-point of Scripture teaching on the subject. If he had simply said of endless suffering, "it is because the doctrine . . . is cruel, vindictive, and malignant, serving no good end in the divine economy, and violating the first principles of the Eternal Love," he would have stated a proposition which he could have defied the world to controvert; for the theory which represents God as keeping beings in a state of torment with no idea of benefiting them or others, racks with cruelty, vindictiveness, and malignity, and, therefore, offers grossest violence to the principles of Divine love. But, using the terms punishment and suffering interchangeably, he overlooks the fact that there is a punishment that "permits no afterward," which is not "cruel, vindictive, and malignant;" which does serve a "good end in the Divine economy," and which is in perfect accord with all "principles of the Eternal Love." That punishment is death — "the wages of sin." It is a punishment which, when properly understood in its relation to man's real nature, does "commend itself," and "is commended by others, to the affections of the world." Even sinners, when they come to understand it, not only see justice in it, but also recognize it as an act of love. Our friend forgets that punishment is not always designed to benefit its subject, and he offers the following salient argument. He says:

"True punishment is filial in its character, and although it may not be 'joyous but grievous,' nevertheless . . . afterward, it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby."

"If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, which will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother, and that, when they have chastened him, will not hearken unto them, then the parents were to bring him to the elders of the city and have him stoned to death.—Deut. xxi. 12. This was a punishment that did not yield the peaceable fruit of righteousness to him who received it. But our good neighbor will hesitate ere he calls it cruel, vindictive and malignant, and serving no good end in the divine economy."

Well, yes, we think he will "hesitate," at least. In fact, we think he will not do it. Seriously now, dear Mr. Editor of the "Standard," did you understand your "good neighbor," of the "Star," to denounce temporary suffering as cruel, vindictive, etc.? Did you fail to observe that he was talking of "endless suffering?"

Into one error these Cincinnati editors have both fallen. Paul is not speaking of "punishment," as such, in this connection. He says: "Now, no chastening for the present seemeth joyous, but grievous; nevertheless, afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby."—Heb. xiii. 11. Punishment is any pain or suffering inflicted because of disobedience; and hence it may differ entirely from "chastening," which is always designed to correct, and prepare for future good. Webster says: "Punish and chasten differ in the object aimed at. The former is designed to uphold law—by the infliction of penalty; the latter is intended, by kind correction, to prevent the repetition of faults and to reclaim the offender." It will be observed that in the law cited from Deut. the "rebellious son" was first to be "chastened" (for discipline and correction, of course) and if the chastening had not the desired effect; if he was still stubborn, hard-hearted, and rebellious and refused to "obey the voice of his father, and the voice of his mother," then he was to be stoned in the manner described, in punishment for his rebelliousness, as an example to others; for the language is, "so shalt thou put evil away from among you; and all Israel shall hear and fear." It is chastening which is designed to yield "the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them which are exercised thereby;" punishment, as such, has quite another aim. Paul uses the term "chastening" in its true Scripture sense of correction, or discipline.

What child of God has not been subjected to this chastening? "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth." There is love in God's punishments. He does nothing harsh except as a last resort, and always the very best thing that can be done. But His chastenings are all love, and they are kindness at every step. There is no wrath or vengeance in them. The discipline may seem harsh; we may not be able to see why we are dealt with in this or that way, but we feel sweet consolation in knowing that it is all the work of love, and hence that there is no needless suffering. We may not be fully aware of those faults or weaknesses which God designs to correct and cure, and we are very likely, therefore, to count the discipline very "grievous," but when it has yielded "the peaceable fruit of righteousness" we rejoice and thank Him for even His harshest dealings. Even when the rod of chastening is upon us, faith whispers that God is all-powerful, and then we feel that nothing will be done amiss. The thing He aims at will surely be accomplished. The whole Divine economy is love, and there is nothing about it which, rightfully understood, does not "commend itself to the affections of the world," but eternal woe is no part of that economy. As sinners are brought to see that all God's dealing are in love, they love in return, and are won to Christ. Could all religionists be brought to see it there would be a far greater degree of faithfulness practiced, and less reproach brought upon the name of religion.

THE advocates of inherent immortality, for the lack of Scripture argument, are constantly crying out, "All nations and people have believed in the immortality of the soul." This is not true; though uttered, doubtless, under the impression that it is. But "ignorance is the mother of devotion," is an old saying: and certainly it is "the mother of devotion" to the doctrine of inherent immortality; or else some other worse element is; for there is no such doctrine taught in the word of God. This fact is what makes its advocates fly to heathenism for help, and cry out, "All nations and people have believed it."

MR. CONSTABLE, Prebendary of Cork, in reviewing a Mr. Pridham, who had set up this old plea for inherent immortality, thus responds to it, in "The Rainbow" for Sept:

In his endeavor to strengthen his position, Mr. Pridham refers to heathen opinion. He says that he might "make nature also an opposing witness in this controversy; for the voice of conscience, whenever audible at all, confesses an indefinite futurity of joy or woe." When will this old mistake be removed? We beg leave to tell him that so far from there being an all but universal belief on the part of heathen nations that all souls would exist forever either in woe or joy, it was their all but universal belief that there was no future life at all for good or bad. Tartarus and Elysium were favorite topics with poets, and favorite themes in schools of philosophy, but were laughed at and rejected by the great mass of mankind, whether educated or ignorant. We dare say that Mr. Pridham will be surprised at this, for he has probably all his life been hearing the contrary. We will, however, lay facts before him, and ask him to correct his opinion. Of all the schools of heathen philosophy the Epicurean was the most widely prevalent. It denied a future life altogether. But perhaps he will say that the mass of men believed it. We hope he will accept the testimony of St. Paul, that the mass of men had no such belief. He will find the apostle's testimony to this effect in 1 Thess. iv. 13. Perhaps he would like to see a testimony from an early Christian writer to the same effect. He shall have it from Tertullian, who is the more to be heard here, as he labors to show, as much as possible, that heathen opinion concurred with his notion of the immortality of the soul. In one place he says, "to the belief of this (viz. the resurrection) truth compels us—that truth which God reveals, but the crowd denies, which supposes that nothing will survive after death:" he adds—"the wise, too, join with the vulgar crowd in their opinion sometimes. There is nothing after death, according to the school of Epicurus. After death all things come to an end, even death itself, says Seneca to like effect:" (vol. ii. 215–16 Tertullian. Edition Dr. Roberts). What then becomes of the universal heathen belief in the immortality of the soul? It is a myth repeated in our ears till we have believed it! The truth is that belief in immortality was not a part of heathen belief. Christ came—not to confirm an existing belief—but to restore a faith which had been lost. Mankind in Christ's time believed there would be no future life for any: Christ came to announce that through himself there would be eternal life for his redeemed.

NO HOPE TILL CHRIST'S RETURN.

SECULAR papers, politicians, and popular theologians, are all fancying that out of the wars and revolutions going on in the old world is coming their millennium—or, "peace and safety," without Christ's personal return from heaven. In this we have no doubt they are all doomed to disappointment. Yet the "millennium" is at hand, by the personal return and reign of Christ on the earth. We give those who fancy a millennium without the presence of Christ, personally, the following extract from the Introduction to a volume of Sermons by John King Lord, who died in Cincinnati, Ohio, 1849. The author of these Sermons was son of the late Dr. Nathan Lord, who was President of Dartmouth College, Hanover, N. H., for about 35 years. The extract is as follows:

"There is nothing in the disordered nature and constitution of man; nothing in the organizations of social life, which are but the aggregation and embodiment of depraved individuals; nothing in the law of life and continuance impressed by the Creator equally upon individuals and collective bodies; nothing in the prophecies of Scripture which have been fulfilled in the past history of the nations; nothing in the present state of the world, Pagan, Jewish, or Christian; nothing in unfulfilled prophecy if interpreted in consistency and harmony with the past; nothing in the doctrinal theology of the Bible, or any ethical science built upon it; there is nothing in all or any of these which justifies the belief of a self-restoring power of man, or the progressive development of society into a perfect state, or any purpose of God to produce by his word and Spirit in connection with natural civilization, a universal perfect state before the dissolution of the present order of things, and the second coming of Christ. But, contrarily, it is evident, that the universal perfect state which is promised in the Holy Scriptures in which righteous men shall possess the earth, God has provided for by a particular and express supernatural covenant, which is independent and exclusive of all natural civilizations, and has its successive fulfilments in all ages, only as they are successively overthrown. . . . It cannot fail to impress the diligent student of the Bible, that the inheritance of the earth is not promised to mankind in general, descended by ordinary generation from Adam, who is of the earth, and earthly; but only to the ecclesia, who, by a supernatural generation, are descended from the second Adam, the Lord from heaven. To Adam no promise was made, but remotely and obscurely, that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head. To Noah none was made, but in respect to earthly and natural society. 'But to Abraham and his seed were the promises made;' and to them only with express and specific limitation: 'He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ.' Only in this distinct and independent supernatural line do we obtain: 'If ye are Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise.' The inheritance is equally specific; namely, the regenerated earth: 'For, in thy seed all the families of the earth be blessed.' Till that predicted time of restitution, when the the earth is alien, wicked, and abominable. It is vexed by the passions of evil men, and all the related ills of a fallen state. It is plagued by unchristian and anti-Christian powers, that fill it with confusion, violence, and crime. These allied powers of evil are symbolized in Scripture as ferocious wild beasts, and their course is described equally by letter and by symbol, till it is terminated by judgments of God: Dan. vii."—pp. 79–82.

'Redeemer, King, Creator,

"GO WORK."

BY A. BOYNTON.

IF ever there was a time for God's people to feel and act, it is now in the harvest time; in the harvest did we say? Rather the gleaning after the harvest. And are we thus? what then is our duty? Go out quickly into the streets, lanes, highways, hedges, and compel them to come in.—Luke xiv. 21, 23.

1st. As a preparation to and for work, we must be really consecrated to the Lord ourselves; all our being, power, will, time, money, honor, all, all must be laid on the altar of love, cheerfully laid there, more than this, kept there a living (or constant) sacrifice."—Rom. xii. 1. Then is the vessel fit for and can be used by our Master, Jesus. Then it is, God works within us both to will and to do of his good pleasure. Then we can work the works of God, as the sons of God, holding forth the word of life.—Phil. ii. 13–16. But the soul thus qualified oft inquires, Lord what wilt thou have me to do? Not to be dictatorial in this matter,—for God's Spirit, through or by the word addressed to your understanding, your reason, must direct,—we will give a little of our experience, in hopes thereby, to help some of the little ones. While comparatively few are called as public teachers, yet, "let him that heareth say, come." And if we are slow of speach we can turn Colporteur; buy a small trunk for about fifty cents, fill it with such matter as we deem best, and take it as our companion as we go out among men. This is our ammunition box, which should be always well supplied and ready for every emergency; it helps amazingly as an introduction for us anywhere. A poor pilgrim must sell when he can; it answers a twofold purpose; 1st, helps keep him in funds; and 2nd, it tests the one who buys, showing his desire to receive the truth, and by a small investment induces him to study more readily what he has paid for; as we prize things according to what they cost us. We love this work, it requires little capital and no "license" from the powers that be. Here is a great privilege to gospel pedlars over those who trade at "Vanity Fair." Why should not more of us use it? The Mail and Post Office too; what means of blessing. The postage having been paid once on your publications, you can hand them in at any Office for individual distribution, so that any friend may be reached through their P. O., without further travel or time. See how the world do in these matters, and go thou and do likewise.

One point seems to be overlooked. All of God's children are to make it their first, their special work to save men. "Seek first, (not first, and forever after put it in the background, making it the last thing, or perchance omitting it altogether) the kingdom of God, and its righteousness; and all these things shall be added to thee."—Matt. vi. 33. God's blessing follows obedience. The reason why God is not seen more in temporal things, is, we have reversed the order. Let me repeat it. brethren, we seem to have mistaken our calling; or, at least, we neglect to furnish ourselves for it. The trader or buyer of produce, cattle, etc., as he goes out is furnished with the "means" of trade; every one prepares himself, that his needs may be supplied; but it is the creature or animal wants that all look after. Who furnishes himself to work for God.

"Go work." O that this might sound in all our ears and so affect our hearts as to induce right action. Yes, right action. This is obtained by a prayerful and careful observance of the mind of the Spirit, as seen in circumstances and things, together with a subjugation of that unruly thing, the will. There is a zeal not according to knowledge; we think a good deal of that is seen and felt from our opposers. God pity them; they know not what they do.

Our paper, the HERALD OF LIFE, for some weeks past, after reading, we have said, It is too good to lay by idle. Introduce it to your friends; get these truths before the people. Give away, if you can, sell if you must; or lend if they will not buy. Let the holy leaven be diffused wherever the meal is found to receive it. Sow the seed; what if the fowls do pick the most of it up; a few precious ones may be gathered into Eternal Life as the result. The salvation of one is greater gain than millions of gold, which perisheth. Well, brethren, whatever you may do in this matter, we shall heed Jesus' words to Peter: "What is that to thee: follow thou me." Wilt thou "go and do likewise?"

WEST BATAVIA N. Y. Sept. 1870.

LETTER TO AN ORTHODOX FRIEND.

BY ELD. J. PARRY.

WHAT do we think of this French and Prussian war? Louis Napoleon took a great stride north, to milk the Prussian bull; and, not only went back dry, but was tossed over the fence. Served him right. That other old bull at Rome must now take care of himself; and we shall see if his Infallibility will save him; his horns are broken off, and all he can do is to bellow and tare up the ground with his cloven hoofs, till he is cast in the lake of fire, brimstone, and saltpetre that is to be his final doom, according to the book.

The scarlet beast, that has carried this poor old Pope so long, has had a pretty good scorch of this lake of fire himself; and if his people, the French, do not come to terms with the enemy, their boasted beautiful city may soon be part and parcel of that same lake of fire; for the beast and false prophet are both in the same boat, and shall go alike into perdition. Only think; nearly 500 of Rome's biggest and best men stand up before all the world, in the nineteenth century, and blasphemously declare that old man in the vatican "infallible!" Is not this the climax of presumption and folly, filling up the measure of his iniquity, sitting in the temple of God, and claiming his attributes as God on earth? What other attribute of Deity will vain man usurp to himself? The serpent in Eden pronounced him immortal, "Thou shalt not surely die," but be as gods, knowing good and evil; and all the churches have endorsed this first lie; and stick to it, in spite of the declaration, "The soul that sinneth it shall die," etc. Well, I thank God I am out of this vain delusion. It is enough for me, that immortality is promised to those who seek for it, by patient continuance in well doing, at the resurrection of the just.

Note by the Editor.

The foregoing letter was received some ten days since. Things have progressed in regard to the Papacy since it was written. The wolf seems to be in the Papal fold, and "we shall see what we shall see."

FROM DR. J. F. LEE.

DEAR BROTHER: Dreams, fables, and frailties constitute no small portion in the cup of human notions. The phantoms of hope, the pride of life, the innate desire of self-indulgence, are as natural to man as hunger or thirst. Man's first and last wish is, the gratification of his feelings, his lusts. He is inclined to place his happiness in such enjoyment, and were he assured that he could always remain healthy and vigorous, and continue in his present state for six thousand years, he would not exchange his situation for all the honor, glory, and immortality that will be conferred on the saints at the last day. What is happiness? What is it to be happy?

The definitions given to the words are various and numerous, and would be much more so, were the notions of every mortal, since the scene in the garden of Eden transpired, now be added to mankind.

Cicero uses the word felicitas, felicity, implying success in one's undertaking; but, as an abstract term, employs these words: vita beata—beate vivere—as more appropriate for happy and happiness. The happiness of life, in his estimation, consists in virtue only: "beate vivere est una positum in virtute—sempiterno œvo frui." He employs other words as expressive of happy and happiness, such as, "fortunatus, beatus, felix, faustus, gaudere, lætari," etc., etc., but these may suffice.

Webster gives us various definitions. Some suppose man's first desire is for endless happiness. What they mean by such an expression, it is not so very easy to say. But were I permitted to give to it such an interpretation as suits nature in its unconverted state, I should unhesitatingly aver, that, the natural man's first and only wish is for the endless gratification of his lusts. Grant him this, and he would say, "It is enough." How many seek happiness in everything under the sun, but pure virtue? Some are quite unhappy when deprived of a chew of tobacco! the pipe, the segar! Some are longing for French brandy, Holland gin, rye whiskey, Irish whisky, rum, ale, porter, cider, all sorts of stimulants—and when their longing is gratified, O how delighted, how happy, how "O, be joyful," are they! What glorious frolics. Pic-nics make many folks happy. Man seeks happiness in rich apparel—a gold-headed cane, a quizzing glass, a luxuriant goatee, whiskers.

Since the day Adam bid farewell to Eden this world has been one vast graveyard for the dead, and a lunatic asylum for the living. Man unenlightened by education, uncultivated, untaught either by the wisdom of the world, or even by revelation, does not seek happiness where alone it may be found. And even a vast majority of those professing the Christian religion are not better than Judas Iscariot, or the Jew, who cried out, crucify Him, crucify Him—Jesus Christ, the Saviour of men. And millions who believe, or profess to believe they have immortal souls, will barter themselves for a glass of brandy, and drown their sorrows and cares in the bowl—strongly as they believe in eternal torment for the wicked. Their first wish is sin—the violation of that law that leads or brings to Christ, that teaches them to deny all ungodliness and worldly lusts. Worldly lusts and ungodliness are the very things their appetite craves; just what they wish and desire. Do they naturally crave such a life, such a bliss or happiness as the gospel promises to those who love God? I think not.

All men are naturally deranged—laboring under a mortal disease. It is clearly, faithfully described in the law of God; and the gospel points out the remedy, the effectual cure, the only Physician, who can cure the maladies of mind and body. Here then in the holy Bible the disease and the infallible cure are made known. The Physician asks no price, no money. The cure is warranted. Ho! all ye diseased, and lunatic—come and drink of the water of life. Will they all come and be healed? Many are called—few chosen.

To enumerate all the vices and abominations in the world is not necessary; enough is said of them in the Bible, and history furnishes us with a black catalogue of crimes. Each one knows his own antecedents and proclivities, and may ascertain, upon a slight self-examination, how he stands in the light of divine revelation. From all the writings, sacred and profane, ancient and modern history, biography, I have ever read, I come to this conclusion: no man uninspired or not taught of God ever longed for or desired sincerely, or sought for happiness, such as God alone can give—no man naturally ever thirsted or hungered after such righteousness as is brought to light in the gospel of Jesus Christ. It is vain and idle, if not iniquitous in any theologian or doctor to imagine that man by nature has an innate desire for immortality, and then conclude, from such a false fancy, that he has really an immortal soul! No, no; man is mortal.

FROM MARIA M. WEAVER.

BR. STORRS: Again we find ourselves in a land of strangers. This last move was the hardest for me to be reconciled to of any yet made. But it seemed to be in the order of Providence.

"Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan his work in vain;
God is his own interpreter,
And he will make it plain."

If we are only where God wants us, it is the safest and best place on earth. There seems to be an opening for gospel labor here. We intend to commence work in a few days. Expect to see some good accomplished. Never lived in a place yet without making a few fall in love with the truth, under the blessing of him who hath said, "Lo, I am with you, always."

When we get meetings going we would be glad to see brethren from the "regions round about" come in to help us. Br. J. C. Day, may we not expect to see you? Are there not others who can "come over and help us?"

The songs and sermons, exhortations and prayers of the camp-ground are still sounding in my ears. Glad I had a chance to see the poor pilgrims before coming into this place. Should time continue, how pleasant it will be to meet again, where "free breezes may blow." How different the free spirit is from the spirit of bondage. And yet we would not abuse this freedom. It should have some sort of limits.

The HERALD is to live. Of course it is, till all who love it are dead. How could we do without it? I wish those who think it right to adorn themselves with the vain things that unholy fashion-seekers wear, could be persuaded that their money would be more profitably spent in payment for the HERALD and some good tracts. O it is dangerous to get the spirit of this world so much as to feel obliged to trim and re-trim, cut and re-cut, make and re-make every time the "Empress Eugenie" appears in a new dress. Is it not foolish? Is it not beneath the dignity of those who are sons and daughters to the King of another country?

Those who have means to follow the vain fashions of earth, but set the example for those who are poor; those who think they can wear "gold and pearls and costly array," without being proud, or having their hearts set on them, set the example for those with weaker minds who cannot so do. It is a question with me if any one can be decked contrary to the gospel without having their minds badly influenced thereby. God help us to "glorify him in our bodies which are his." Amen.

WENDELL DEPOT, Mass., Sept., 1870.

FROM L. H. ROWE.

BR. STORRS: I have the privilege, through the mercy of God, of saying a few words to those of "like precious faith," who are scattered abroad over this wide earth. I am rejoicing in the love of Jesus, and in the fellowship of his waiting people, and am anxious for the dawn of that day which shall gladden the hearts of the weary-worn pilgrims of the cross, and cause their mourning to be turned into joy, and when "sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

Well, children, the good Lord is very precious to me, and I thank his dear name for what I enjoy in my poor heart. I rejoice that "the grace of God which bringeth salvation," and which "hath appeared unto all men," is sufficient to keep me in the right way when assailed by opposition without, and doubts and fears within. But I feel that I am one of the least of God's dear children. Poor in this world's goods, worn down with disease contracted in our late war in this (so-called) Christian land, I am at times almost despondent. And then again, when I think of the nearness of that day when sin and suffering will be swept away, and the whole universe of the Creator will be free from the curse and taint of sin, and every creature on the earth shall be found praising God; then joy and peace springs up in my soul; and I really feel that I can well afford to endure to the end; for my divine Master has said, "He that endureth to the end, the same shall be saved." Glory be to God! how this promise cheers us on the journey, when everything around us seems to retard our progress and hedge up our path. Bless the Lord, there is a strong arm to lean upon; and one who is Almighty and able to save has promised "never to leave nor forsake us." Tried and tempted on every hand, and having many easy-besetting sins to guard against, the way looks dark to me, oftentimes, but I think I can express the sentiment of Paul under like circumstances: "These light afflictions, which are but for a moment, work out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory."

But notwithstanding all these things which becloud my mind, at times, there is a bright side to the picture; and there are many hours of sunshine when my whole being is filled with that peace which is "like a river." And knowing there is a crown laid up for me, if faithful, I desire to so live "that I may attain unto the resurrection from the dead," and be made "equal unto the angels," to die no more.

LEWISTON, ME. Sept. 20, 1870.

ELD. W. S. CAMPBELL.

FROM HIS DAGUHTER, MRS. N. H. IVES.

BR. STORRS: Father wished me to ask you to send his paper to New Britain, and state that his address will be NEW BRITAIN, CONN., after this. His health seems to be improving; but he cannot walk any yet, and may not for some time to come.

His desire to be at home has been so strong that mother has concluded to go, as the doctor thinks he can be moved now without any injury.

OBITUARY.

FELL asleep, at Lincolnville, Crawford Co., Pa., Sept. 7, 1870, MARSHALL W., only son of C. N. and Mary A. BUZZELL, aged 3 years and 11 months.

Thus again has the enemy triumphed, and in nine hours our precious one yielded to that dreadful disease cholera. Dear brethren pray for us, for if it was not for our blessed hope we should be well nigh heart-broken. Oh, how our hearts echo the cry, "Come, Lord Jesus, and come quickly," and bring our loved ones from the land of the enemy. May we be an unbroken family then.

Now little Marshey sweetly sleeps
Beneath the cold, cold ground,
No sound can ere disturb his rest
Until the trumpet's sound.

Then he'll awake and join the blest
On that immortal shore,
And in the kingdom ever rest,
And shout his sufferings o'er.

Your Br. in affliction,
C. N. BUZZELL.

NEVER MIND.

What's the use of always fretting
At the trials we shall find
Ever strewn along our pathway?
Travel on and never mind.

Travel onward—working, hoping—
Cast no lingering look behind
At the trials once encountered—
Look ahead and never mind.

And if those who might befriend you,
Whom the ties of nature bind,
Should refuse to do their duty,
Look to heaven, and never mind.

Friendly words are often spoken
When the feelings are unkind;
Take them for their real value,
Pass them on, and never mind.

Fate may threaten, clouds may lower,
Enemies may be combined;
If your trust in God is steadfast,
He will help you, never mind.

ANOTHER GOSPEL.

BY J. S. POTTER.

"I marvel that ye are so soon removed from him that called you into the grace of Christ unto another Gospel: Which is not another; but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the Gospel of Christ."

The above text was brought to my mind by reading the title page of a new tract written by Eld. J. H. Waggoner; which reads as follows: "A Vindication of the Doctrine of the Resurrection of the Unjust."

Had Elder W. said, A vindication of the theory, he might have used the definite article, which would be more in harmony with his subject; but instead, he has applied the definite article to the word doctrine; which would lead many of his readers to suppose that such a doctrine originated in heaven, and has been revealed by the gospel to the inhabitants of earth!

The word doctrine, when used in connection with the gospel, is always in the singular number, and never in the plural; but Elder W. has a doctrine for the resurrection of the unjust; and as he has not "vindicated" the claims of the just, in his argument for the unjust, I suppose he has another doctrine to meet their case, which would come under the head of "Another gospel," "which is not another; but there be some that trouble you, and would pervert the gospel of Christ." So says the apostle Paul.

Thank you Paul for the record you have left behind. We are on the look-out for these men that trouble the church with other doctrines, contrary to the DOCTRINE of Christ; and a word from one who has "seen Christ" is better to us than a whole book written by those who depend upon latter day "visions" for their doctrines.

I have always understood the word gospel to signify good news. "And the angel said unto them, (the shepherds) Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people."—Luke i. 10. So the word "doctrine," when used in the gospel, in its strict sense, relates to that which is good; which will bring "great joy." Turn to Deut. xxxii. 1, 2. It reads, "Give ear, O ye heavens, and I will speak; and hear, O earth, the words of my mouth. My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distil as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass." How this language agrees with the prophet Isaiah in chapter xxvi. 19: "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. Awake and sing, ye that dwell in dust, for thy dew is as the dew of herbs, and the earth shall cast out the dead." Just as the dew of heaven refreshes the herb and grass of the field, so will the dead "awake and sing" when the "refreshing shall come from the presence of the Lord and he shall send Jesus Christ." I would ask the Elder, if the "unjust" will awake and sing and partake of that "refreshing?"

We read of the doctrines of men and the doctrines of devils; but these are all outside of the gospel plan. Then again, we read of "my doctrine," "sound doctrine," "the doctrine of God our Saviour." These last quotations are of the right sort; they are sound.

The Apostle says, "If any man teach otherwise, and consent not to wholesome words, even the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, and to the doctrine which is according to godliness; he is proud, knowing nothing but doting about questions and strifes of words, whereof cometh envy, strife, railings, evil surmisings." etc. If half of the time was spent in searching after truth as there is in writing against it, there would be more "godliness" in the body of Christ; for "God is love." But "God can be just and the justifier of him that believeth in Jesus:" and if Elder W. is "entirely unsatisfied" with that kind of justice, we cannot help it, the gospel, or "good news," must be preached, and that is, "Life from the dead" to believers only.

The arguments put forth to prove the resurrection of the unjust as well as the just, are so unharmonious with the Scriptures of truth, that they remind me of the "linsy-woolsy garment" that was forbidden to be worn under the "law," or in the days of the old "schoolmaster," which pointed us to Christ. And as some of the Adventists are so tenacious for mixing law and gospel together, I will turn over and read a little in Deut. xxii. 9–11. "Thou shalt not sow thy vineyard with divers seeds: lest the fruit of thy seed, which thou hast sown, and the fruit of thy vineyard be defiled."

The Son of man sowed the good seed, but the devil sowed the tares. "The good seed are children of the Kingdom, but the tares are the children of the wicked one." Now as Christ did not sow but one kind of seed, the fruit at harvest time will not be defiled with tares, as they, (the tares), "are none of his."

"Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together." As the ox was often used for sacrifice, and their blood pointed to the great atonement made by the Lamb of God, it pleads for the righteous who have accepted it through Christ. But I believe the blood of the ass was never used for that purpose; and if that animal be a type of the wicked, who die in their sins, they will be "holden with the cords of their sins;" for there is no atonement made for them; they have neglected to come to Christ the only "LIFE-GIVER."

Again "Thou shalt not wear a garment of divers sorts, as of woollen and linen together." If wool represents the sheep, and linen the goats, the reason is obvious why they should not be worn together. As the sheep are to be set on the right hand, but the goats on the left, at the coming of Christ.

"The law and the prophets were until John: since that time the kingdom of God is preached;" and we are told not to sew "a piece of new cloth on an old garment: else the new piece that filled it up taketh away from the old, and the rent is made worse." Don't try to patch up the law with the gospel; for we are not under the law, but under grace. We have discharged the old "schoolmaster" with his old clothes and old bottles, and have got our new wine "put into new bottles," and are not afraid of getting them broken by the long "range" from that Fort erected in "Eden" by the "serpent," nor by the short range from the guns of a mortal resurrection.

The God of heaven has had Forts erected by the apostles and prophets, all along the coast of man, and they have stood every shock from the enemies' guns. I will be your guide to a few of them.—Isa. xxvi. 14. Prov. xxi. 16. Psa. xlix. 14. Psa. lxxxviii. 5. John iii. 16. Luke xx. 35, 36. Rom. vi. 23. 1 Cor. xv. 52. James i. 15. 2 Pet. ii. 12. Ezek. xiii. 22.

EAST BOSTON, April 20, 1870.

THE EARTH'S PURIFICATION.

BY ELD. WILLIAM STUART.

THE Earth is not to be burned up, but only purified with literal fire. I have never met an Adventist who believed that this earth would be literally burned up. But a great many do believe that it will undergo a great and radical change by the action of literal fire. This view is, I think, abundantly sustained by the word of God. All who believe the Bible will readily admit that the antediluvians were destroyed by literal water, both man and beast, except Noah and those with him in the ark. Nor can we doubt that many important changes were made on its surface by the action of the waters of the flood: for Peter, alluding to this subject, expressly says, 2 Peter iii. 6, "And the world that was, being overflowed with water, perished." This was the first general death of the world. Now if it is admitted that the first agent of destruction and death was literal water, why not as well admit that the second agent of destruction and death will be literal fire? Especially as the same apostle in the next verse says, "But the heavens and the earth which are now, are by the same word kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and the perdition of ungodly men." Jude also, speaking of the judgment of the great day, says in verse 7, "Even as Sodom and Gomorrah and the cities about them, in like manner giving themselves over to fornication and going after strange flesh, are set forth as an example, suffering the vengeance of eternal fire." Perhaps none will deny that the fire here spoken of was literal; and if so, it is the example or pattern (deigma) of that which is to take place at the judgment of the great day. John the Revelator also says, Rev. xx. 14, "And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire, which is the second death." Now, as the agent of the first death was literally a lake of water, why not believe that the agent of the second death will be literally a lake of fire, according to the "pattern" given us by Jude? And not only so, but Jesus himself says in Luke xvii. 29–30, "But the same day that Lot went out of Sodom, it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed." And Peter referring again to this example or pattern, says, 2 Peter, ii. 6, "And turning the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an example unto those that should afterwards live ungodly." And still referring to the same thing he says, 2 Peter iii. 10, "but the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burned up."

Much more could be adduced to show that literal fire is the agent which God has chosen for the destruction of the finally ungodly world. But while it will utterly consume everything that opposes itself to God, it will at the same time renovate the earth, and purify it from the corruption occasioned by sin. And as the flood destroyed every vestige of the harmony which existed at the creation, and the elements, air, earth, fire and water were let loose, often carrying devastation and ruin in their path, so will the fires of the antitypical Gehenna, or lake of fire, destroy "every trace of sin's sad story;" and from earth's smouldering ruins and chaotic mass God will restore it again to all its Eden beauty, as at the beginning, when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted together for joy.

But, you will ask, Where will the people of God be during this fiery ordeal? They will be caught away to meet the Lord in the air. Then will be said, "Come my people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee; hide thyself as it were for a little moment until the indignation be overpast. For behold the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity; the earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain." —Isaiah xxvi. 20–21.

And as the feast of tabernacles has not yet had its fulfilment, it will then have its antitype, while the redeemed of the Lord are waiting in those chambers or temporary habitations, until the new earth is prepared for their reception. Then will the prophecy of Enoch be fulfilled: "The Lord my God shall come and all his saints with him." "And then the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, and all dominions shall serve and obey him."—Daniel vii. 27. But before these things can transpire, many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake; but ere they awake, the vail of the true tabernacle will be rent in twain; or, in other words, the heavens shall depart as a scroll, revealing our glorious LIFE-GIVER as he descends to perform the last act in the great scheme of human redemption, viz., to raise the dead. That this is the order of events will be seen from Job xiv. 12, "Lo, man lieth down, and riseth not till the heavens be no more. They shall not awake nor be raised out of their sleep." For until the last saint shall have gotten the victory over the last enemy, which is death, redemption can not be completed. Hence, at the close of the gospel dispensation the blood of Christ ceases to plead in the holy place, heaven itself, and the doom of all will be irrevocably fixed. Then shall the elements be in subjection to him, who, even in the days of his mortal flesh, could say to the winds and waves, "Peace be still," and they obeyed.

Dearly beloved, that day of doom is hastening greatly. None can tell what a day may bring forth. Then while mercy lingers, and while there is yet access to God through the peace-speaking blood of our great High Priest and Mediator, let all be in earnest to secure life—eternal life, through the only channel which God has opened for us to attain unto it.

THE FALL OF NAPOLEON.

BY ELD. B. MATTHIAS.

AN Empire has fallen, and nobody excited over it! The wonder is, that everybody is not. We are so used to great events, they have become common place. But if we will look at the magnitude of the event, we cannot suppress emotion and noise.

An Empire is fallen! and among other things, theories are shivered,—not all—some are vindicated, and verified.

This event in anticipation was too great to be credible; now regarded as an incident, a circumstance, and a thing of course—a logical event.

The fall of this empire and dynasty while in anticipation, was believed to be immediately connected with the incoming administration of our Lord, and the kingdom of heaven. So it is. It is one of the last things, if not the last, in the two lines of prophecy of Daniel and Jesus, and is the victory achieved by him who sits upon the white horse making "righteous war"—whose name is, "the Word of God"—"Lord of lords, and King of kings."

In Dan. xi. 45, we read, "Yet he shall come to his end and none shall help him." The capture of Louis Napoleon, and his army, makes that end. In Rev. xvii. this power is represented by the scarlet colored beast; which beast ascended out of the bottomless pit, (a revolution)—and was to descend into perdition; has gone by the way of a "lake of fire." It is specifically noted as intermitting its power for a season. "Was; is not; and yet is."

An other creature is involved in this fall. By the showing of prophecy, and the facts in history, Papacy also has come to its end; is in the same perdition. "And there is none to help" her. Her recent flourish of infallibility has disgusted all mankind, and part of herself; so that the sentiment of all men, beside these two culprits, accepts of this double ruin with satisfaction, and complacently look on and see the beast and his rider go into "perdition." Let them go! "Rejoice over her thou heaven, and holy apostles and prophets, for God hath avenged you on her."—Rev. xviii. 21.

One would think, with the convincing proofs of the times, the papists would begin to believe themselves most fallible; drinking as they are the dregs of the cup of Divine vengeance. What a desolation! Their power gone, neutralized, made void and nugatory; henceforth a shadow: no better than a "dead lion." Amen, "Alleluia! Salvation, and glory, and power unto our God; for true and righteous are his judgments; for he hath judged the great harlot, which did corrupt the earth with her fornication, and hath avenged the blood of his servants at her hand. And again they, (we) will say, Alleluia as her smoke ascends up for ever and ever!"—Rev. xix. 1.

These powers have become as chaff: as light as "the dust of summer threshing floors;" easy blown away. Napoleon, who thought himself destined to be "very great" (according to certain interpretations, of which he was informed) without doubt attempts to carry out the programme with reckless impunity: but suddenly comes to his end, as poor of power, as dead Cæsar, "with none so poor as to do him reverence."

"At that time shall Michael stand up." That is now, at this time, if not before. It will not be a later event. The reading is, "At that time;" possibly in the early part of the "time of the end." At the latest, at the fall of the Napoleon dynasty.

The last link of the chain of dynasties, known in prophecy, has been added, tried by a great strain, and parted by the last ship of the "line"—Napolenia—and has gone ashore. There she lies; a magnificent wreck: a ghost of empire among others of earlier times, who are saying to this addition to the shadows of things that were; "Art thou also become as weak as we? Art thou become like unto us? Thy pomp is brought down to the grave, and the noise of thy rivals. How art thou fallen! They that see thee, shall narrowly consider thee, saying, Is this the man that made the earth to tremble?"—Isa. xiv. "Since thou art laid down, no fellow has come up against us." Verse 8 same chapter.

AN EFFECTUAL REBUKE.

ON his way home from his last tour in Ireland, Rev. Rowland Hill was very much annoyed by the reprobate conduct of the captain and the mate, who were greatly addicted to the ungentlemanly habit of swearing. First the captain would swear at the mate, and the mate would swear at the captain, and then they would both swear at the wind.

"Stop, stop," shouted Hill, "let us have fair play, gentlemen; it's my turn now."

"At what is your turn?" said the captain.

"At swearing," replied Hill.

After waiting until his patience was exhausted, the captain urged Mr. Hill to be quick and take his turn, for he wanted to begin again.

"No, no," said Hill, "I can't be hurried; I have a right to take my time and swear at my own convenience."

"Perhaps you don't intend to take your turn," responded the other.

"Pardon me," said Hill, "but I do as soon as I can find the good of doing so."

The rebuke had its desired effect; there was not another oath on the voyage. As a preacher, Hill was simple, clear and fluent. His powers of imagination were far above mediocrity, and he had remarkable talent for illustrating and simplifying great and important truths.—Exchange.

THE LAMP WITHOUT OIL.

WHILE spending a week lately in the society of a great number of faithful pastors from the Canton of Vaud, one of them, at a public meeting, related to us the recent conversion of a lady in his parish. She was one of those who lived only for this world; the thoughts of her sins had never caused her uneasiness; she was careful and troubled about many things, but neglected the one thing needful. One night, whilst alone in her room, she saw the lamp which lighted it suddenly go out. Although she was alone, she said aloud (thinking only of the accident which left her in the dark), "There is no oil in my lamp!" The words thus spoken echoed in her ears with a new sense. She recalled the parable of the five foolish virgins, who had no oil, and whose lamps had gone out at the coming of the bridegroom; and from that moment, day and night, that word of God remained in her soul, as an arrow remains in the side of a stag who flies away from the hunters. It occurred to her constantly: "No, I have no oil in my lamp! My God! What will become of me? I have not thy grace in my heart!" She was filled with fear; then she began to pray, and continued in prayer until God answered her favorably, and gave her his peace through the Holy Spirit, and now she is happy and full of zeal. Like Enoch, she walks with God; and we trust, that like him, she will continue to do so until the end. —L. Gaussen.

THE WAITING SAVIOUR.

"But this Man, after he had offered one sacrifice for sins forever, sat down on the right hand of God; from henceforth expecting till his enemies be made his footstool."—Heb. x. 12, 13.

Long has he stretched forth his hands that were nailed to the cross, and his arms of mercy, inviting us to come to him and live. His bowels of great compassion have long moved towards us, and his justice has passed by our sins. From the throne of his Father he has long beheld his love and mercy scorned, his laws despised, his name blasphemed, his providence accused, his gracious plans opposed, the wicked's triumph, his saints reproached maliciously, confusion spreading everywhere, and creation groaning to be released. But creation will not groan long, for the Judge is at the door,—justice will soon go forth, the dead will rise, the day that many thought would never come will arrive,—even that day long expected but only wished for by the good. Jesus has tarried long, so long that the love of many has waxed cold, and some have tauntingly said, "Where is the promise of his coming?" But soon they will say so no more, for the reproach will be wiped away and every word of God be found true. The waiting time of Christ and the church will terminate. "Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

"DEATH IS THE COMING OF CHRIST."

THE "Prophetic Key" gives this illustration of the absurdity of confounding death with our Lord's coming, as is often done:

"Death," said Mr. Smith, "is the same to a man as the coming of Christ to him." "Yes," returned Mr. Jones, "the same of course—for when death comes a man goes into the grave, and when Christ comes he comes out of it! The coming of Christ and death then are just the same—just as into and out of are the same." "I never thought of it that way," replied Mr. Smith. "I think it very doubtful," said Mr. Jones, "whether you ever thought much of it in any way." "Fact," answered Mr. Smith, as he left.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

THE GREATEST OF THESE IS CHARITY.

AN incident in the life of a young man in this city came to our knowledge the other day, which from the spice of romance it contains, as well as an illustration of what a vast deal of good a slight bestowal of charity sometimes does, makes it worthy of record.

As the young clerk and friend were passing hastily along Broad street, one raw, chilly day in November, a few years ago, they saw standing near the corner of India street, as they turned to go down the wharf, a poor old woman, thinly clad in a calico dress, tattered bonnet and shawl, holding on her arm a small basket in which were a few uninviting looking apples which she vainly offered the hurrying pedestrians that passed her. Her stockingless feet thrust into old slippers, and a few threads of white hair scattered over her forehead, she stood shivering in the keen, searching wind as our two clerks drew near.

"Poor old woman!" said one, as he approached the poor old creature, and with a sudden impulse he plunged his hand into his pocket and grasping every cent it contained, threw it into her basket. The old woman's "God bless you's" followed him on the frosty air as he rapidly passed away. His companion, who witnessed the act, ejaculated at the moment of its performance—

"Bill, you are a fool to throw your money away in that manner on street beggars."

"Perhaps I am," said the other, "but I could not help it; she may have been an impostor, but I do not believe it."

The next summer, one day as the young man was busy over his ledgers in an inner counting room at his employer's store, he was summoned to the outer office by the message that some one wished to see him. Going out he saw waiting a fine looking sailor in nautical costume, who eyed him closely as he approached—

"Did you wish to see me, sir?"

"Is your name William——?"

"Blue eyes, light complexion, standing straight, speaks quick," said the sailor, half soliloquising. "Yes, you must be the man you look just like it," said the tar.

"Just like what?" said the young man, a little surprised.

"Why, I'll tell you; overhaul your log and tell me if you recollect seeing a poor old woman about ten months ago, shivering in the cold in Broad street, and trying to sell a few apples to keep her from starving; you threw a dollar and a half in silver into her basket and walked on,—you did, didn't you,—you can remember it, can't you?" said the sailor, with feverish anxiety.

Somewhat staggered by the questioner's eagerness, it was a moment or two before the young man could collect his thoughts, when he replied that he did recollect throwing some change into a poor woman's basket, but that the circumstance had passed out of his memory.

"Ah! but she hasn't forgot it!" said the sailor, warmly, "but do you recollect what the man walking with you said?"

"Why yes, now that I recall the circumstance, I think I do." He said, "Bill, what a fool you are to throw your money away."

"That proves it," said the sailor joyfully, and dashing his hat on the floor he seized the astonished young man by the hand, with a hearty grasp, saying, "God bless your soul, sir! you saved my mother's life, you did—I knew you must be the man," continued he to the astonished clerk, "the moment I set my eye upon you; why bless your generous heart, that poor old woman was my mother," said the sailor, a big tear running over his brown cheek.

Drawing his guest aside, the clerk learned that he was the second mate of a ship now in port; that he had been searching for his mother's benefactor for nearly three weeks upon almost every wharf in that part of the city; that during his absence, the winter before, he had been taken sick in a foreign port, his mother had met with misfortune, had heard nothing from him, and was deprived of the provision he had made for her support during his absence; that expecting to hear from him she had managed, by various means to eke out an existence till the chill month of November found her without food, fire or clothing, and driven to the street to procure it; that the handful of change which the young man threw into her basket, provided her with necessaries till other means fortunately reached her.

In answer to the clerk's inquiry as to what clue he had to direct him in his search he replied—"My mother marked you, sir, although you walked off so quickly, and her description of the color of your eyes and hair, and of your height are correct. Furthermore, she heard your companion call you "Bill," and say something about the wharf, consequently I concluded you must be in a store on the wharf; so I've been into every store on the wharves where there were any Williams and overhauled about two dozen 'Bills,' but I did not run along side the true Bill till I found you, sir."

"There," concluded the sailor, "that's my yarn. I felt I couldn't rest easy till I thanked you,—and that's what I've called to do. My old mother is well provided for now, and I'm second mate of a ship. God bless you sir, I'll never forget your name, and may you never know what it is to be poor!" And the sailor wrung the hand of his benefactor, whose heart glowed with the richness of the poor man's blessing, as he departed.—Commercial Bulletin.

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures." The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE PUNISHMENT OF THE WICKED.

BY JOEL A. SIMONDS.

I WRITE, because it is important to understand this subject. It occupies nearly as prominent a place in the Bible as does the reward of the righteous. It reveals God's character as it stands related to his law, and to the destiny both of the righteous and the wicked. I write, because the subject is not well understood generally. Almost every shade of sentiment is entertained, from endless misery to none at all; from the universal resurrection of the wicked to be punished, to no resurrection at all. I write, that we may all speak the same thing, that we may all be perfectly joined together in the same mind, and in the same judgment on this subject.

The different views that are now held as to the punishment of the wicked, are urged as being taught in the Bible. Each class has its proof texts by which to defend its peculiar view; and feels great assurance that it is right. One quotes the Saviour's own words, "These shall go away into everlasting punishment," as proof of eternal torment. He thinks this is so plain and direct, that it is strange that everybody does not see it. He says, If there was no other passage in the Bible on the subject, this is sufficient to prove that the wicked will be tormented forever. He flatters himself that it is a wholesome, and an essential doctrine of the Bible.

Another, to prove that all the wicked will be made alive to be punished, quotes from the Saviour's words, "Marvel not at this, for the hour is coming, in the which all that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil unto the resurrection of damnation." This, to him settles the whole question, and proves beyond a doubt that all the wicked, who have ever lived, will be raised to life to be damned; and he does not care to hear any more on the subject.

Another, to prove that the wicked will enter immediately upon their punishment when they die, quotes the case of the rich man and Lazarus, as a final disposition of the matter. These are the words of the Saviour, and he cannot see how a man can be a Christian and not believe them.

And yet another, to prove that the wicked will not be raised to life at all quotes, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; and he that believeth not the Son, shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him," and says, what further need have we of testimony; this must be the truth, for it is said in so many words, that he that believeth not the Son shall not see life.

Thus the various sentiments on this subject are claimed to be taught in the Bible, each class maintaining that all other views should be explained in harmony with its own. These proof texts, used as they are, can never settle this question. We may study the Bible all our lives, in this way, and still hold our contradictory views as firmly as we do to-day. And yet the Scriptures exhort us, with great earnestness, and in apparent sincerity, "to speak the same thing, to be of the same mind and of the same judgment," just as if such an end is attainable. They seem to assume that we may, and that we ought to be of one mind.

The apostle claimed that as God is true, his words were not yea and nay. Then, the Scriptures are all on one side of this question. They do speak the same thing when they are correctly applied. But who shall instruct us how to apply them? The Scriptures themselves. Let them answer the question, and let their decision be final. Let us then come reverently and teachably to the Scriptures and ask,

WHAT IS THE PUNISHMENT OF SIN?

In the first description of the punishment of sin given in the Bible, it is said, Thou shalt surely die. These words are simple and easy to be understood. They come within the comprehension of a child; they seem to be a complete and finished description; they appear to describe the whole of the punishment of sin; it seems to be fixed. This punishment must surely take place. When it has been executed upon the sinner, according to this description, it is impossible to conceive how any thing, more or less, could be done to him.

These four simple words, give us a complete description of the whole punishment for sin, unchangeably fixed and final. It shall surely be done: no more is required and no less will do. This punishment was made known at the right time to affect the whole race. At no other time in the history of our race could it have been so appropriately given. If it had been given at any later period than it was given, it could not have been brought to bear upon the whole race. It was given at just the right time. It was given to the Father of the race, so that the knowledge of it might be extended to all of all generations. It was the penalty of the law God gave to Adam, to have jurisdiction over him and his posterity forever. It was under this law, guarded by this penalty, that man was to live forever, if he had continued loyal; or, if disobedient, that he was to die. It was the penalty of the law of the kingdom which was prepared when the world was made. God is perfect. His work is perfect; therefore this punishment for sin was the best that could have been given, and never can be improved. It must be the punishment for sin in all time to come, throughout all generations, whether they are loyal or disloyal. If this punishment was right and just, then, to add to it, or to diminish from it, would be wrong. And as God cannot deny himself, he can never refuse to acknowledge the completeness of the punishment, which he himself established, when he gave law to the world. We are absolutely shut up to this view. There can be no other taken of this first description of the punishment for sin, "Thou shalt surely die."

The first occasion for a more particular description of this punishment was found in the transgression of this law by Adam. The Lord called him to an account; condemned him, and passed sentence upon him in these words, "In sorrow, and in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread till thou return to the ground, for out of it wast thou taken, for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return;" and thus explained the completeness and the finality of the penalty of the law. Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return, is so simple and so plain a description of what is meant by the declaration, "Thou shalt surely die," that it seems impossible that any one, even the most stupid, should ever misunderstand it.

After this explanation was given, immediate measures were taken to secure its execution by excluding Adam from the tree of life, lest he should eat of it and live forever. Not to live forever, is a further explanation of what the penalty of the law is. And again, we have another which is an absolute demonstration of what the punishment of the wicked is. "All the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years, and he died." This was the complete and final execution of the punishment for sin. Thus we have in the simplest and plainest words that can be used, a description of the punishment for sin. 1. In the law, "Thou shalt surely die." 2. In its explanation when the sentence was passed upon him. 3. In the means used to secure its execution, lest he eat of it and live forever. 4. In its execution, when he died so as not to live. How is it possible that the punishment for sin could have been made plainer?

This was the penalty of the law given to Adam before he sinned. This would have remained its penalty forever, if he had never sinned. After Adam sinned it remained the same. The same punishment described in the law, was explained and executed under the gospel. Therefore, in the beginning, the punishment for sin under the law, and under the gospel were the same. Surely, if the punishment for sin under the gospel was to be the punishment of the law repeated, or if it was to include a resurrection to life in order to its execution, or in any way to be changed, it should have been mentioned in this first example of punishment under the gospel. But as no such change is mentioned or intimated in the explanation of it, or in its execution, we conclude that no such change was intended.

The one punishment explained and executed in the beginning of the gospel, is the only punishment for sin that the gospel requires. That punishment will be the final punishment of all men. "As by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned." "The broad road leadeth to destruction." "Those who sow to the flesh shall reap corruption." "The wages of sin is death." "The end of sin is death." "When sin is finished it bringeth forth death." "He that is dead is freed from sin." "The wicked shall utterly perish in their own corruption, as brute beasts perish." This is but one punishment. When wicked men have reached death, or destruction, or corruption, or have perished once, they have suffered the whole, complete, and final punishment for sin.

This is the punishment of all the wicked.

DIVINE LOVE—A MEDITATION.

"The consolations of God."—Job xv. 11.

"Many, O Lord my God, are thy wonderful works which thou hast done, and thy thoughts which are to us-ward: they cannot be reckoned up in order unto thee: if I would declare and speak of them, they are more than can be numbered."—Psalm xl. 5.

"Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him."—Psalm ciii. 13.

"How precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God! how great is the sum of them!"—Psalm cxxxix. 17.

"God is love."—1 John iv. 8, 16.

THESE—O my soul, take and eat these precious words! Blessed be my God and Father in Christ for such gentle oracles! How they comfort me under cares, and sustain me amidst trials, and lovingly smile upon me through the frowns of brethren—like a golden sunbeam through black clouds—I cannot tell. The Lord knoweth, and I adore him for causing these words to be written. My weary heart falls back upon them as a refuge from the storm, enjoys them as a holy luxury amidst bitter experiences, and clings to them as the infallible declarations of that heavenly Friend who cannot deny himself. Yes! "the word has gone out of his mouth, and shall not return." He will be all that he has said of himself, and do all that he has promised to his children. Let my faith be strong, my courage undaunted, and my peace like a flowing river!

Am I conscious of utter unworthiness? Yes; but my answer to the self-accusation is, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain!" Do I deserve nothing at the hands of the Lord? He who gave himself for me deserves everything that is good, and great, and glorious. Have I promised much, and performed nothing? "I will cry unto God Most High, unto God that performeth all things for me. He shall send from heaven, and save me from the reproach of him that would swallow me up. God shall send forth his mercy and his truth." On this I would rely with the assurance of perfect confidence. Why should I doubt? The value of the promise is determined by the character of the Promiser, and that is the most beautifully glorious thing in the universe. It is tenderness, grace, love, light, beauty, infallibility, omniscience, and omnipotence, all in one! Doubt GOD? Why, you worm of the dust, who is God that you should do this most foolish thing? Think of this, O my soul, and then a passing cloud will not be mistaken for an eternal eclipse, or a temporary difficulty for a proof that God has forgotten to be gracious. When I look at myself, I am undone; a sense of weakness, ignorance, and folly comes over me, which makes me envy the anchorite, and wish for "a glen in some lone wilderness," far from "the strife of tongues," the fury of maddened nations bent on mutual extermination, and the humiliating spectacle of a church rent into fragments; but when I look at the Lord and think of what he did, and said, and suffered, and ask the meaning of it all, I am ashamed of my cowardice, and feel determined to hold on to the end under the leadership and in the strength of the glorious Captain of Salvation. "Why art thou cast down, O my soul? and why art thou disquieted within me? hope in God: for I shall yet praise him, who is the health of my countenance, and my God. My flesh and my heart faileth; but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion forever."

Feeling my responsibility to the MASTER, and, as a secondary motive, animated by love to my fellow-servants, I desired to do some little service during my short day in diffusing truth respecting the church and kingdom of Messiah, and in helping to remove certain spots which tradition and vain philosophy have brought upon common theology; but for this service, undertaken in all sincerity and truthfulness, I have suffered grievous reproach, have been shunned, deserted and misrepresented, and have been publicly branded in pulpits and papers as a denier of certain portions of God's precious word. But, "bless the Lord, O my soul: and all that is within me, bless his holy name! Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits!" His tenderness, his pity, his love, have been a heavenly balm to my wounded spirit all this time. I could have wished to retain the love of certain very estimable Christian men, whom I am sure to meet in the kingdom of heaven, if I myself am permitted to enter; but God's thoughts have been very precious to me during this trial; the divine love has wonderfully made up for the human love which I have lost, and though my brethren "of my Father's house" have turned their backs upon me, the light of my Father's countenance shines upon me with a loving radiance that fills my heart with "joy unspeakable, and full of glory."

Yes, O my soul, "God is love," and thou knowest it. "The Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy." Forget not to praise him; trust in him at all times; and make his service thy chief joy. Who loves like him? Who but he can turn darkness into light, and make the sorrows of life material for exultant joy? Seeing the end from the beginning, and comprehending every incident of the way, and its exact bearing upon the mind, he so arranges in his infinite tenderness that every tear shall become a gem, and every sigh a song of grateful adoration. His love makes music of our moanings, and transforms our weakness into holy strength. Having given Christ, the Son of his love, to deliver us from sin and death, with him "he freely gives us all things," and fits us through the discipline of grace to wield the sceptres of glory; therefore let him have the tribute of praise before we get the triumph of perfect victory. He is my song and strength, and the horn of my salvation. Blessed be God!

And "thou hast heard, O my soul, the sound of the trumpet, the alarm of war." Does not humanity shrink aghast at the fierce shock of hostile armies, the agony of suffering, the terrible carnage, the wailing widows, and desolate orphans? "The nations are mad." The war fiend, in his blind fury, destroys the splendid gifts of God in the fruitful fields. He who should have filled his arm with the golden grain, matured by genial shower and sunshine, is on the field of horrors killing his fellow or lying dead among the horrible mass of victims to royal ambition. O my soul, take refuge again in the love of God, for he will most surely "send Jesus Christ," the Prince of Peace, that an end may be put to this long, long story of blood. The millennium so long promised by preachers, and writers, and politicians, as the result of Christian civilization, science, education, and commerce, has not come, and cannot come! I have not looked for it, neither have I taught others to do so. If men are disappointed in their expectations, they have no right to talk about "the mysteries of Providence," for there is no mystery in the matter. The millennium is coming, for the KING himself is coming, and the day of his advent cannot be far distant; but woe to the oppressors of men and the scourges of the earth in that day! In that day "he will cut off the spirit of princes, and be terrible to the kings of the earth."—Ps. lxxvi. 12. It will be a day of darkness, gloom, and terror, and "as a destruction from the Almighty shall it come." The destroyers of the earth must be destroyed (Rev. xi. 18), that "the blessed and only Potentate" may reign in peace, righteousness, and glory, over a renovated world. "The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this." Love to his Son and his people, and pity for bleeding nations and a groaning creation have engaged him to do this, and he will do it. "Our Father which art in heaven, thy kingdom come!" Thy way is best. Come, LORD JESUS. Amen!—DR. WILLIAM LEASK, Editor of the Rainbow.

WHY MUST HE REIGN?

IT is impossible for any thinking man to read such emphatic language as that contained in 1 Cor. xv. 25: "For he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet," etc.; and again, that contained in the fifty-third verse: "For this corruptible must put on incorruption," without having the questions forced upon the mind, "Why must he reign?" "Why must this corruptible put on incorruption?" I believe upon the right understanding of these declarations depends the reception of that heaven-born truth —Immortality in Jesus only. If Christian men would answer these questions honestly from the word of God, they could not fail to see in the one the final destiny of the wicked, and in the other the final destiny of the righteous.

Why then must he reign? It may be said, because he is God's anointed, or his own answer to Pilate, when asked, "Art thou a king, then?" "To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world." But even these answers will not suffice; these only prompt other questions. Why was he anointed king at all? Why was he manifested as Son of man as well as Son of God? This brings us to the point. By turning to 1 John iii. 8, we have the complete answer: "For this purpose the Son of God was manifested, that he might destroy the works of the devil." To the "seed of the woman" was intrusted the redemption of the creation from the devil's power. But how is this mighty work to be accomplished? In one of two ways; either by immortality on the one hand, or judgment on the other. But before immortality could be bestowed on man, he must be redeemed from the curse of the law, which came by sin. This Jesus did by being made a "curse for us." Man being thus "redeemed from the curse of the law," God can present immortality to him in the person of his Son; and that this is just what he does is manifest from the declaration of Jesus himself: "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." No need of perishing, now that the curse has been borne and taken away, or abolished. Before man can perish, he must despise this everlasting life which is God's gift to him; had God bestowed this blessing indiscriminately and unconditionally, we should have found all in possession of it. This he has not done. What saith the Scripture? "This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life; and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life."—1 John v. 11, 12. If men will despise God's gift of eternal life, "there remains nothing but a certain fearful looking for of judgment, and fiery indignation, which shall devour the adversaries" (for neglect is contempt, and refusal is rebellion); and this the Son of man shall execute in order to carry out the purpose for which he was manifested—"the destruction of the works of the devil." We now see that the great primary purpose why the "Word was made flesh;" why he who was from the beginning, took upon him the nature of man—a nature which was corruptible, and as such, could never inherit incorruption—was, "that through death he might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil" (Heb. ii. 14); in other words, wrest the power from the hands of the usurper, destroy him, and abolish all traces of his works. But how could this be accomplished in man's nature? By turning to John v. 26, 27, we learn how that Christ was especially qualified for the work: "As the Father hath life in himself, so hath he given to the Son to have life in himself, and hath given him authority to execute judgment also, because he is the Son of man." As Son of man he suffered death, as Son of God he giveth life; as Son of man he gave himself up to the death for us all, as Son of God he was the "gift of God" (eternal life), to us; sent by him, having accomplished redemption from the curse in man's nature, he now lives to make us "partakers of the divine nature."

We now come to the question, "Why must this corruptible put on incorruption?" I answer, first, because we could not otherwise bear "the image of the heavenly," which all believers will do by virtue of their union with Jesus in resurrection life. Again: "Being begotten again to a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away;" and as it is impossible that corruption can inherit incorruption, we must of necessity be made meet for the inheritance by putting on that which is incorruptible or unfading.

What I have advanced then, is this: That he who now reigns as god of this world is a usurper, having subdued it to himself by the introduction of sin; that God has determined a time of restitution of all things; i. e., that all things shall be restored to the state in which they came from his hand at first; that for this purpose the Son of God was manifested in the flesh; that he must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet; that "the last enemy" (of necessity the last, all others having been destroyed) shall be destroyed, that is death—that until this is accomplished Christ will not deliver up the kingdom to the Father, and God will not be all in all.

We will now glance at some of the objections brought against the "doctrine of eternal judgment," which is destruction. It is said that if the torments of the wicked are not to be eternal, God would never have given up his Son merely to save men from a limited period of suffering. I reply, the objection will not stand, inasmuch as it is based upon a false idea of the mission of Christ. God sent his Son into the world as the giver of life to men who had no life in themselves. Jesus says, "I am the living bread that came down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die."—John vi. Jesus came to manifest the Father's will, and this is the will of the Father, that Christ should give eternal life to all that believe on him; so that punishment in hell is not what Jesus came to deliver the world from. He came to "bear away the sin of the world" and abolish death. This he has done, so that death or destruction in gehenna is not the original curse, but the "second death," or curse pronounced on the Christ-rejectors or life-despisers, from which there is no restoration. Believers are saved from this death, inasmuch as they have accepted God's gift, and therefore "shall not come into condemnation, but have passed from death into life."

But another objection is urged that the doctrine of final destruction, when preached to the world, is calculated to make sinners more careless by destroying all fear of hell. This objection, like the other, has also the disadvantage of being based on ignorance of the word of God. God never intended to drive men into heaven through fear of hell. In all his dealings with the children of men, he has manifested himself in the character of love, and it is only after men have abused his goodness, and with base ingratitude despised his love, that he is forced to execute judgment. What, I ask, is the effect produced by the preaching of eternal torment in hell? I can testify from experience that in a great many cases it is ridicule and scoffing. One instance in particular: After a preacher had finished his discourse, having depicted in awful colors the eternal flames, a young man remarked in a jesting manner, that one might have smelt the brimstone, the preaching was so hot. I can also testify that during the last nine years of my experience, those who have gone back after professing themselves converted to God, were in most cases those who were terribly excited under the fear of hell.

When will those who profess to have been entrusted with the glorious gospel abide by the pure gospel? What says Paul of the gospel? "It is the power of God to salvation to every one that believeth." Men now-a-days seem to feel great pleasure in painting the fiery glories of an eternal hell, as Mr. Maude expresses it. Another class who are determined to have eternal torment meted out to every lost soul at all hazards, denounce the eternal destruction of the wicked as a doctrine from the pit. This simple class have only to be asked if they really believe the devil has sent forth the doctrine of the destruction of himself and all his works, when they perceive their error and hang their heads with shame. One feature of all classes of objectors in common (I have found no exceptions) is the want of meekness, or a proneness to get soon angry; but we do not wonder at this after they contend for such vengeance on their fellow-creatures. If any man, or even an angel from heaven, preach any other doctrine than the final destruction of the devil and all his works, he contradicts Scripture, and understandeth not the extent of redemption, nor the full work of Christ.

DOES OUR DISCIPLESHIP COST US ANY THING?

WHILE religion is not purchasable by self-denying service or sacrifice as a meritorious cause, sacrifice is inseparably connected with religion, as an essential condition. It has nearer place to the gospel than a prefix. Contact, however close, does not name it. It issues out of religion—is its product and fruitage. The very conditions of spiritual life, if they be truly met, will compel a daily crucifixion. To bring the sluggard soul to activity; to break the idolatrous spirit away from its idols; to quell and overmaster and put away the lusts of the natural heart that are so clamorous for indulgence; to wage warfare with all that is evil; to oppose the prevailing tendencies to sin in the individual life and in the life of the world; to stand as a witness for Jesus, a living epistle, that men may read every day with no danger of false guidance, bringing no reproach upon the dear Lord and no harm to his precious cause; to have the life of God in the soul, a reality, a power, a vital force, antagonizing all worldliness and selfishness and earthliness, and pushing us out to all Christian activities; to do all Christ-like work in a Christ-like spirit and with Christ-like fidelity and constancy in this utterly Christ-like world; surely this is an impossibility without sacrifice. And there can be no real spiritual life where this is not sought to be done.

Self-denial is the essential law of the gospel, "Take up thy cross daily," is Christ's command to every believer. "Deny thyself" arches the very entrance gate to the narrow way of Life. It is written in letters of living light all along and on either side that narrow way, clear up to the gates of the New Jerusalem and city of God. Our gospel, with all its freedom and with all its joy, promising rest to the weary and beauty for ashes and gladness for bitterness, is nevertheless a cross-signed, yoke-bearing, burden-imposing gospel. It is the gospel of the crucifixion. And the crucifixion is not only at Calvary's cross. It is in human hearts and lives—the crucifixion of sin and self—the crucifixion of pride and lust—the sacrificing to God at a cost. "Whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after me, cannot be my disciple."

It becomes us to inquire whether we have not measurably lost sight of this great gospel condition. Does our Christian discipleship cost us any thing? Do we know any thing of "daily" cross-bearing for our dear Lord's sake? What does the church think about this? What do indulgence-loving, ease-consulting, world-conforming, pleasure-taking Christians think about it? Let us be specific, and not lose the force of the truth in generalities.

Apply this law of self-denial to Christian benevolence. By what rule do we commonly decide the measure of our liberality? How many are there in the church, continuing to give up to the point of giving at a cost—until giving compels the denial of some cherished gratification? It may, indeed, pinch some souls to give at all: the least of their contributions to the Lord's treasury being doled out in beggarly pittances from plethoric pockets with great reluctance. Here is self-denial, indeed, resulting from the violent wrench that conscience sometimes gives to covetousness; but it is hardly the cross-bearing enjoined of Jesus. And even where we see the "cheerful giver," is it common to find him going up the scale of Christian beneficence and adding to the sum of his contribution until he says, "If I give that I shall feel it; but I will not offer what costs me nothing?" Some of God's poor do it. Their untrumpeted mites, given of want, most sweetly exemplify this spirit of Gospel self-denial! But if the church at large did it, what a grand impetus Christian evangelism would have in this country and the world!

Again: apply this law of self-denial to Christian work. There is such work—needed work—that waits to be done—that must be done, or men must die. Work with a cross in it. Work that shall sweat the brow, and tire the muscle, and breast the current of easy desire and inclination, and brave a shower of a rainy Sabbath, and confront with God's truth the impenitent and the unsaved, and make our altars and our closets wrestling places and scenes of sore conflict, instead of places of lame and lazy and effortless petition. We can work when we have a natural taste for the work. But what if it be self-denying work, to do which will cost something, and jostle us out of our accustomed paths of self-indulgence, and send us to God for help? We can pray, when to pray is simply to go through with the phraseology of prayer. That is, at no cost. But the men that have moved God, have been at some expense of time and effort and struggle and strong crying and tears. Is our praying after this sort?

Worldly work has self-denial enough; should it have so great a monopoly of it? Is not the church of the living God, of all places, where it should be most manifest? And here, if we be truly possessed with the Spirit of the Master, ought we not to be led to cheerful sacrifice?

Religion is love. And God is love. And he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him. And love's divinest office is to suffer. And the divinest expression of all this was when our suffering Saviour took up his cross, saying: "Lo, I come: I delight to do thy will, O my God." Can we stand blessed and folded about in that suffering love of His, and yet know nothing of self-denial for Him? Can we expect all the benefits of his cross, and yet carry no cross? Ah, we should be ashamed of forever seeking out smooth paths, and forever avoiding rough places in all that relates to work for God. Burdens should be uplifted under love's glad inspiration. Crosses should be upborne and carried, because somehow it was the way the Master trod. The spirit of self-denial should have its spring in the love of the soul for Jesus, and in the hunger of the soul to be like Him. Standing beneath the cross and looking up into the face of the Man of Sorrows, it should be in our hearts to say, "All for Thee, O Lord! Oh my Jesus, all for Thee!"

Thoughts on Life, Death and Immortality.

BY H. B.

"The living know that they shall die."—Eccl. ix. 5. So to live is to have knowledge. This is the state of the living. "The dead know not anything."—Eccl. ix. 5. To be destitute of knowledge is the state of the dead. Therefore the dead are not waiting in expectation of any event to take place. They take no note of time. They know not that they are dead or have been in a state of knowledge or living existence. They have no remembrance of God. Psa. vi. 5. They have no hope (in the state of death) of a future immortality. Such hope, or faith, is in the present life; antecedent to death.

The infidel enters the state of death without an antecedent hope of immortality. He can gain none in the grave, for the Scripture says, "There is no work nor device nor knowledge nor wisdom in the grave." Eccl. ix. 10. So he receives the everlasting punishment of sin, death. For without the propitiation of Christ (of which he is destitute) the state must be eternal. The christian enters the state of death, but hopes to awake at the last day "I will raise him up at the last day" to a state of immortality by the mighty power of God through Jesus Christ our Lord, who came to save from that state; which is the only eternal penalty of sin; or, in words of Scripture, "The wages of sin is death." Rom. vi. 23; or, "Sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." "The soul that sinneth it shall die."—Jas. i. 15; Ezek. xviii. 4, 20. Therefore, without Christ all sinners are under condemnation to death. The believer passes, by hope or faith, from this state of condemnation to life through Jesus Christ; and at death (for he cannot make a note of time) receives immortality by a resurrection to life from death. Therefore, "never tastes of death."

C. T. Roe, Greenville, N. Y., writes: My heart is often full, and I would like to express it through the Herald of Life, but circumstances seem to prevent me. I am deeply interested in the opening of the new era or age with all its solemn truths, which speak joy to the righteous, but the reverse to the wicked. My kind heavenly Father seems to be opening my understanding wonderfully. I feel that the net has been cast into the sea, and is now being drawn to the shore; the good placed in vessels prepared for them; but the bad cast away. So it is to be at the end of this world, age, or dispensation. With another, who has written in the Herald, I feel to say "Allelulia:" for, "the Lord God omnipotent reigneth."

Albin Chandler, DesMoines, Iowa, writes: My love for the Herald of Life has not abated in the least, nor for the blessed truth it proclaims. I rejoice to see the willing hands the Lord has found to nourish and sustain it. May it live to welcome Jesus, is my prayer. I have been sick so much the past year that I cannot do as much as I wish, but pray our Father to open the door for me to do good in His name, and I will try to be faithful. Yours, longing for eternal life in the kingdom of God.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 5, 1870.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive..

Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their anthorship. The Herald of Life.

With this number we commence volume viii. How soon seven years have passed away since the paper was first sent forth on its mission in vindicating the character and government of God from the imputations with which good and bad men have reproached both by their representations. The good have done it ignorantly in unbelief, and through the force of long standing traditions; and bad men have done it for selfish ends, and to keep the unenlightened masses in such dread of the awful as to render the services of their professed teachers essential, and thus to feed themselves on the miseries their theories of the character and government of God have produced.

The foundation of all the corrupt theories of Christendom has been the doctrine of man's inherent immortality, dragging after it the liability to eternal torture of the souls God has made. Against these soul-destroying and truth-corrupting doctrines, the Herald of Life has borne its unwavering testimony, and will continue to do it; hoping to diffuse a better view of the character and government of our Creator, so as to win men to a willing and joyful obedience to Him whose name and nature is "Love"—for, "God is Love" is the grand truth of the Bible.

We desire to be truly thankful that God has not suffered our labor to be in vain; for the fact comes up from every quarter, that the truth of "Life only in Christ" is spreading, and driving the torture theorists to make such shifts as shows the battle has not been in vain; and some of the ministerial advocates of those theories are endeavoring to shift them so far as to carry probation, to most sinners, into a future life. "What, orthodox ministers doing this!" Yes, friends, we speak that we know, that some "orthodox ministers" have become so alarmed at the horrible idea of eternal torture that they now take the ground that none will be subjected to such torture till they have had equal means employed for their salvation that the most favored sinner ever had, not excepting Saul of Tarsus; for, say they, "God's ways are equal, and He is no respecter of persons; therefore all of the human family must have, here or hereafter, the same means employed to save them before they will be consigned to eternal torture."

Such is the strait to which "orthodoxy" is being driven to uphold inherent immortality and endless torments, and to vindicate the character and government of God. One step more lands them in universal restoration, the natural and legitimate result of the doctrine of man's inherent immortality.

Let all our friends rally to the support of the Herald of Life, whose mission is to clear the moral atmosphere of all these corruptions of the truth of God.

We have given most of our space this week to others, and trust there will be no complaint of want of variety, whatever may be said of the soundness of the matter: for that, the individual writers are alone responsible.

Light Wanted.

Br. Storrs: It seems you have got the Red Beast "into perdition." Yes, but where are the "ten horns?" We have seen him but not them. The ten horns must have ceased, for they work with him "until the words of God shall be fulfilled."—See Rev. xvii. 17. Where are those kings?—See Rev. xix. 19. Again, it looks as though the "Red beast" is alive with the kings, and he is taken with a false prophet, and they were both cast alive into a lake of fire and brimstone; and the remnant (kings, probably), were slain. If Napoleon is the Red beast, what is to finish the prophecy?

George Atkinson.

North Attleboro, Mass., Sept. 20, 1870.

We do not wish to be too positive in any explanation of the symbols of Revelation; yet it seems as certain as any thing therein revealed, that the Napoleon dynasty (not either Napoleon alone,) is the "scarlet-colored beast;" and it looks as if it had gone into perdition for the last time; but if to be revived we shall soon see it done. It went into the bottomless pit in 1815: it ascended out of that pit about 1850; and was to go into perdition—or come to a final end; i. e., it will be revived no more. Such seem to be the facts; but time must determine.

The going into "a lake of fire, burning with brimstone," was to be while the beast and false prophet were "alive:" and it may indicate that their end was not so complete, at once, but what they might experience inexpressible agonies before their fate should become an accomplished fact. Such seems to be the present condition of the Napoleon dynasty and the Papal prophet: both are tormented for the time being. How long that will continue before their cases are made hopeless, we cannot say. We wait further developments on these points.

As to the "ten horns;" that is a more difficult subject. They may represent the ten States of Italy; but we have doubts on that point, and are not prepared to present any theory on the subject. It may be that the prophecy is intended to indicate a confederation of States that should immediately arise at the time of the beast and false prophet's immersion in a lake of fire. If so, we may soon see such confederation on the territory of the beast and false prophet, which shall be essentially atheistic; and then would follow the "war with the Lamb."

Turn which way we will, however, there are difficulties that, at present, we see no way to overcome; and hence say again, we wait for further developments. God's counsel will stand, and none of His words will return void, but shall accomplish all His pleasure. Instead of having our minds too much occupied to find out what is yet obscure, let us specially see to it that our hearts are kept in constant preparation to meet our returning Lord and King.

Perhaps before closing our remarks we ought to reply to our brother's inquiry—"If Napoleon is the Red beast, what is to finish the prophecy?" We answer—Much. After the beast and false prophet go "alive into a lake of fire," comes the slaying of "the kings of the earth and their armies," who are clearly distinguished from the beast and false prophet, (Rev. xix. 19–21), and are called "the remnant," verse 21, and are to be "slain with the sword of him that sat upon the horse." For this slaying process some length of time will doubtless be occupied.

After this is accomplished, the power symbolized by the dragon is to be bound, which involves another period of time. What this power is, we will not now pretend to decide; but that it is some earth-born ruling power we have no doubt. Yet time will have to determine what one is intended by the symbol.

All these things appear to precede the resurrection of the martyrs. If so, does our brother not see there may yet remain much "to finish the prophecy," even if the "Red beast" is the Napoleon dynasty, and has "gone into perdition?"

Do not let us grow impatient in waiting; but thank the Lord that we have time to work in His vineyard, and dig out the obnoxious weeds of inherent immortality and hopeless torment in a future life; and to cause the truth that "God is love" and willeth not the death of any, to go forth to the glory of His name.

The Sting.

"I have not time to add more," said Cowper the poet, in a letter to a friend, "except just to say, that if I am ever enabled to look forward to death with comfort, which, I thank God, is sometimes the case with me, I do not take my view of it from the top of my own works and deservings, though God is my witness that the labor of my life is to keep a conscience void of offence toward him. Death is always formidable to me except when I see him disarmed of his sting."

Death is an enemy which no mind, not diseased, can regard with composure unless it has that "perfect faith" which "casteth out fear," coupled with a knowledge that its sins are forgiven. The sting of death is sin; and the strength of sin is the law.—1 Cor. xv. 56. If we have put off "the old man, which is corrupt according to the deceitful lusts," and have put on Christ; if so far from being "conformed to this world," we are "transformed by the renewing of our mind," proving, by christian faithfulness, "what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect, will of God;" if we have formed a living union with Christ, the author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey him, then will the "sting" be withdrawn, and though we may not desire death, we may laugh at it and defy its power, knowing that God, who cannot lie, has promised to redeem His people from the power of the grave. "My sheep," said the great Shepherd, "hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me: and I give unto them eternal life; and they shall never perish." It is the will of God that Jesus shall do this. "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day." But if men will not "believe on him" then the "sting" is not withdrawn, and consequently death has power to utterly kill. With sin, the "sting of death," withdrawn, or its poison counteracted, we may fearlessly meet death, and lie down in peace to sleep, having the perfect assurance that in God's good time we will come forth triumphant over death. Standing upon the banks of deliverance; crowned with glory, honor and immortality; decked with the bloom of eternal youth, we may in triumph shout, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave where is thy victory?" That this shall be the happy experience of us all, may we strive to grow in grace, and hold fast unto the end.

We have heard of an aged man who, busying himself with planting and grafting fruit trees, was interrupted by the interrogation, "Why do you plant trees, who cannot hope to eat the fruit of them?" The old man, leaning upon his spade, and looking his questioner in the face, replied, "Some one planted trees before I was born, and I have eaten the fruit; I now plant for others, that the memorial of my gratitude may exist when I am dead and gone."

Followers of Jesus should be governed by the same principle in religious matters. Before the present generation of believers were born, faithful men and women of every century throughout the christian dispensation, enlightened by the Spirit respecting certain portions of gospel truth, went forth with their lives in their hands seeking to establish, to the extent of their knowledge, the pure gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. For this they suffered reproach, ignominy, privation, torture, death; and we who follow after eat the fruit of their labors.

Still does the "Comforter," the Spirit of truth, continue to lead and guide into truth, and though the enemies of truth have no more the power to torture and kill, there are yet sufferings to be endured by them who would stem the fierce torrent of prejudice in efforts to establish that truth. Comparatively few, we think, of them who are brought to see what is regarded as new truth, but what in reality is eternal truth newly understood by men, are willing to come boldly out and openly identify themselves with it because they dread the disapprobation of their fellow christians. They have not the courage to run the risk of having their names cast out as evil by men, even to build up what they know to be truth. "This is clearly gospel truth," say they, "and it is directly opposed to the church generally; but, after all, it may not make christians any better than they are, nor make more of them, and if we proclaim it openly we will lose our influence for good in the church. So we will just keep pretty quiet, and maybe we can get some others to see it by telling it to them little by little, slyly." Poor, deluded religious cowards! Think you God will bless the efforts of such as are afraid to acknowledge His truth openly? What "influence for good" can he have upon whom the blessing of God does not rest? If you can speak plainly for Jesus and the truth where you are: then we say to you, by all means remain there; but if you cannot do this then, holding truth dearer than popularity, come boldly but meekly out, determined to stand by the truth and be identified with it, come what will. It may almost seem to you that if you do this the very heavens will fall; but don't be afraid. The heavens never did fall, and it is not likely they ever will on your account. Some part of the theological heavens may fall but that won't hurt anybody nor interfere with them, except to benefit them.

Suppose the faithful old man had said: "If I plant trees people will ridicule me, and will call me a weak-minded zealot, and may be, after all, the trees will not bear any fruit. But I like the idea of planting trees and so I will come out slyly sometimes and set out a sprig here and a sprig there; perhaps they will take root and grow:" how much fruit would the next generation get from trees of his planting? Don't be ashamed of the truth nor afraid to stand by it. Others have suffered far more than you will be called to do, and the christian world is in the enjoyment of what, under God, their sacrifices secured. Therefore let us be willing to bear our part of the burden "that the memorial of" our "gratitude may exist" when we are, like them, sleeping in Jesus.

All One In Christ.

BY JACOB GRIM.

I am asked the question: "How is it, Br. Grim, that you make so much of the Scriptures belong to the Jew, and leave the Gentiles out of the question almost entirely; while most of the preachers give and apply almost everything to the people living in our time?"

I answer: In order to understand the Scriptures there are several things necessary—among them are the following: We have found the best and only way to understand any revealed truth, is, to get as near the time in the world's history when the truth was uttered as possible, and inquire to whom it was addressed, and by whom? To illustrate: Suppose a child should ask the question, why is it necessary to put new wine into new bottles—so that the bottles will not break? Now, the child knows nothing about any bottles except glass ones, and it would be quite necessary to carry the mind of the child back to the time when our Saviour uttered the words, and explain the fact that bottles were made of skins, and a new hide, while green is much stronger than one that has become dry and hard and liable to crack.

So we find, in dealing with the children of men, God has adopted several plans; and as the common Father of all mankind by creation, He has a perfect right to make such laws as may please himself. So when we find any thing from the Lord, we inquire to whom was he speaking? Now, God deals with mankind in several different ways. First: we find he makes a law and places Adam and Eve under that law, and makes it very simple, and this law relates to Adam and Eve only; for when they sinned, God drove them from the garden and all that the law pertained to, and closed up all the avenues leading to the garden; the subject embraced in the covenant. We can see no reason why God could not make a new law or covenant with any of Adam's children.

We find that God did accept Abel, one of Adam's children. Enoch walked with God, and God took him. Noah pleased God, and was accepted of him. Abraham obeyed God, and a number of worthies during that dispensation. We have the testimony that Abraham pleased God and received the promises. Now if God could save one man in any dispensation, the same condition would save any number that complied with the condition. I am asked, what law Abraham was saved under? I answer: Obedience. It seems through all the time intervening between Adam and Moses, the Lord had made no special law, but dealt with men individually. But during the days of Moses it pleased God to place his people under a special covenant. God had promised Abraham and his seed the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession. This involved the resurrection of the dead; and so Jesus informs us, Luke xx. Therefore the promise of the inheritance was through the resurrection of the dead. Now it was through faith or belief in God's promise that Abraham received the promise that he should have a seed that should be heir of the world.—Rom. iv. 11. And it was Abraham's unbelief that caused God to give him the seal of circumcision.—Gen. xvii. 17. "Then Abraham fell upon his face and laughed. . . . And Abraham said unto God, O that Ishmael might live before thee. And God said, Sarah thy wife shall bear thee a son;" not Ishmael. God introduced the law of circumcision for some purpose; and we are informed that it was the covenant between God and Abraham and his seed in their generations.

Now if this promise only related to Isaac, then the thing was soon accomplished. But it was the covenant of promise pointing down through all their generations to Christ; and Paul says, "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not: and to seeds, as of many; but as of one; and to thy seed, which is Christ. And this I say, that the covenant that was confirmed before, of God, in Christ, . . . for if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise; but God gave it to Abraham by promise. Why then serveth the law (or what purpose does the law serve), it was added because of transgression, till the seed should come to whom the promise was made; and it was ordained by angels in the hand of a mediator."

Paul says, God confirmed the promise with an oath; and "an oath of confirmation is the end of all strife."—Heb. vi. 15, 16. And this promise included the "possession of the gate of his enemies."—Gen. xxii. 17. Now this land by the oath of God belonged to Abraham's seed; and Paul declares that seed was Christ. And he further said, the law and its conditions were to serve until the seed should come. The dispute in the days of the apostle seems to be that those under the law claimed the possession under the law; and Paul contended for the same inheritance under the promise of God to Jesus Christ. And he further says, the law cannot annul the promise made and confirmed of God in Christ. —Gal. iii. 17.

Now it seems clear to my mind, that God under the law involved not only all that were under the law, but the inheritance itself was involved under the law; and although the law may involve the inheritance, it could not affect the promise of God; and therefore God instituted the law of purchase or redemption; and, as in the case of Boaz and Ruth, it must be one of the family or near kinsman. Hence we read, "Since then the children have one common nature of blood and flesh, he also in like manner partook of these: (flesh and blood). Besides he does not in any way take hold of angels (because they cannot die), but he takes hold of the seed of Abraham."—Heb. ii. 14–16.—Emp. Dia. We read that Jesus was made of a woman made under the law, to redeem them under the law.

We read in Eph. i. 13, 14, "In whom, (Christ), also, after that ye believed, ye were sealed with that Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance until the redemption of the purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory" (who purchased it). "Now I say, that the heir, as long as he is a child differeth nothing from a servant though he be lord of all; but is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the father."—Gal. iv. 1, 2.

Now what are we to learn from the apostle's argument? That Jesus, until the time appointed of the Father, was under tutors. In Luke ii. 46, we find Jesus in the temple, sitting in the midst of the doctors, both hearing them, and asking them questions: "And all that heard him were astonished at his understanding and answers." Whence all this knowledge and understanding? We answer, He is under tutors and governors until the time appointed of the Father. You ask, Who is his tutor? I answer: The Holy Spirit. For we find, even at the conception of the child, the Holy Spirit overshadows the mother; and we read, the Spirit is given him without measure. The Father by the Holy Spirit watches over him and instructs him, to prepare him for his mission at the time appointed.

Now we have found that thus far the Gentile world has not come into the notice of God in all his dealings with the children of Israel. And then after Jesus underwent his trial and came forth victorious from the contest, we read, He "came to his own inheritance, given him by the promise of God, made sure by an oath, and confirmed by the sacrifice, two immutable things; and his own recived him not." The inheritance was his without purchase: it was his by promise. He could have demanded it at the time, but for the truth of God, Rom. xv. 8, "Now I say, that Jesus Christ was made a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers. And that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercies."

Here we have the object of Jesus' becoming a minister of the circumcision. Paul says, It was for the truth of God; to confirm the promises. Was God's truth involved? It seems so from Paul's argument. It seems that God made a promise to the fathers in which the Gentile world were to have a part. And it seems that God did involve the promise and his word under the law, and in order that the inheritance should revert from the law back to its original promise, it was necessary for it to be purchased from under the law; and therefore we find the mighty effort on the part of Jehovah put forth to redeem not only his people but the inheritance from under the law; and the Gentile world is left out entirely until this great work has been accomplished. Therefore we read, Eph. ii. 12, 15, "That at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenant of promise; having no hope, and without God in the world." O what a condition for the Gentile world to be in: without "hope and without God!" This covenant which made God the God of the Jews, must first be taken out of the way in order that God may extend mercy to the Gentiles.

"But now in Christ Jesus, ye (Gentiles), who sometimes were far off, are made nigh by the blood of Christ;" (for his blood was shed to take that covenant out of the way). "For he is our peace, who hath broken down the middle wall (the covenant) of partition, (which separated us from God), having abolished in his flesh the enmity, the law of commandments, for to make in himself one new man."

Here then we stand, and believing until the making of this new man, or the new creation, all the promises belonged to the Israel in the flesh; and therefore believe that all the teachings of Jesus and his apostles, until this new man was perfected, belonged to the Jews. But since Jesus has accomplished in himself this new creation, He has commanded the "preaching of peace to us who were afar off (from God), and to them that were nigh;" and the reason is assigned: "For through him we both (Jew and Gentile) have access by one Spirit to the Father."—Eph. ii.

Now, then, from this point we accept all things in Christ Jesus as belonging to us and the Jews in Christ, as one and the same. And He, "Christ," is the head of the body, the church. For it pleased the Father that in him should all fulness dwell. And he is before all things, and by him all things consist, in this new creation. If there is one thing above another for which I glorify God, it is for the matchless gift of Jesus, and for the accomplishment through him of the great plan through which we poor Gentiles are made partakers of the new creation. Jesus, I know thy matchless name; 'tis music to my ear; fain would I sound it out so loud that all the earth might hear.

A Misapprehension Corrected.

Br. Storrs: If on reading my article on the "Purification of the Earth" you had observed that if all the saints were to accompany Jesus to take possession of the new earth, they must all have been previously gathered into those chambers spoken of, and not left in the burning earth. And I think that the words, "but before these things can transpire," etc., as well as the words, "ere they awake," etc., show plainly that I there returned to give the events connected with the advent in their order.

These events were as follows: first, Jesus leaves the mercy-seat, or comes out from within the vail; second, the heavens depart, according to Job xiv. 12; third, the resurrection of all the righteous dead, and the change of all the righteous living, according to 1 Cor. xv. 52; fourth, they are all caught away to the chambers or temporary habitations, in accordance with the type, and also Isa. xxvi. 20; fifth, they accompany their victorious King as he descends to take possession of the everlasting kingdom under the whole heaven.

In connection with the above, allow me to add the following: The great question to be settled is, Are men and women to be left on the earth after Jesus comes, and is the propagation of the species still to go on? In so far as the immortalized saints are concerned, we all agree that they shall be as the angels of God, neither marrying nor giving in marriage; and we are probably all agreed as to the order in which immortality shall be conferred upon them, according to 1 Thess. iv. 15–17. But do these include all that will ever receive immortality?

We showed in our previous article, by Dan. vii. 27, that all nations were to serve and obey the Lord. This agrees with Rev. xi. 15: "and the seventh angel sounded, and there were great voices in heaven, saying the kingdoms of this world are become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ; and He shall reign forever and ever." Now, as this covers the entire ground, and there is no nation nor place where he does not reign, we shall inquire who are his subjects, and what is their nature—are they corruptible or incorruptible?

We observe first, that the seventh trump is the last of the series; and the apostle says, in 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52, "Behold I show you a mystery; we shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump; for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." And as the apostle does not qualify the expression "the dead," it must mean, we think, all the dead that will ever be raised to life. Now as he had previously declared, in the fiftieth verse of the same chapter, that flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God, we are prepared for his conclusion of the matter in 1 Cor. xv. 53, 54, "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality. So when this corruptible shall have put on incorruption, and this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying, that is written, Death is swallowed up in victory." Hence, as death is the last enemy that is to be destroyed, the victory cannot be proclaimed while there is one saint of God dead, or one subject to death by reason of the mortality of corruptible flesh. Some were raised from the dead after the crucifixion; some have been translated. But the enemy is still at work, and victory has not as yet crowned the Saviour's work. But when it is done, it will be complete and eternal: and this will be at his advent, for he is to judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom.—2 Tim. iv. 1. Then the time shall have come, spoken of in Rev. xi. 18, "and the nations were angry and thy wrath is come, and the time of the dead that they should be judged, and that thou shouldst give reward to thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and them that fear thy name, small and great, and shouldst destroy them which destroy the earth." Then will the living temple be finished, and the shoutings of grace, grace unto it, will reverberate through heaven's wide dome, and the antitypical Zerubbabel will be King over all the earth; and as the world began with a pure theocracy, with Adam the first for its king, so will it ultimate in a pure theocracy with Adam the second for its King.—See 1 Cor. xv. 24.

Looking for Christ Constantly.

[The following fragment from the pen of the late Sylvester Bliss, we hope the readers of the Herald of Life will treasure up in their hearts, and by their daily walk show to the world the value of their hope.

W. H. S.]

"The value of one's hope depends on its practical effect on the daily life. What is the effect of the hope of the Advent near? It certainly cannot be deleterious. The apostle assures us that he who has the hope of being made like Christ when he shall come, purifieth himself even as He is pure. (1 John iii. 2, 3.) Vain is the faith of him on whom it has not this influence. A realizing sense of the sublime expectation that on any day, or on any hour the parting skies may reveal the glorious coming of the Son of God, who will reward every man according to the thoughts and intents of his heart, cannot but have a practical effect on the life of the believer. . . . Believing and loving the appearing of Christ, will beget a determination to be in continual readiness for the event. It destroys the indifference, the carnal security which generally comes over those who do not believe, nor love the coming of the Saviour. Believing in the coming of Christ at any moment, reins Christians up to the performance of duty. They feel more that the eye of the Majesty of Heaven takes cognizance of all they say and do, and that they may have no moments for repentance. Death always looks at a distance, to those in health and in the heyday of youth. They feel the blood thrilling in their veins, with indication of life. They put off the evil day, and enjoy present scenes—waiting for a more convenient season to attend to their salvation. But when Christ's coming is viewed as an event that may at any moment transpire, no present sense of security can defer His coming. The healthy beatings of our pulse, and all the outward indications of health are no evidence that the next moment may not usher us into the presence of our descending King. Those who have this hope within them, will take heed to the injunction to watch, because they do not know the hour or the day of the Lord's coming. They will so live that whether the Master cometh at midnight, at cock-crowing, or in the morning, they will be found watching, so that whether they are in the field, the workshop, the bed, or on the house-top, they may be taken, and not left. While such is the result, how can any Christian feel otherwise than disposed to cherish the hope of soon seeing the Savior in the clouds of heaven—offering up their prayers continually for the hastening of that glorious day."

Letters and Extracts.

From Geo. U. Lewis.

Br. Storrs: The packages of tracts and pamphlets arrived safe, and are now preaching the gospel to those who received them so thankfully. Some cheerfully paying for them; others promising to read attentively, and give to their neighbors.

I am satisfied the tracts will be read with profit, as I conversed with nearly all to whom I gave them. Some to whom I offered them refused to accept them. They were satisfied with their belief and did not wish to investigate farther.

I found several who had known "George Storrs" years ago; had heard him preach, etc.; appeared glad to hear that he is still alive and in the work; for which we, also, praise our Father.

The camp-meeting passed off pleasantly. The preachers were Elds. Cleaveland, Carpenter and Matthewson, of Vermont; and Elds. Couch and Kimball, of N. H. Eld. H. F. Carpenter preached some excellent practical sermons.

The preaching by brethren Matthewson and Couch was on prophecies mostly, i. e., in the day-time. I was not at any of the evening meetings.

The last day it was estimated that there were twelve hundred teams driven on to the ground, and that there were more than six thousand people present. Of the result of the meeting I shall not speak, but leave it to be decided hereafter.

I formed some new acquaintances with Life believers. Br. and Sr. Elliot, and Sr. E.'s mother, of Waterbury, Vt., were among the number. They were alive and "ready for every good work." We were disappointed at not seeing Br. McAllister. Suppose he has a good excuse for not being present.

Br. Storrs: Enclosed find $5 for the Herald, which I believe to be the best religious paper that I know of; and for which, put me down $10; and may the Herald and its Editor both live until the return of the "Prince of Life" to order and establish His everlasting Kingdom, and give His people that eternal life which God the Father hath been pleased to hide in Him. Oh happy, happy day. May it hasten on.

Please send a few tracts on the "Devil," as we are entirely out. He has some very earnest advocates around here; and if he were taken away from them, it would be almost equal to taking away their Gods; for, "No devil, no God: no hell, no heaven: no eternal misery, no eternal happiness." "The one, necessitates the other: as every thing must have its opposite." Thus they wrap it up, and "love to have it so." They have agreed or covenanted with "Him that hath the power of death," that they "shall not surely die;" but find death to be a friend, a "kind porter, to open the gate and let them into endless joy;" and they have entered into "an agreement with hell," that the wicked, (though they die) shall live again; and either live eternally in torment, or be killed over again: and all this, they would have us believe, is the truth of God!

"But their covenant with death shall be annulled; and their agreement with hell shall not stand, and the hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies, and the overflowing scourge shall pass through; then shall they be trodden down by it." And in that day, may it be said to us, "Come my people; enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee: Hide thyself, as it were, for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast."

Yours, in hope of eternal life.

Br. Storrs: I had intended to have written something more before this, for the Herald of Life; but our little girl has been sick with scarlet fever, and my time has been so much occupied caring for her that I have had barely enough left to perform my official duties. Thanks to a kind heavenly Father, she is now better, and we are somewhat relieved.

Though I cannot write anything more for the volume just closed; I can send a word of welcome to the volume just opening. The first number of volume viii. is being made up, and will soon go on its way to hundreds of houses, in all parts of the country, bearing its precious burden of truth to enlighten and cheer. May it be indeed the Herald of Life to those to whom it is sent.

I have made up my mind to be more faithful to its support for the year to come than I have formerly, and I hope to send contributions more frequently than heretofore.

There is at present a good interest in the Methodist meetings here. The pastor is an excellent man and is doing a good work.

I must ask you to excuse me at this time. I thought I must speak just a word of welcome to the new volume.

Yours for the truth.

From Eld. H. Rockwell.

Br. Storrs: The few days that have so swiftly and so sweetly flown since we took the parting hand with you and a great company of kind-hearted, loving, prayerful brethren and sisters at our last gathering at Camp Springfield, I have never been more hopeful, more sure of final triumph, in the end, than now. I do not expect to pass the deadly struggle between truth and falsehood without a hard fought battle; but I have already passed through so many conflicts, in temporal things, in the hurricane of the storm-clad ocean, the howling of wind, the deafening roar of the billows, the forked lightnings, the blinding flash, and the death-dealing thunder of the enemy's cannon, that although I had some little trials to pass through to Plainville Camp-meeting; I understand that calm, cool, and considerate action will save more lives in a sinking or burning ship, than fear or confusion. Some seem to act as though the old ship was quite leaky, and their fears are not all groundless; but let us keep cool, for the life-boat remains to all that shall be found worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from among the dead ones.

O Brethren, truth is all powerful, and it will prevail. Neither good nor bad men can ever overthrow or prevent the onward march of love and truth. Let us deal out this last diamond, which has so long laid in obscurity, with a kind, gentle and loving spirit, so that the adversary will not be able to gainsay or resist successfully. But a few days in the future, and our last conflict will be past, the victory will be won, the glory will be the Lord's, and the joy will be to all the saved ones. May the Lord help us all to be one of the company.

I arrived home on Wednesday, and called on Br. W. S. Campbell at his dwelling, to which he returned the previous Saturday: found him in a cheerful mood, and quite hopeful. He sustained the remove, without inconvenience: talks pleasantly about walking on a crutch, sometime, to preach, unless the Lord comes and gathers his sick, lame, and weeping children into the kingdom, where the lame man shall leap as an hart, the tongue of the dumb sing, the deaf hear, the blind see, and none of the family shall say, "I am sick;" when the Lord brings again Zion, and the glory of God shall fill the whole earth as the waters fill the sea. O Lord, hasten the glad day; So will we ever pray.

Br. Storrs: Amid the great, important, and startling events that are coming to pass, I feel a rejoicing in spirit at what God is doing in the earth; especially in Europe, the Roman earth. This morning I think of Jesus and his rejoicing; the buffeting, scourging, and crucifixion stood out plain before Him, and soon to be suffered; yet in that hour He rejoiced in spirit, and said, "I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth; that Thou hast hidden these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes; even so Father, for so it seemeth good in thy sight. Bless the Lord. If it had not been revealed to babes, and the weak things of the world, I should never have heard the joyful tidings. I can realise this morning the blessed words that God has often brought before my mind. He says, "Have not I written unto thee excellent things in counsels and knowledge, that I might make thee know the certainty of the words of truth; that thou mightest answer the words of truth to them that send unto thee?" Yes, blessed be thy name, Thy word is truth. O sanctify thy people through the truth. Rejoice with me, my brothers and sisters, that this short space dynasty, whose throne stood on the bottomless pit, has gone to perdition. And what next? I suppose that Rome is now invested with the power and authority of the ten kings, or Italy; and the last vestige of the Pope's temporal power has forever ceased; and they have eaten her flesh and made her naked. What next? "She shall be utterly burned with fire: for strong is the Lord God that judgeth her." What then? "Rejoice over her, thou heavens," (plural); yes, all these little heavens scattered over the United States and the world, where we sit together in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus; the little sanctum sanctorum, where God walks with his people; yes, let us rejoice that we live now, if we in the future, like Jesus, go to the cross, the stake, or the dungeon.

Three times since my birth has France been declared a republic; and, O, how much God has turned my attention to that power since the rise of the first Napoleon; yes, and to Rome, the harlot Babylon. Again we say, "What next?" These ten kings, or Italy, are to make war with the Lamb and the Lamb is to overcome them. O bless the Lord forever, and let all holy beings say, Amen. Will not our Alleluia "then" shake heaven and earth? God grant it. Your sister rejoicing and hoping in the Lord.

Br. Storrs: I inclose $1, for a new subscriber. I lent her my paper, and she likes it so much, but is too poor to take it. She has six children, and not one of them converted. She told me that her eldest was so interested in reading that he staid in all Sabbath afternoon to read it. He said it was good reading, and I wish you could only have seen them when I told them they could have it. They were so still while I was talking with their mother. May it be the means of saving the family. If the mother was only converted she might lead the rest. May our Father and his dear Son have mercy on them. They are a kind family and I think mu h of them.

If they receive the benefit from the Herald I have, they will bless the Lord all their life long for it; and what could I do without it? It is all the preaching I get, and I long for the day that brings it to me. It is more dear to me since I have got acquainted with so many of the loved ones. I hope that you and dear Br. Thorne may be precious in the sight of the Lord. May He increase your strength daily is my prayer for you both. I hope the dear ones will ever remember you at the throne of grace; and may you have all needed wisdom to guide and direct in all your doings for this glorious cause.

I am distributing tracts every Sunday; and our precious Saviour is at my right hand to strengthen and bless. I love it, but sometimes I get so tired and weary: then I think of our dear Saviour, how weary he used to get, and that strengthens me to go on; and I ask him to prosper the truth as I go along. They say it is such an unpopular doctrine that they think it is no good for me to tire myself so. But I tell them, it is no matter to me; I am going to scatter the truth and leave the result with God. If it does them no good it is great good to me. He will take care of his own work.

I wish I could get a new subscriber every every week; it is gratifying; for it is truly more blessed to give than receive. How good the Lord is to us, all, a little band.

Albany, N. Y. Sept. 20, 1870.

From Martha M. Jordan.

Br. Storrs: I prize the Herald of Life next to my Bible. I love to read the precious letters from the dear brothers and sisters in Christ, who are scattered through the land. I am a stranger to them in the flesh, yet we are all seeking eternal life through the same Life-giver, and we shall soon meet in the kingdom of our Lord if faithful to him, when we shall know him as we are known.

I can truly sympathize with the afflicted ones. I too am afflicted, but let us be patient, putting all our trust in the Lord, for soon we shall be where pain, sickness, sorrow and death will reach us no more. I am fifty-five years old, with poor health; but praise the Lord for his great goodness to me. Bless his holy name for ever bringing me to behold his great truth of Life only in Christ.

There are not many about here that believe in the Life views as we do. They are mostly Methodists. I feel like keeping myself very humble, and be ready to give a reason of my hope.

Dear brothers and sisters in the Lord, remember me at the throne of grace. Yours, in Christian love.

Niles, Mich., Sept. 27, 1870.

From Maria E. Bellmay.

Br. Storrs: May God bless all the dear brethren and sisters who write fo: the Herald of Life. There is such union of feeling. I do love this union and brotherly love. Let it continue. I do not expect that I shall ever see any of our Life brethren or sisters, or hear any of the doctrine preached. I never have, but I thank God that I ever was inclined to read the Herald of Life; and I have done what I could for the cause by distributing and lending tracts and papers. Every one that I give I send a prayer to God that it may go to the right place, and have the right effect; and I have the pleasure of knowing that they are being read by a great many with interest, who are searching their Bibles to see if these things are so. May God bless the truth. I know he will.

There is a good Congregational brother who reads the Herald and tracts, and gives them to others. He don't flinch to give his views to the church. I think he will soon be a subscriber. He is a good, warm-hearted Life believer.

A poor Baptist brother has been driven out of the church because of his views; and others are leaving the church and going to Advent meetings. I do thank God that men, and women, too, are getting their eyes open to see the truth as laid down in the gospel, and have hearts ready to receive it.

Your poor sister in Christ, looking for the Master. Glory to God, I soon expect to see him.

From James W. Smith.

Br. Storrs: I am rejoiced to see the Herald of Life is insured for another year. May the God of truth and grace bless those who have given of their means to keep it alive: and may God of his mercy spare them to see the fruit of their offering prosper, even unto the end. I believe the end is not far off. The friends of the Herald will not have to make many more offerings, such as they have made; the consummation of all things is at hand. For years I have looked into the future, watching the signs of the times; and I have said again and again, that the Lord cannot come as Rome stands: and people that I have said this to years ago, say to me now, It is just coming to pass as you said. I know it. Rome is going to destruction; but it will take a little more time to make the wreck complete.

Rome is the great mile-stone of prophecy; perhaps the last one on the highway of time. May the good Lord give us all wisdom and light to read it aright, so that we be prepared for the closing scenes of the present dispensation.

My love to you, and to all that love the Lord Jesus and his appearing.

Upland, Pa., Sept. 24, 1870.

From T. W. Vaughn.

Br. Storrs: The Herald comes as a welcome visitor, laden with rich and varied delicacies, seasoned with love, and spiced to the taste with controversy, and done up in small parcels for convenience. May the Lord greatly prosper its literal supporters, who have held up thy hands in this valiant contest for "the truth as it is in Jesus." How gladly would I make one of the number, if it was in my power. The subject of "Life only in Christ" has become a very familiar theme with me, as it ever forms a tower of strength in every discussion upon the basis of our glorious hope. How completely it disarms our antagonist, and gives force to the precept, "God is love."

We have "Churches of every variety" here, and the people have become petrified with the perpetual sameness of preaching, and seldom visit the churches without some performance that will be amusing. I go around to the houses on Sundays, wherever I find myself welcome, and present the good tidings of our soon coming King, and kindred doctrines. I have discussed the destruction of the wicked with two of our orthodox ministers, and found them extremely weak, in argument, although full of scholastic lore. We must carry the war into them; but do it in love. Your brother in the bonds of the Gospel.

Pent Water, Mich., Sept. 1870.

From Eld. Wm. P. Shockey.

Br. Storrs: En route from home since the 8th, I called at Council Bluffs, and Mo. Valley, Iowa. While being entertained by our excellent Br. J. M. Smith, and my old friend A. S. Bonham, about the environs of the city of Council Bluff, we learned that E. V. Wilson, the celebrated test medium and spiritualist, was lecturing and holding a Witch of Endor pow-wow, in which he, like her, proposes the notorious lie of the spirit of a lady's mother, being attendant guest with Dr. McMahon, desiring a change of treatment. The Dr. answers, amid the crowd, "The lady is convalescent, and I shall dismiss her soon; was there to-day, but I did not see the old lady there, nor do I now see her, or any other ghost."

Never do we read, in God's book, of any prophet or servant of God consulting the spirits of their dead friends, "for the living to the dead." None but such as a wicked Saul, and his Sodomitish Mrs. of Endor. Therefore we conclude that only such in our day attempt similar deceptions.

This E. V. Wilson is the same with whom I discussed the Spiritualists' claims two years ago, at Brownville, and who agreed to go one-third the expense in the publication of it, and never reported to correct manuscript. His friends say he will discuss the issues, and my friends know I will, and desire me to do so; therefore I left the following for him to choose from, with the condition to have it reported and published:

Prop. I.—Do the holy Scriptures teach that man, or any part of man, remains a conscious entity, and communicates to living men in this life, after death, and before the literal resurrection of the body? I deny.

Or, Prop. II.—Do they teach that man and all that appertains to man is unconscious in death, until the literal resurrection of the body; and that the righteous only will ever live again? I affirm.

Or, Prop. III.—Does the Bible teach that modern Spiritualism is witchcraft and necromancy, which the holy Scriptures forbade any human being to practice under penalty of death? I affirm.

Here we leave the indefatigable to decide whether they will face the Lord's word or hide their heads.

In hope of Christ.

Aspinwall, Neb., Sept. 20, 1870.

From S. S. Call.

It is strange and astonishing how any person, taking the word of God as the man of their counsel, as their guide and chart, can advocate the torment theory as the punishment for sin after death, when the word declares that death is the penalty, the pay for transgression; and the word declares, the dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward of anything that is done under the sun.—Eccl. ix.

Now what is the Bible definition of the word death? Obadiah says, it is to "be as though they had not been." God explained it to Adam to mean the returning to dust from whence he was taken; which is the same as though he had not been. Other words are used to convey the same idea; such as, perish, destroy, destroyed, burned up. Peter says, the reward of unrighteousness is to perish in their own corruption. Thus we have the definition in as plain and emphatic language as it is possible to use.

Now let us see how Christ defines the word death as the penalty for sin. He says, Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish; like those the tower fell on; or, like those, whose blood Pilate mingled with their sacrifices. What other idea is conveyed to the mind than that they were killed, they died, and that was all.

Last of all, we being the example as worked out by the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

He died for our sins, according to the Scriptures. That is, He showed by his death what the law in justice demands of the transgressor; for he was obedient unto death, even the death of the cross.—Phil. ii. 8. What more can a reasonable, thinking person ask? and yet we find no allusion to suffering, nor to a resurrection of any kind for the fulfilment of the penalty after death; for if there is, Christ never paid it; never was obedient to any death after his resurrection.

Hesper, Iowa, Sept. 21, 1870.

From Mrs. C. Barnes.

Beloved in Christ: I felt constrained to write a few words upon the Man of sin, or the papacy. The judgment set on that power in 1782; since that time it has been consuming away. I think it is not the power to be destroyed by the brightness of Christ's coming; but "that Wicked," to be revealed to be destroyed by it, is something else. I cannot explain it; but it is everywhere, this spirit of unbelief in God's word. Italy may be declared Republic, and the Papacy be no more; but Christ is coming ere long. But if He does not come as soon as we may expect, let none faint in our minds. Christ will reward the obedience of faith; but we must be so humble that we can say, "Not my will, but thine be done." Amid all the conflicts and trials of this present time, I hope to sing the conqueror's song in that glad day.

I want to say to some I saw at the camp-meeting, I fear they do not realize the apostle's word—"Be ye therefore sober and watch unto prayer." A spirit of levity is of the world, and it would destroy every grace of the Christian.

"Holiness becometh thine house, O Lord, forever." The church must put on her beautiful garments to meet the Bridegroom.

David says, "Give me understanding and I shall live." How shall we get it? "A good understanding have all they that keep his commandments." No other way for any. Unto those who by a patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, honor and immortality; eternal life. Then let us all be up and doing; and in our Lord be strong; be waiting, watching, praying, for the time will not be long before Christ will come in glory, and take all his saints to reign with him in one eternal glory.

Wilbraham, Mass., Sept. 16, 1870.

An Afflicted Sister.

Br. Storrs: Some time since, Br. Burbank called attention to the destitute condition of Sr. S. S. Bussier, and that she is a worthy person on whom the stewards of the Lord's goods may well bestow some of the "tithes" out of their storehouse. I can well confirm his statements, as to the truth of her Christian walk and conversation, for the past twenty-four years, of my personal knowledge; and that she is now in very needy circumstances; which condition is mainly owing to her conscientious sense of duty of caring for the late Br. Bussier's two young orphan daughters (not her own children), when her talents as an intelligent teacher, unincumbered with them, might have placed her in a higher social position and easier circumstances.

SHALL WE MEET.

Shall I meet thee, my brother, in Eden restored
To purity, loveliness, beauty, and bloom?
Where God and the Lamb shall be ever adored,
And joyfulness flourish unsullied by gloom?

Shall I meet thee, my sister, where sorrow and crying,
And pain cannot enter, and death shall not be?
Not a pang ever felt—no drooping, no sighing—
Where all are immortal, and happy and free.

Oh! say, shall we meet?—or shall one but be there?
Shall I be excluded, and you win the prize?
Or I and not you: or shall neither appear
Triumphant with saints when to glory they rise?

I mean to be there, through the Master's rich grace,
My brother, my sister be this thy resolve!
O think of the bliss, to behold His bright face,
While ages on ages their courses revolve!

A season of sorrow—and joy shall awake!
A strife brief and noble—and conquest is won!
Would'st thou of the rest for the righteous partake?
Then, brother, with zeal, to the end labor on.

Enduring the cross, and despising the shame,
My brother, my sister, like Christ let us be!
The crown keep in view, and in Jesus's name,
The end of the conflict in glory we'll see!

FROM WILLIAM WOOD.

BR. STORRS; AND ALL WHO LOVE OUR LORD JESUS CHRIST:

NOT being convenient for me to have met with the people of God at the Springfield Campmeeting, it was extremely gratifying to learn of the general success and christian courtesy there manifested. Outside the proclamation of the grand final scenes ending this present dispensation, which causes in every christian a thrill of joy and exaltation, as his hope of immortality is about to be realized, was one feature connected with that meeting which gave more real pleasure to myself than it would afford to others: viz., the earnest, deep and special interest exhibited in the great fundamental truth given to earth's children by holy men who spake as they were moved by the Holy Spirit, that there is No Life in the eternal ages save by or in our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. He hath proclaimed to all men that He is the true vine, his Father the husbandman, and his followers are the branches. Now, I cannot (perhaps others may) understand how one person out of Christ can possibly have any connection with this true vine. There is danger, however, of some who are in Christ, those who are designated as the branches, will be cut off and cast away as useless branches, fit only to be burned or gathered under death's dominion: but I cannot perceive that a wicked or unregenerated person, in any form, is mentioned in connection with the symbol of the vine.—John xv. 18.

Again. Paul the great apostle to the Gentile world, in his ever memorable argument 1 Cor. xv. does not, to my best judgment, speak of any person out of Christ—branches cut off, which have become withered, or any unrighteous person who will have a part in the great standing or raising up by a resurrection of the dead to life. To all, in every church who love Jesus Christ, I would in all meekness ask (that your minds may be directed to this subject), what does the apostle teach? He says, in substance—For since by man (one man, Adam) came death, by man (one man, Jesus Christ) came also the resurrection of the dead: For as (those) in Adam all die, even so (those) in Christ shall all be made alive. In this text it is evident the apostle has especially in view the resurrection of the righteous only, for he adds—But every man in his own order: Christ the first fruits, (not Adam), afterward (not all who die in Adam) but they that are Christ's at his coming. When will Christ come? We answer, at the sounding of the last trumpet; 1 Thess. iv. 16, For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout—and with the trump of God (or under the sounding of the last trumpet) and the dead in Christ (not in Adam) shall rise.—1 Cor. xv. 51, 52. We shall not all sleep, but we shall all (who are brethren, see ver. 50) be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump. We have the assurance that by the expression, last trump, or trumpet, we have prior trumpets, which by reading some portion of the Revelation we find to be the case, for there are seven; six of which will pass away, and the seventh, (under which my impression is we are now living commencing about 1843—the sixth ending 1840), though its sounding be prolonged for a series of years, will culminate in the manifestation of our Lord and the standing up of the dead to life; for the trumpet (last trumpet) shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed.

I have no need to inform you, dear friends, what dead will be raised incorruptible, or who are to be changed; for none can possibly receive this great gift but the righteous. For this corruptible (those who have led holy lives, none else) must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality; and when this is accomplished, then shall be brought to pass the saying, Death is swallowed up in victory. The people of God gain the victory over the worst and last enemy of man by a deliverance from his dominion, or a reliving from the dead to die no more: therefore, they are said to be raised incorruptible. Who is the giver of this great victory over death? We think all can see, without more information, it is by, in, and through Jesus Christ.

Now, can it be possible that an unregenerated man, or a branch that has been cut off from the true vine and not replaced or grafted in again, can get the victory over death, when it is obtained only and alone through, or by our Lord Jesus, they having no part or connection with him? Does he raise them up? My firm conviction is, if he does this, I have made a very great mistake while investigating God's holy word, and have spent much time and labor for nought. May He who controls the destinies of all, and His Holy Spirit lead, especially all pure minds into his great saving truth.

A few thoughts about Alton Bay, and I close. Beautiful for situation is the campground at Alton Bay; perhaps no lovelier spot adorns the majestic mountainous scenery of the Old Granite State than this. On the shore of Lake Winnipiseogee, overlooking its silvery wave, refreshed and invigorated by the exhilarating influence of those pure breezes that are wafted across its bosom, meet from year to year a peculiar people who are soon expecting the second advent of our blessed Lord from heaven, and with them are congregated many devout worshippers of other sects; all of whom are endeavoring or hoping to attain the desired haven of eternal rest. Having had the pleasure of attending this meeting the present year, it was highly gratifying to witness a true spirit of liberality by a few whom I have known in former years opposed to the exposition of Scripture, in any form, save that which they then advocated. But while we may rejoice to find this spirit in the few, yet there wells up a feeling of sadness as we reflect upon the condition of the many there congregated, ever remaining in the same position, making no advancement beyond their own sectarian limits.

There were persons on the ground whose belief was predicated upon the soul's immortality; others that mankind are not possessors of inherent immortality, but at the resurrection the all who die in Adam will live again in Christ. A few believed that none but Christians would live in the future; some that the kingdom of God is the new covenant or gospel dispensation; others that the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Christ are not one and the same; others that Christ reigns now as Mediator, but soon will reign in all the power and fulness of his Father forever and ever; and still a large portion have no conception of that glorious kingdom, but as a future event. Now what should we have done? how would you, my brother or sister, have acted? would it not have been the better way to frown upon, use harshness, show a vindictive spirit, and abrupt departure from all who might dissent from us? Should we not become enemies toward each other? Should we not always remain sectarian, which is but another word for enemy, and endeavor to hinder the expression of others sentiments though antagonistic to our own? or should we approach and extend the friendly hand of fellowship and love? Should we not speak words of good cheer, such as, "Peace on earth and good will to man?" Dear christian brethren, whoever and wherever you may be, remember, "Our Father in heaven" makes the sun to rise upon all, and sends the rain both upon the just and the unjust. Now, cannot each one of us be animated by the same spirit? Can we not receive and hear patiently those who may differ from us? God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth might not perish. If we do not rejoice in this love, or a portion of it, how can we expect to be called the children of God? for they who are not the children of God are not the children of the resurrection.

LAWRENCE, MASS., Sept. 20, 1870.

MINE OPINION ON THE AGE TO COME.

BY JOHN D. SHERIDAN.

BR. STORRS:—I desire to express myself in all charity and brotherly love toward those who may take opposite views. A brother speaks of the "error of taking the moon to give light to the sun." I do not object to the comparison, but to the application. It is true the moon sheds no light only what she receives from the sun; it is as literally true of the Old and New Testaments. The light of revelation reflects from the same source or Spirit in the Old Testament that sheds its effulgent rays in the New.

I am well aware we live in a fast age, and many of our well-meaning men are disposed to rush things, and crowd many events into the past that have not been fulfilled, and are evidently to appear in the future: also at the coming of Christ there must be a great conflagration, and his enemies are all to be destroyed at once. When God judged the Egyptians, he did not so deal with them; but the plagues were of different kinds, and sent at different times; neither were all the Canaanites removed at one time to give place for Israel, although they were a wicked and idolatrous people: nor does the word inform us that so it will be in the next dispensation, after the gospel dispensation has closed and Christ has made his re-appearance to reign on the earth, according to the promise; during which time he will exterminate all his enemies; or, so it appears to me from the reading.

Personally, I have no hobby to build up; all I desire is more light and wisdom that I may be enabled to cast off all the errors that I have imbibed in my past life.

To the idea of the age to come I was much opposed one year ago, but my mind has undergone a change.

We are informed by the Revelator that the last plagues or vials of God's wrath, that are to be poured out upon the ungodly, are not all of one kind, nor to be inflicted at one time, but at different places and at different times; and to this, also, agree the prophets. It is very true Malachi speaks of the day of the Lord in which all the "proud and all that do wickedly shall be stubble," etc., should be destroyed; but Peter assures us "that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years," etc. The word will harmonize beautifully if we are willing it should without any regard to our theories. I do not see how we can dispense with the Old Testament, as it appears to be a key to the New; and with that key we are enabled to comprehend many important points that without it we could not understand.

In a conversation with one of our most intelligent ministers, not long since, as to the state of the dead, he admitted that the Old Testament did not plainly teach their conscious state, nor did the New, only inferentially; yet he could not express any sympathy with my views, for this reason, he had taken a certain stand-point that would not allow him to. Is this not the great difficulty with too many of our leading men in the different sects? And as it is more difficult to remove a blot after it is made on paper, than to make it in the first place, so it appears very difficult to change our views after they are once formed.

I have collected a long list of passages in favor of the "restitution of all things," referred to by Peter in Acts iii. 20, 21. In speaking of the second advent of our Saviour, he says, "Whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of all his holy prophets since the world began." I will give a few of the texts I have examined. "Behold the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and a King shall reign and prosper, and shall execute judgment and justice in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely . . . and they shall dwell in their own land."—Jer. xxiii. 5–8. Also Jer. xxxi. 7–17, "Behold I will bring them from the north country, and gather them from the coasts of the earth," etc. The objector may say, The new earth is here alluded to: very well, we will not disagree on that; it will be new indeed when the redeemed of the earth are gathered and the curse is being removed. Isa. lv. 13, "Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir tree; and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree; and it shall be to the Lord for a name, for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off." Eccl. i. 4, "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh; but the earth abideth forever." Matt. v. 5, "The meek shall inherit the earth." Psa. xxxvii. 9, "But those that wait upon the Lord, they shall inherit the earth." Ezek. xxxvii. 15–22, "The stick of Joseph and the stick of Judah are to be joined, and become one stick; I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel, and one king shall be king to them all; and they shall be no more two nations." Isa. xliii. 1, "But now, thus saith the Lord that created thee, O Jacob, and he that formed thee, O Israel; fear not; for I have redeemed thee; I have called thee by thy name; thou art mine." Isa. xliv. 22, "I have blotted out, as a thick cloud, thy transgressions, and as a cloud thy sins; return unto me for I have redeemed thee."

Because these blessed promises are only for the Israelitish people, can we cast them aside, as of little worth to us? No, verily; we are all interested in the salvation of God's ancient people Israel. Hear Paul, Rom. xi, 1, 2. "Hath God cast away his people? God forbid, for I also am an Israelite, of the seed of Abraham, of the tribe of Benjamin. God hath not cast away his people which he foreknew." Also, read the 3d, 4th and 5th verses. "Even so, then, at this present time, also, there is a remnant according to the election of grace."

Again, the objector may ask, what will be done with Peter's world burning? For my part, when we read in connection, 2 Pet. iii. 6–10, or, in other words, follow his subject through, I can see nothing inharmonious with all the other witnesses on the same subject.

"The world that then was, perished;" and as he evidently referred to the people, so the 10th verse, being a continuation of the same subject, must refer to the ungodly who will remain until Jesus comes; and I think we may reasonably infer from this passage, and many others, that many of them will remain long after that period of time. Peter in speaking of the "day of judgment," puts us on our guard that we need not expect all these things to be accomplished in 24 hours of time. "But beloved, be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day."

As I have already taken up much of your space, I will close by saying, I long to meet Jesus the LIFE-GIVER, and all the dear pilgrims together with God's chosen people Israel: and I feel certain the time is near at hand.

THREE RIVERS, MICH.

TIME'S CONTINUAL SPEED.

IN every action that a man performs, some part of his life passeth away. Though we do nothing, time keeps his constant pace, and flies as fast in idleness as in employment. Whether we play, or labor, or sleep, or dance, or study, the sun posteth, and the sand runs. An hour of vice is as long as an hour of virtue. But the result which follows upon good actions, is infinitely different from that of ill ones. The good, though it diminish our time here, yet lays up a pleasure for eternity; and will recompense what it taketh away, with a plentiful return at last. When we trade with virtue, we do but buy pleasure with expense of time. So it is not so much a consuming of time, as an exchange. Or as a man sows his corn, he is content to want it awhile, that he may, at the harvest, receive it with advantage. But the bad deeds that we do here, do not only rob us of so much time; but also bespeak destruction hereafter. The one treasures up a pleasure in a lasting life; the other provides us with a death eternal.

Man, as soon as he was made, had two great suitors for his life and soul; virtue and vice. They both travelled the world with trains, harbingers, and large attendance: virtue had before her, truth running, valiant, but plain and homely: then labor, cold, hunger, thirst, care, vigilance; and these but poorly arrayed, and she herself, in plain, though clean attire. But looking near, she was of such perfection, that she might very well stand forth as an emblem of whatsoever omnipotency could make most rare and generous. Modest she was, and so lovely, that whosoever looked but steadfastly upon her, could not but fall in love with her. After her followed content, full of jewels, perfumes, and all the massy riches of the world. Then joy, with mirth, and all essential pleasures. Next honor, with sceptres, thrones, and crowns imperial. Lastly, glory, shaking such a brightness from her sunny tresses, that I have heard, no man could ever come so near as to describe her truly. And behind all these, came eternity, casting a ring about them, which, like a strong enchantment, made them forever the same. Thus virtue. Vice came thus: before her first, went lying; a smooth, painted deceiver, clad all in changeable, but under her garments, full of scabs, and ugly ulcers. She spoke pleasingly, and promised whatsoever could be wished for in behalf of her mistress, vice. Upon her, wit waited; a conceited fellow, and one that much took man with his curious tricks and gambols. Next sloth, and luxury, so full, that they were afterwards choked with their own fat. Then (because she could not have the true ones, for they follow virtue) she gets impostors to personate content, joy, honor, in all their wealth and royalties. After these she comes herself, sumptuously apparelled, but in truth a surfeited slut; so full of disease and filthiness, that if any embrace her, they were sure to perish by her breath. After her, followed, on a sudden, like enemies in ambush, guilt, horror, shame, loss, want, remorse and torment, and destruction in the rear. And thus they wooed fond men, who, taken with the subtle cozenages of vice, yielded to dwell with her, by which he had his nature so empoisoned, that he perished miserably.

Why should I wish to pass away this life ill, which is of so much worth? If I must daily lessen it, it shall be by that, which shall rejoice me with a future income. Time is like a ship which never anchors: while I am aboard, I had better do those things that may be of advantage to me at my landing, than practice such as shall cause my commitment to a dungeon when I come on shore. Whatsoever I do, I would think what will come of it when it is done. If good, I would go on to finish it. If bad, I will either leave off where I am, or not undertake it at all. Vice, like a spendthrift, sells away the inheritance, while it is but in reversion; but virtue, husbanding all things well, is a purchaser.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

AN ANSWER TO PRAYER.

A LITTLE over a century ago, when that part of the country now known as the State of Maine was almost a wilderness, two little boys, aged eleven and nine years, might have been seen at the close of a long summer's day slowly wending their way through a dense forest of that State.

The State then formed a part of Massachusetts, and was called the District of Maine. Indians were very plenty in the District in those days, and each settlement was supplied with a rude fort or block-house in which the settlers could protect their families from their red foe.

The little boys above mentioned, were going to the adjoining settlement, which was situated beyond a thick growth of timber, and at quite a distance from their home, in quest of a doctor. Their father had been absent from home several days on a hunting excursion with others from the settlement, and they were left with their mother and younger brother on their farm at some distance from the block-house. Before going, their father told them that if any of them were sick, or the Indians were found to be in the vicinity, to hasten immediately to the block-house for aid, or seek it as a temporary home. A short time after their father's departure, their little brother Willie was taken dangerously ill, and no medicine which their mother then had in the house would in the least allay the ravages of the disease. At the close of the third day, having lost all hope of his surviving unless the aid of a physician was procured, Mrs. Sawyer (for such we will call their mother), there being no physician at the nearest settlement, determined to send her two sons, Henry and Charles, to the one beyond the timber for the required aid. After partaking of their supper of bread and milk, they set out accompanied by their faithful dog, Bunce. Mrs. Sawyer hesitated somewhat in her resolve when she saw then depart, but the thought that by their going, her darling boy might be relieved, stilled the remonstration that was being framed upon her lips. She watched them from the open window till they disappeared in the forest, then with a heart heavy with gloomy forebodings, she returned to the bedside of her sick child.

And here it is, in the forest, we find the boys at the commencement of our story. Darkness came down upon them before they had completed half the distance, but still they pushed manfully on, not once stopping to rest, although they were very tired. Several times they wandered from the path, but under the guidance of faithful Bunce, they were enabled to regain it. Some time after they passed the half-way elm, they espied a light through the trees, and hearing voices, they thought some settlers were near arranging traps for wild beasts, and they hastened on as fast as their feet would carry them. The noise they made in going through the brush and trees attracted the attention of the supposed settlers, and very soon they saw the light approaching them which wavered and flickered as if it were carried in the hand of a person. The boys shouted, and, to their astonishment, were answered by Indian voices. They were gazing about in the darkness in search of some place of concealment, when the moon suddenly burst through the clouds and revealed to them two Indians within a short distance of them. As they were observed by the Indians it was of no use to try to escape; for escape was impossible. The Indians came up, and taking each of them by the shoulder, jabbered something in their Indian tongue and then led them away in the direction from which they came. They had gone about five miles, sometimes walking and sometimes riding on the backs of the Indians, when they came to a large rock. Behind this they were taken and placed in the midst of a circle of Indian warriors. The Indians were surprised to see two white boys among them, but the Indians who captured the boys, explained to them how they came in their possession which appeared to satisfy the warriors, for they returned immediately to the conversation in which they had been engaged. This tribe was one for a long time hostile to the English, and its members would seek every opportunity of wreaking vengeance upon the unsuspecting settlers. Many questions were asked the boys, most of which concerned the little settlement of Yarmouth. They answered these as well as they could, and to the satisfaction of their interrogators. From the broken English and gestures of those engaged in the conversation, the boys soon found that an attack was to be made that night upon the settlement of Yarmouth. They well knew that if the Indians were successful in surprising the settlers, not one would escape death. At about twelve o'clock all the Indians but one left their camp to make the proposed attack upon the settlement. The Indian that remained to watch over the boys soon began to grow sleepy, and thinking the boys would not attempt to escape even if their hands and feet were not secured, laid himself down to sleep with only one arm over each of them. He was soon fast asleep. The boys were anything but sleepy. The thought of the fate of the settlers, and their own situation drove sleep from their eyelids.

An idea occurred to Charlie and he whispered to Henry, "O Harry! we have not said our prayers to-night. Perhaps if we pray to our Father in Heaven, He will send some one to take us home; for you know, mother says, God always answers prayer." With this they disengaged themselves from the arms of the sleeping Indian, and knelt down upon the ground. In their childish language they asked God that he would send some one to take them home in safety, that their little brother might recover, and the settlers so soon to be attacked, might be warned of their danger. Satisfied that God would answer their prayer, they lay quietly down by the side of their sleeping guard. They were both falling asleep, when Henry was suddenly roused by something cold being pressed against his cheek. He started, much frightened, but to his great joy found it to be Bunce, whom they had not thought of since their capture. He immediately awoke his brother, being very careful not to rouse the Indian. From the appearance of Bunce they soon found that he wished them to follow him into the forest. He would plunge into the forest, remain a few moments, and then return, and endeavor to pull the boys in that direction by their clothes. They at last got up and prepared to follow. Before going they seized the gun of the Indian to use in case they were pursued, as they were well used to handling fire-arms.

The moon shone brightly, and guided by Bunce, they were enabled to walk quite rapidly. Three or four miles had been passed and still they pressed on, the fear of the Indians strengthening their fast failing limbs. They soon after gained the top of a slight eminence, when looking down into a small clearing in the valley below, they saw a smouldering fire and persons in a reclining position clustered around it. They approached this camp cautiously not knowing whether it contained enemies or friends. They had got within a few yards, when Henry espied something white lying upon a log. They went up to it, thinking that perhaps it might be something by which they could tell whether those by the fire were Indians or white persons. It proved to be a straw hat, and to to their joy they discovered after a close inspection that it was their father's. They then knew that one of those by the fire must be their father. They hastened to the camp and were soon in the arms of that dear parent. They told the settlers of their capture and escape, and of the attack to be made upon the settlement.

A part of the settlers started without delay to the assistance of the settlement. They arrived soon after the arrival of the Indians, and helped to repulse them. The rest of the settlers, including Mr. Sawyer and the boys, set out for Mr. Sawyer's clearing. When they arrived they found Willie much better, the time he began to amend being about the time the boys were engaged in prayer. In this single instance we see the efficacy of prayer illustrated.

"Ask and ye shall receive" is the pleasing invitation to all to come to God and ask in the name of Christ for all needed benefit. Though you, my young readers, may never have occasion to ask God to send the ravens to you with food, or some one to guide you out of a solitary forest, yet, if you ask Him in sincerity of heart for anything you need, He will surely answer your prayer, for in the Holy Book we find that those who seek shall find, and to those who knock, it shall be opened unto them.—Selected

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if h[e] ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should follow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures." The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

A DEFENCE OF THE LIFE VIEWS.

[THE following note was sent to Stewart Carlisle, Wilmington, Del., by the writer, who is a son of Bishop Scott of the Methodist E. Church, and himself a minister of that church. The letter and response will speak for themselves.—EDITOR.]

LETTER OF MR. SCOTT.

MY DEAR BR. CARLISLE: I was sorry that I parted from you in such an abrupt manner yesterday. I thought it might have hurt your feelings. I did not intend that. I only wished to break the conversation because I thought it was no use to continue it.

I do think you are mistaken. There are different kinds of life. And I cannot but think that man is a compound being. The body having animal life. The soul having its life. There are certain phases of your view that look plausible. Other phases do not look so to my mind. But suppose you are right. It is not essential to salvation to believe it. And while as an honest Christian man you feel it your duty to teach it, ought not the teaching of it to be held greatly subordinate to the teaching men their need of Christ and how to get to him?

Do let us be awake to bring men to the Lord Jesus, for they will perish if we do not.

Yours, in love,

A. T. SCOTT.

Aug. 20, 1870.

P. S.—I shall be away until Thursday or Friday. Write me if you feel disposed.

RESPONSE BY STEWART CARLISLE.

MY DEAR BROTHER SCOTT: Your very kind and welcome letter has passed its second and third reading. I cannot but admire the spirit that prompted you to write it. Oh, if all who profess to be the followers of the meek and lowly Jesus were careful of one another's feelings, not purposely to wound each other, and if it should be done unintentionally, hasten to heal the breach in the spirit of genuine humility and love, thus showing that whatever else we may lack, we still have the spirit of Christ in this respect. I think if I know my heart, that I love all who love our Lord Jesus Christ, whatever name they bear; and my prayer is, that the time may speedily come when "names and sects, and parties may fall," and the followers of Christ shall see eye to eye, and all come to the unity of the faith, to the perfect stature of men in Christ. Till then we must "contend for the faith once delivered to the saints," and "hold the traditions" of the apostles, as they received them from the Master. We must also "hold fast the form of sound words:" "hold fast the faithful word, that we may by sound doctrine both exhort and convince the gainsayers;" and as "all Scripture given by inspiration, is of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect; thoroughly furnished unto all good works;" how important that all our teaching is in harmony with inspiration: how very important when we present an idea for the consideration of our fellow-men, involving interests that are eternal, that we do not "handle the word of God deceitfully; but by manifestation of the truth, make the gospel commend itself to every man's conscience in the sight of God;" "and by rightly dividing the word of truth, give to each their portion in due season."

With these few preliminary thoughts, we shall pass to a short review of your kind note, and may our loving Father in heaven guide our thoughts, and give us clear conceptions of divine truth.

First, then: "You think I am mistaken." Then you are not positive about it? See: "There are different kinds of life, and you cannot but think that man is a compound being." In regard to life, the Scripture speaks of two only; the one, "The life that now is;" the other, "The life which is to come."—1 Tim. iv. 8. Do you think there is any other? If so, please refer us to the chapter where it may be found. This life, is compared to "a pilgrimage," "a handbreadth," the rapid motion of the "weaver's shuttle," a "tale that is told," a "vapor that appeareth for a little while and then vanisheth away;" and that though man's breath is in his nostrils, his foundation is in the dust. "Their breath goeth forth; they return to their earth; in that very day their thoughts perish." "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, until thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken, for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

These are a few of the utterances of divine truth, in regard to the "life that now is;" and they might be multiplied almost to any extent; all bearing the same testimony, and showing beyond successful contradiction, "that the life that now is," terminates in death; and death, means a return to the dust of the ground. Now, my dear brother, look these passages full in the face, with the hundreds of others, all speaking of man's mortality, and then think, and think, until you have found the passage of Scripture in which immortality is applied to man, and then tell me, who are the subjects of, and when put in possession of immortality? Please give us a "Thus saith the LORD."

Into the "life which is to come," there is but one "door," and but one class of persons enter it: "Those who by patient continuance in well doing, seek for glory, honor and immortality;" they enter, and shall go in and out and find pasture; it will never be open to those whom Paul said, "seeing you judge yourselves unworthy of eternal life;" it will never be open to those wicked Jews who would "not come to Christ that they might have life." "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood ye have no life in you." "He that hath the Son of God hath life; he that hath not the Son of God shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him:" it can never be removed.

Now my dear brother Scott, stand with me, if you please, by the grave of the "man who was in honor and understood not; now like the beasts that perish;" having "wandered out of the way of understanding, he shall remain among the congregation of the dead;" having "gone to the generation of his fathers, he shall never see light." "The grave shall be his dwelling place to all generations." These men have lost the "Life that now is:" are they to be the recipients of the "Life which is to come?" Is our Lord Jesus Christ the door? Is there any other way into the kingdom without being classed among thieves and robbers? You may observe here, that we are holding "fast the form of sound words." "This is the faith once delivered to the saints." This is the "sound doctrine," which Paul said the time was coming "when men would not endure; but would turn away from the truth, and should be turned to fables." "For since by man came death," and death, (by the solemn edict of God himself) is a return to the dust of the earth, of which man was created; how important the question, of the "man of Uz," "If a man die, shall he live again?" Tradition would say, "if a man die shall he be happy or miserable?" But this is not the faith of Job; for he was content to wait until the latter day, when his living Redeemer would stand upon the earth, and Job would see him for himself; though the worms might destroy him, and his reins be consumed. Now, brother Scott, what we wish you to point out to us from the sacred Scriptures is this: How do men that have lived, "without God, and had no hope in the world," and have died and perished "like the beasts," get life in a future state?" Remember the word "Life;" see if you can "think" that out Scripturally, and in your thinking do not forget that, he that hath "the keys of death and hades:" "He that shutteth and no man openeth, and openeth and no man shutteth;" "He that saith, I am the way, the truth and the life;" "I am the resurrection and the life;" and who says, also, "of all that the Father hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise them up at the last day;" (Job's latter day,") says also of the wicked rejectors of him, that they "shall not see life."

Now, my dear Br., do not turn away from this truth, for it fell from the lips of "Him who spake as never man spake," and who knew what was "in man;" our glorious LIFE-GIVER. "I give unto them eternal life." Praise his holy name, for such an unspeakable gift. Christ, the gift of God, is eternal life, "and this life is in His Son;" and although death has been dragging down to his territory many of his dear ones, still they are not forgotten; the church of the first-born are written in heaven, in the "Book of Life;" and "when Christ, who is our life, shall appear," faithful to his promise, he will raise them up and give unto them eternal life." We have no disposition to make our Father in heaven a "liar," by saying we have "immortal souls:" no, no, we must adhere to the record; "and the record assures us," that "God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son;" and this life is to be "brought unto us at the revelation of Jesus Christ;" and praise the Lord, I feel content to wait, believing that He that is to come, "will come, and will not tarry." And should we lose the "life that now is," before he comes, we shall sweetly sleep in Jesus, believing that Jesus died and rose again, and them that sleep in Jesus will God bring with him from the dead. This view of truth makes the doctrine of the resurrection a positive necessity, and without it even the righteous perish. Those passages quoted, with hundreds of others of like import, prove the future life of the righteous by a resurrection from the dead. The future life of the righteous, my dear brother, is not left to mere inference or implication; but is taught in language plain and positive. Now just find one passage, yes just one, where the term life is applied to the wicked dead men, and show it to us, if you please. If the views here presented are true (and that they are not remains to be proved), then it is "essential," aye, essential to salvation to believe it. Shall we permit ourselves in view of man's mortality and death state to be hissing out that diabolical falsehood, "Ye shall not surely die"—"Ye are immortal, and can never, never die?" God forbid it: this is to make God a "liar;" and we know no sane man would do this if he knew it. Tell men they are immortal and can never die; and that God knows it to be so, and what more did the serpent do? No, no, my dear brother, tell men the truth whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear. Tell them "the wages of sin is death;" "the soul that sinneth it shall die." "If they live after the flesh they shall die;" "if they sow to the flesh, they shall of the flesh reap corruption;" "they that do such things are worthy of death;" "to be carnal minded is death;" and "the end of these things is death;" and when we succeed in converting one from the error of his way, we have "saved a soul from death," and hidden "a multitude of sins."

Is it essential that we believe that we are under the sentence of death, a death in which, nor after which, there is no life of any kind? but die and perish we must? Is it essential that we believe, "That God so loved the world, that He gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but have everlasting life?" Oh, my brother, how can we allow ourselves to stand before our fellow-men, knowing their mortality, and as we quote the passages above named, tell them that death means everlasting life in the most unmitigated and indescribable torment? God forgive us; for I have done it myself; but I obtained mercy, because I did it ignorantly. "Say unto them as I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the—eternal torment—no; but—death of the wicked." And why? Because to die in wickedness is to die beyond the power of living again. God would rather the wicked would turn from his way and live: "turn ye, for why will ye die?" We never read where God has said to the wicked "ye shall not surely die; ye are immortal, and can never, never die;" nor can we find where any of his apostles ever said so, nor did his Son ever say so.

Is it essential to believe God's truth, that nowhere speaks of man's being or possessing inherent immortality? The testimony of the Bible is, that "God only hath immortality," and it is never applied to man this side of the resurrection; and then only to the righteous. We may think what we please; thinking is one thing, believing God's precious truth, by which men are sanctified, is quite another. Saul of Tarsus thought he ought to do many things contrary to Jesus of Nazareth; but when Jesus met him on his errand of blood, and threw him to the earth, he did not confer with flesh and blood, neither did he go to Jerusalem, to them which were apostles before him, but he commences to preach the faith which once he destroyed; and during his ministry, so far as his record comes to us, we find him alluding to the destiny of the wicked about twenty-five times, and we never find him telling men that they were "immortal," and "must live forever, as long as God should live, either in happiness, or endless misery." Not a word of it: and yet he shunned not to declare unto them the whole counsel of God, "and kept back nothing that was profitable;" (and we might add, essential). When Jesus offered up that memorable prayer, "Sanctify them through thy truth, thy word is truth," he knew the time would come when "men would teach for the commandments of God, the doctrines of men;" and we have no hesitancy in saying, that that is now being done to an alarming extent. Time-serving, ease-seeking, men-pleasing, truth-hating, and God-forgetting characterizes multitudes who are committed to the conflicting theories of the doctrines of men. "Man is a compound being." True, he has in his composition, flesh, blood, bones, sinews, muscles, nerves, etc.; but as yet, only one life, and we may tax our thinking sources to their utmost capacity, but we can never find any other than the "life that now is," until Christ comes. So that it would be better for us to conclude that, death is our enemy, and not "the gate to endless joy," as some would have us believe; and that death is the last enemy that is to be destroyed; so that if death means eternal life in misery, then when death is destroyed, it follows, as a logical conclusion, that eternal life in torment must be destroyed also.

Now, my dear brother, I am aware that your mind will naturally revert to passages which may seem to teach other views; but as the word of God is true, and "no lie is of the truth," will you not examine these plain passages, and tell me whether the views herein presented are not in harmony with the character of our heavenly Father as a "God of Love:" is it not in harmony with man's free agency, that life and death should be set before him, and if he rejects or neglects the offer, and spends his time in the gratification of his animal nature, and thus proves himself unworthy of eternal life, he should return to the dust from whence he came, as a being unworthy of eternal life? And now, my dear brother, let us fully "awake" to the solemn truth, "that the wages of sin is death;" (and not eternal life in misery); "but the gift of God is eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

Whatever else you may seek for, or employ, to deter men from wickedness, never threaten them with life in a future state; for that is just what they have forfeited, and Jesus, the author of eternal life, says they shall not see. If ministers would confine themselves to the word of God, which "liveth and abideth forever," we should never hear such phrases as "immortal soul, deathless spirit, undying nature, a death that never, never dies;" while hours and hours are spent, and ministers seem to vie with each other in giving the most graphic description of the flight, of what they are pleased to call, an immortal spirit, to the realms of an endless bliss, all of which we solemnly avow to be nothing more than the fitful flights of high wrought imaginations drawn from the doctrines of men, and have no foundation whatever in the word of God. Jesus, our life, by a resurrection at the last day, or a translation at his coming, is the theme of apostolic preaching; and while the world may be full of "teachers having itching ears," who think they will never die, and teach the same to others, we shall content ourselves with the fact, that we know in whom we have believed, and are fully persuaded that he will keep our eternal life until he comes, and then shall we "appear with him in glory."

From your brother in Christ, looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who will fashion our bodies like unto his glorious body at his appearing and his kingdom.

"THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL."

A REVIEW BY JOEL A. SIMONDS.

A BAPTIST Minister in this place is a firm believer in the immortality of the human soul. This review relates to a conversation had with him at his own house, in reply to the question put to him, "Why do you believe that the soul is immortal?"

His 1st Argument—The Philosophy of Matter.

He urges this argument to prove that the soul is immaterial, and therefore immortal. He says, that one property of matter is inertia, which renders it impossible for matter to move of itself. That if it moves at all, it must be moved by something that is not matter, and which can exist independently of matter. This power, he says, is immaterial and immortal—the immortal soul.

If this argument proves any thing, it proves too much. For it claims that all matter is powerless; that it cannot move itself; that it can be moved only by that which is not matter; by that which can exist independently of matter; by that which is immaterial and immortal—its immortal soul. This being true, not only man, but every material thing that lives and moves, from the highest to the lowest forms of organized matter must be moved by its immaterial—immortal soul, for it is impossible for matter to move without such a power or soul. It reduces all forms of organized matter to one common level. One form of matter has no more power to move itself than another; for all matter is alike powerless. One form of matter needs to be moved by a power outside of itself just as much as another; and no form of matter, whatever it may be, can live and move without this same immaterial, independent power, called the immortal soul. If this be true, what becomes of man's boasted superiority over the animal? Are we prepared for such a conclusion? No. If the argument proves any thing it proves too much.

But this argument may not prove any thing. If we do not know all the possible properties of organized matter, it proves nothing. All we know, we know of matter, or through the different forms of matter. God made all forms of matter. Each of these forms reveals distinct qualities or attributes belonging to each of their respective forms.

Who can say that these qualities or attributes exist independently of the forms that reveal them? A living man has certain living attributes. Who can affirm that these living attributes will continue to exist after the living man to which they belong is dead? Man was made of dust. By breathing the breath of life, he became a living, thinking, and conscious man. Who can, knowingly, affirm that matter cannot think? And that when man ceases to breathe the breath of life, his thoughts will not perish? Can any of us say that we know all the possible capabilities of organized matter? If we cannot, then this argument proves nothing.

The power, which in this argument is called "the immortal soul," is the power of God. God made all forms of matter. He provided a law by which they should live and die. He indicated their physical, intellectual and moral power, by the form he gave them; and their destiny by his word. He it is, that exists independently of their forms. He lived before they lived, and he will live after they are dead. But he is not their "immortal soul." These forms can live as God provided that they should live; and they can do what God adapted them to do. These forms of living matter develop certain qualities or attributes, which depend on their respective forms for existence. For instance: A living man will manifest the qualities of a man. A living horse those of a horse; and a living dog those of a dog. But when the man, the horse, and the dog cease to live, then those qualities will cease to exist. The man who was made of dust, breathes the breath of life: he lives, he is conscious, he thinks, and he remembers. He is a living man. If his breath goeth forth, he will die, and return to dust, and his consciousness, his thoughts, and his memory will perish. If man dies in this way, what will be left for the "immortal soul?"

The 2d Argument.—"The Consciousness of the Soul after the Death of the Body."

B. urges this argument with considerable assurance. I will remark here at the commencement of his proofs drawn from the Bible, that the issue between us is one of great importance for us to understand. If the soul is immortal, the faith of the gospel is one thing. If the soul is not immortal, then the faith of the gospel is another and a very different thing: so that none but the plainest and most unequivocal testimony should be relied upon on either side. The point now before us is this, That the soul is conscious after the body is dead; therefore, the soul is immortal.

If it should be proved that the soul is conscious after the death of the body, this will not prove its immortality, as God may destroy both soul and body in hell.

The first proof cited, is the case of the rich man and Lazarus. "And it came to pass, that the beggar died, and was carried by the angels into Abraham's bosom; the rich man also died and was buried. And in hell (or, the grave) he lifted up his eyes, being in torments." There is nothing said or intimated in this passage about the souls of either the beggar or the rich man. It reads, "The beggar died, and was carried to Abraham's bosom." The same man that died was carried to Abraham's bosom. If the man died, the man was carried. If the soul died, the soul was carried. In either case it does not touch the point. For whatever died, was the same that was carried. If the passage read, The body of the beggar died, and the soul of the beggar was carried, then it would apply to the proposition to be proved; but as it is, I do not see how it can be used at all. So of the rich man. He died, he was buried, and in hell (or, the grave) he lifted up his eyes being in torments. It was the same man every time. If the passage read, The body of the rich man also died and was buried, and in hell (or, the grave) the soul of the rich man lifted up his eyes being in torments, then the passage would prove that the soul is conscious after the death of the body; but it does not read in this way, nor intimate any such thing; therefore, this testimony cannot be considered to have any force as proof that the soul is conscious after the body is dead.

The next passage introduced is in Phil. i. 23: "For I am in a strait betwixt two, having a desire to depart and to be with Christ, which is far better." Whatever this passage may mean, it does not say any thing about the soul. Paul does not say, Having a desire that my soul may depart and be with Christ, after my body is dead. He nowhere in his writings expresses such a hope as this. But he does say, "For in this tabernacle we groan earnestly desiring not to be unclothed, but clothed upon, that mortality may be swallowed up of life." He does say, "The time of my departure is at hand. I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith, henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord shall give me at that day; and not to me only, but unto all them, also, that love his appearing." He does say, that, "When Christ who is our life shall appear, then shall we also appear with him in glory;" that when he shall appear "the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we that are alive shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air;" that "unto them that look for him, shall he appear the second time, without sin unto salvation;" that when he comes he will "change our vile body, and fashion it like unto his glorious body;" that for this "we which have the first-fruits of the Spirit groan, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body;" that "if there be no resurrection of the dead, then they also which are fallen asleep are perished." Paul says all of this, and much more; but he nowhere expresses the hope that his soul will be with Christ while his body is dead. Paul prayed for the "whole spirit and soul, and body." His hope was for the whole man, and not for a part of the man. This witness don't seem to know any thing about the soul being conscious after the body is dead. His testimony, so far as it bears upon the question at all, is against it; therefore we will dismiss him.

2 Cor. v. 1–4, is next urged as proof that the soul is conscious after the body is dead. It is from the same witness whose testimony we have been considering. It reads thus: "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands eternal in the heavens. For in this tabernacle we groan, earnestly desiring, not to be unclothed, but to be clothed upon, that mortality might be swallowed up of life." Paul testifies to the same thoughts in Rom. viii. 23: "Even we ourselves groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body;" and also in 1 Cor. xv. 53, "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality; that death might be swallowed up in victory."

This testimony does not contain one word about the soul being conscious after the body is dead; but it does show that we ourselves (not our souls), who are found worthy to be clothed upon with our house from heaven will become immortal when mortality shall be swallowed up of life. This will not take take place when we die, or when our bodies die, but when the Lord comes from heaven and changes our vile body and fashions it like unto his glorious body. Paul does not seem to be a competent witness on the question under consideration, for he don't say any thing about it.

The thief on the cross is next brought forward to prove that the soul is conscious after the body is dead. Luke xxiii. 42, 43. The thief said unto Jesus, "Lord remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom." And Jesus said unto him, "Verily I say unto thee to-day, thou shalt be with me in paradise." This passage, like those we have already considered, says not a word about the soul; therefore it can prove nothing about it. But in this record, Christ promised the thief, that the thief (not his soul) should be with Christ (not with his soul), in paradise. Now if we can understand what persons the names of Christ or Jesus and the thief designate, then we can know what persons will be together in paradise. Personal names are never applied to the soul, or mind, or understanding. Hence we know nothing of them only as we know the persons or bodies to which they belong. Personal names are given to persons or bodies to distinguish them from each other. The name of a person signifies the whole of the responsible man. The soul is responsible only when it means the person or body; but when it is used as an attribute of the body, or persons, it is never responsible. Personal names in the Bible, as in all other books, always belong to the body and follow the body. For instance: Jacob said, "bury me with my fathers, in the cave which is in the field of Machpelah. There they buried Abraham and Sarah his wife; there they buried Isaac and Rebekah his wife; and there I buried Leah." Again: "David is not ascended into heavens." Why not? "Because David is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us to this day." So of Christ—the names of Christ were applied to his body while he lived, to his body while he was dead, to his body when he was raised from the dead, to his body when he ascended up to heaven, to his body while in heaven, to his body when he returns, and to his body while he occupies the throne of his father David. The body alone is responsible; the body alone is punished; and the body alone is to be rewarded. Therefore the promise that the thief should be with Christ in paradise, means simply that the living body of the thief should be with the living body of Christ in paradise. Then the case of the thief on the cross does not prove that the soul is conscious after the body is dead.

POPE-SELF.

BY A. BOYNTON.

"Every man hath a pope breed within him."—Luther.

THIS is no less a difficulty for us to contend against than it was in the Reformation. True, science, letters, knowledge, have made an advance; superstition perhaps is less, but bigotry, self-esteem is ruling man as much as ever; only a few are aware of the workings and natural tendencies of their own hearts to evil, both in thought and action. The spirit of selfishness or self-esteem seems the spontaneous growth of the natural heart; and like the weeds of our gardens needs constant care lest they outgrow the finer graces of the Spirit. This pope-spirit is the soonest thing to manifest itself, when holy love begins to wane in the church. The love of God shed abroad in the heart renders its possessor child-like, teachable, humble. Self-love at once develops "a pope," which, far sooner than one would suppose even in such a congenial soil as is the corrupt heart, develops "infallibility." Know thyself, is a requisition little heeded and less practised. Perhaps we are not among the most competent of teachers, but this lesson we find very few will even look at; in fact they seem totally blind, past thought or feeling; they have so accustomed themselves to look outwardly, their eyes are fixed, set in their sockets; only in one direction can they see, and that outwardly. Now as before is fulfilled the words of Christ and the prophet found in Matt. xiii. 13-17, "Therefore speak I to them in parables: because they seeing, see not; and hearing they hear not; neither do they understand. And in them is fulfilled the prophecy of Esaias, which saith, By hearing ye shall hear, and shall not understand; and seeing ye shall see, and shall not perceive: for this people's heart is waxed gross, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes have they closed; lest at any time they should see with their eyes, and hear with their ears, and understand with their hearts, and should be converted, and I should heal them. But blessed are your eyes, for they see; and your ears, for they hear. For verily I say unto you, that many prophets and righteous men have desired to see those things which ye see, and have not seen them; and to hear those things which ye hear, and have not heard them."

It is the mighty power of God alone which can change and keep changed our hearts and minds. For this let us ever fervently pray and confidently believe.

West Batavia, N. Y., Oct., 1870.

From Edward Mason.

Br. Storrs: Having had the privilege of reading your paper for nearly a year, and enjoying what corresponded with my views of the word of God, but differing materially from some that wrote long articles, setting forth their views of the declarations of the Scriptures, and reading your article in last week's number on the "Age to Come," I take the liberty to send you a few thoughts upon the subject.

I understand from the instructions given by our Lord to his disciples concerning the Kingdom to come, that it was offered to the Jews, they having rejected it, Jesus told them it shall be taken from you and be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits in its season; therefore, I infer that it cannot revert back to the same nation that rejected it. The kingdom of heaven, or reign of Jesus with the Jews, at the first advent, was three and a half years, or half of the week spoken of by Daniel the prophet, that he should confirm the covenant with many for one week, one half of that having been accomplished, where do we look for the fulfilment of the balance of the week but with us that wait his return to set up or establish his reign and kingdom on the earth, that he may subdue the people under us, and the nations under our feet? Hence when Jesus returns, I look for the same power and works to be performed as at his first advent, preparatory to His being annointed King to reign and rule until He puts down all rule, authority and power; and the last enemy to be destroyed is death.

Why do I look for the return of my Lord and Master soon? Because of the events that have taken place and are still taking place, fulfilling to the letter the Scriptures speaking of those events. What, say you, are those events of which you speak? They are the taking of the Beast that carried the woman; also, the end of the dominion of the fourth beast. The false prophet also will soon be taken, and cast alive into the lake of fire burning with brimstome. These events are enough to awaken in us a spirit of watchfulness and preparation for our Lord's return. The vision is now speaking, as saith the prophet, "at the end it shall speak and not lie." Only a little while and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry. Now the just shall live by faith: and I trust that none of us will draw back but press for a crown of righteousness. Yours, waiting, watching and praying.

A New Publication.

A Bible View of Hell: Exposing the vain philosophy and traditions of men regarding the Nature of Future Punishment, comprising an Exposition of "The Rich Man and Lazarus," "The Lake of Fire," Etc., By E. Wolcott, Keyport, N. J. Edited, with an Introductory, by Wm. H. Spencer, Rochester, N. Y.

This work Br. Wolcott commenced some time ago, but the failure of his health prevented him from finishing it for the press. Soon after our return from the annual Anniversary, at Springfield, the manuscript in its incompleted form was placed in our hands, by his request, to prepare for publication, and we are glad to be able to state that it is now nearly ready for distribution. The work is undoubtedly condensed some from the author's design; but we venture to say that it has lost none of its originality and richness.

Our dear brother, who is now suffering with very feeble health, is so well known that the mere mention of this work is sufficient to secure for it a wide spread circulation. It is offered below the cost of the first edition, and beautifully printed. Let your orders, dear reader, come in immediately for all you can distribute to advantage; and all orders will be filled as soon as it is received from the hands of the printer. Single copies, post paid, (to those who wish to purchase) 5 cents; $4 per hundred. Address,

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 12, 1870.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their anthorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The European War has at present no new phases; and to print the reports of one day to contradict them the next is not worth setting type for, and would add nothing to our paper for good. The general features of the war indicate that the result may yet be a universal European struggle between monarchy and republicanism, which most likely will end in anarchy, and be followed by the kingdom of God.

The Straits of Orthodoxy.

Last week we alluded to this subject. The doctrine of inherent immortality has been so thoroughly sifted and defeated, and is so utterly without a text of Scripture to support it, that rather than abandon it, its advocates resort to the most wonderful manipulations to save it from the utter extermination to which it is doomed. It was born in heathen speculations, nurtured by a corrupted Christianity, matured by the Harlot Mother of abominations, and spawned into Protestantism by the fears of some of the Reformers, who held back Luther from repeating the deadly blows he laid upon it, when, among other things, he placed "the immortal soul" doctrine with "the Roman dunghill of decretals." There is where it belongs; and there it would have remained had Martin Luther not yielded to the persuasions of his more timid associates in the Reformation.

But God has raised up men in England and America, in this generation, who are not to be terrified in their encounters with this monster dragon, though it may have seven heads and ten horns, and though its tail has drawn and cast to the earth a third, or two-thirds of the stars of heaven, and challenged Jehovah himself to make His existence more durable than its own—declaring, "it will live as long as God lives." Truly, this is "opening its mouth in blasphemies against God, to blaspheme his name."

Yet this dragonic power has received a deadly wound, which is likely to call for an innumerable company of Doctors to heal. But medicines are multiplying to save inherent immortality from that death that awaits it.

The last remedy, that has come to our notice, is the one we alluded to a week ago; which seems to be growing in favor among our orthodox brethren, and has been concocted to escape the horrible result, to the greater part of the "immortal souls," of eternal torture. The remedy is, that none of these souls will be consigned to eternal torments until each of them has first had as favorable an opportunity and as ample means employed with it as the most favored of the saved; and then those who have persisted in their wickedness will be eternally tormented; and as a basis of this view, they use the expression, "God is no respecter of persons;" so all men must have, sometime and somewhere, an equal chance to know God and become reconciled to him. It follows, if this does not take place in this life, it will in a future one. This last item, they are, at present, shy of admitting; but when pressed on the subject, dare not deny it.

Here, then, is the strait of orthodoxy on the question of inherent immortality. It may be that but few of them are bold enough to own such to be their true position; but a close conversation with not a few of them will disclose this fact.

Let us now look at this new "Soothing Medicine," that is to secure a lease of life to the doctrine of the inherent immortality of the soul, and pacify such as have caught "the distemper" of "No Life out of Christ."

First: The main text relied on is, "God is no respecter of persons." The text is found Rom. ii. 11. By looking at it, in its connection, it will at once be seen that it can have no such application as our orthodox Doctors would have us think. The Apostle is speaking of God's impartiality in judgment, and showing that He "will render to every man according to his deeds," (verse 6), whether he be Jew or Gentile: whether he was under the law, or without law. In this matter of the distribution of rewards, "There is no respect of persons with God."

Pray what has this to do in the distribution of favors? May not God distribute favors variously, if He pleases? Has He not done it in all ages, and among all people? What is the history of the world, or of the church, but a history of a various distribution of favors? But when God reckons with men for the use they have made of those favors, He is no respector of persons, but renders to each according as they have improved or misimproved the one, two, five or ten talents bestowed on them. Saith the Saviour, "He that is faithful in that which is least is faithful in much: and he that is unjust in the least is unjust in much."—Lk. xvi. 10.

It is not the amount of favors or grace given that determines a man's character and destiny, but the use he makes of what is given. On this principle God deals with all his creatures. The penalty to follow misimprovement is not inflicted because the transgressor has had just as much to improve as as some one else; but because he has not improved what has been given him, whether it be little or much.

The idea that because the Judge of all is no respecter of persons in judgment, therefore, He is not in the distribution of favors, strips the Ruler of the Universe of all independence, and compels Him to do for all what He may have done for one: in fact, compels Him to do the bidding of the creatures He has made, however rebellious they may choose to act. According to this new theory, any sinner may enter the plea, in excuse for his sins, "I have not had the advantages that others have had who are better than I am."

But how does this doctrine, that, God is no respecter of persons, and therefore will send none to eternal torments till they have had all the means employed with them that the most favored have had to save them from such horrors, stand in view of the teachings of inspired men and the Son of God?

Take one example, which may, perhaps, answer instead of a multitude to be found in the Bible. The Saviour, in denouncing Capernaum for its impenitency, said, "If the mighty works, which have been done in thee, had been done in Sodom, it would have remained until this day." Where are the men of Sodom now, according to orthodoxy? In eternal torments—suffering the vengeance of eternal fire. But the Saviour saith, they would not have been there, if the same means had been employed with them that were employed with the men of Capernaum.

Again, the Saviour saith of Chorazin and Bethsaida, "If the mighty works had been done in Tyre and Sidon, which have been done in thee, they had a great while ago repented, sitting in sackcloth and ashes."

Do all these things favor the new orthodox theology, of like means, employed in the same measure with all men, before their immortal souls are sent to eternal torture, if such a fate awaits sinners? Ought not orthodoxy to blush to resort to such a refuge to save alive the pet theory of inherent immortality? Will they not open their eyes to see, that this one doctrine, or fancy, lies at the foundation of all the corruptions of Christianity; dishonoring God; virtually denying the atonement; making men universalists, restorationists, or infidels, and bolstering up "Spiritism," the last development of the theory of inherent immortality, which is now cursing the world?

"John v. 28, 29."

We are constantly receiving communications on that subject. It really seems to us, that this topic is exhausted, and though we have no fault to find with the writers of these articles, we have the impression that by giving that one text such prominence in our writings, we damage the cause we wish to promote. As to ourself, we have not the slightest objection to assent to the claim that it relates to a literal resurrection; and then, in our mind, it does not prove the wicked dead are made alive in the face of a multitude of plain texts declaring the contrary, and looking at the known perfections of God.

If we must accept John v. 28, 29 as speaking figuratively, we would prefer the view of the subject presented by Br. Grim a few weeks since, and we intend to present that in a Tract shortly, with other matter, for the help of such as prefer the figurative to the literal use of the language employed: but we beg of brethren to give us a little rest from reading so many long manuscripts on that one text. Let our opponents surfeit themselves with one text against our view, for that is about all they have, and if they can keep our attention on that, to the neglect of the general tenor of Scripture and the known attributes of God, which overwhelmingly condemn their construction of John v. 28, 29, they will continue to set at nought our view of "No Life out of Christ."

Our judgment is, that if men will still cleave to the said text, as proof of the reliving of dead sinners, against the positive testimony of the Bible to the contrary, we had better leave such persons to the bliss they feel, at the idea of a re-living and hopeless torture of their fellow sinners, and go to those whose minds are burdened with such horrid representations of the character and government of God. These will receive the truth, and rejoice in the light of life only to those in Christ; remembering, that "the man who wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead."

"The Nazarene."

This is a little sheet, being a small octavo of four pages, published by Wm. N. Glenn, at Stockton, Cal.; we hardly know on what terms, as none are stated; but it is doing good service in the cause of truth. We only wish it could be enlarged to the size of our sheet and issued as often. Its articles are necessarily short, but spicy. We take pleasure in transferring many of them to our columns, and we thank Br. Glenn for giving a list of our "Campaign Documents" in his magazine, and commending them to his readers. He says of them:

> We wish to impress the value and importance of them upon the minds of our readers. They are each a complete concordance of the Scriptures, regarding the subject named.

Let our friends remember our Tract Fund just now, as we need largely to replenish our stock of Campaign Documents.

"What Meanest Thou?"

Among the shipping which one morning lay by the wharf at Joppa was a Phoenician vessel receiving freight for a Cicilian port. The time for setting sail was drawing nigh when a stranger presented himself and took passage. The cargo at last on board and put in proper place, and all being ready, sail was hoisted and the little craft glided quietly out of port and rested upon the broad bosom of the Mediterranean. All went prosperously and gaily on, and when the mariner's light-hearted songs echoed through the vessel, keeping time with the murmuring breeze as it sighed through the rigging, the stranger went below and laid himself down to sleep, and while he slept, the voice of song and of mirth gave way to dark forebodings, and countenances that beamed with hope and joy began to tremble with mortal fear. When yonder swelling cloud began to lift its frowning brow the practiced eye of the captain was quick to see it, and everything was put in readiness to meet the approaching gale.

Soon it came and raged. Lashed to fury by the driving wind, the angry billows roared and beat threateningly upon the storm-tossed bark, and ever and anon dashed over it with a violence which menaced it and its precious human freight with destruction. When the sturdy heathen crew had grown weary with fruitless battling against the mad elements and, weak with toil and fright, had vainly "cried" for help "every man unto his god" of wood or stone, and had "cast forth the wares that were in the ship into the sea, to lighten it of them," they were sore afraid and, wondering why the gods denied their prayers, bethought themselves of what had been told them by him who, heedless of the storm that raged without, lay wrapped in quiet slumber. He was startled from his repose by the eager cry of the "shipmaster:" "What meanest thou, O sleeper? arise, call upon thy God, if so be that God will think upon us, that we perish not."

Awakened out of sleep, the stern realities of the situation flashed upon conscience-stricken Jonah, and full well he knew there could be no safety for his companions till himself had satisfied the hungry cravings of the deep. "Cast me forth into the sea;" said he, "so shall the sea be calm unto you." In that deep was he buried, but went not into the jaws of death, for God was with him throughout all his rebelliousness and chastened him unto obedience.

Poor Jonah! Thou didst think to flee from the presence of the Lord and thus shun the work assigned thee. Thou didst forget the language addressed to God by the illustrious king of thy people: "Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there." Well for thee the Psalmist spoke truly, else hadst thou miserably perished in the "hell" (sheol) of the great deep whither thou wast cast. Even then He heard thy prayer and brought thee forth to do His will.

To the thoughtful mind, this circumstance in the experience of the prophet affords a valuable lesson. Professing Christians read of Jonah's attempted flight from duty, and they wonder at his short-sightedness; but very many are the followers of his example. In all the great theological reforms that have occurred since the reformation first began to scatter the papal structure, there have been hosts of Christians who, brought by the grace of God, to the knowledge of some great truth, and thus commissioned to bear the glad news to others, have been so fearful that their fellow-beings would think evil and scornfully of them that they have refused to do heaven's bidding and have, Jonah like, sought repose in some quiet part of their little theological ship. But in many cases, judgments have come upon them and broke their slumbers with the stern cry: "What meanest thou, O sleeper?" and have chastened them unto obedience.

In a marked degree is God calling His servants to the proclamation of unpopular truths. Attempt to disguise it who may; the Protestant church is now being impelled to a more earnest and studious investigation of inspired truth respecting man's nature, and of the Scripture doctrine of the administration of justice than at any previous period of its history. We need not attempt a retrospect of the manner in which this has been brought about, nor may any conclude it is not so because there is not a more open acknowledgment of interest in the subject on the part of leaders, and evidence of thought on the part of the masses. It is a fact; and as the piercing light of truth has been thrown upon certain anti-Scripture doctrines of the church it has so clearly revealed to very many minds the utter weakness, and absolute God-defaming nature of those doctrines, that they have been compelled to forsake them.

Great numbers have followed the light of truth, though it has brought upon them about as much unpopularity and suffering as Jonah feared at the hands of the Ninevites; while more, perhaps, have shrunk back and sought to comfort themselves by saying, "surely this or that way is just as good and will produce as great results." Although this sort of comfort may sometimes be sought in sincerity, a sincerity born of ignorance, we fear it is in general only an attempt to shun the duty of proclaiming truth by starting off for Tarshish instead of going where God has directed them. They may have pleasant sailing for a time, but sooner or later storms arise and they find themseves aroused from sleep only to be plunged headlong into the jaws of some monster difficulty where they are scourged and chastened until they repent.

There are thousands in the various, so-called, orthodox religious bodies, whose faith in the commonly received notions of man's nature and destiny and of the relation which Christ sustains to his church has been overturned, and who, were they loyal to the truth, would be among the foremost advocates of the near personal reign of Christ and kindred truths, but who attach to those topics no importance whatever and seldom mention them. To such the startling query will ere long come: "What meanest thou, O sleeper?" It may then be found that not a few have slept away their hope and have, like Jonah, awakened to a terrible consciousness of guilt.

"The Son of man is as a man taking a far journey, who left his house, and gave authority to his servants, and to every man his work . . . Watch ye therefore:" "lest coming suddenly he find you sleeping." We are well aware that the temptation is strong to shun the unpopular doctrine of Christ's soon return and reign on earth, and attendant truths, but we warn our fellow-Christians of the danger of such neglect, and exhort them to "watch, and pray, that ye enter not into temptation."

But there is another class of sleepers, they who want more time for the pleasures of sin, who put off enlisting under the bright banner of the Captain of our salvation. Reader, are you living without Christ—living after the flesh? After long years of the Spirit's gentle pleadings with you, are you still rebellious? Do you still refuse to do the Lord's work, and seek to escape out of His presence by more closely wrapping yourself in the mantle of worldliness? Then think upon your situation. You are treading the verge of an awful abyss. Death reigns, and its fearful tide of destruction rolls before you. You may close your eyes whenever you approach a cemetery, but you cannot dismiss the consciousness that its habitations are many and increasing with fearful rapidity. You may stop your ears, too, but you cannot shut out the solemn warning which comes up from its host of ghastly occupants: "yet a few days and thou shalt come and make thy bed with us." When the siren songs of sin are softest and most beguiling; when the lamp of life's hope burns brightest and bewitching fancy rears castles of richest mould, and festoons them with gems of beauty and rare delights; when fortune smiles sweetest and cares seem chased away, the sudden approach of death will force back upon your unwilling ears the awful cry: "What meanest thou, O sleeper?" and will snatch you from your revelry and fill you with remorse for a life misspent, and with agony at the prospect of a yawning grave unlit by any gospel promise or ray of hope?

You are living in marvelous times. The world is ripe for the awful change that is soon to occur; the day of the Lord is at hand. Soon the Judge of all the earth will come and will execute judgment on all "them that know not God," and will punish them "with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of his power." Think not some greater warning will give you time for repentance; for, as it was with them that were destroyed by the flood, so will it be with you except ye repent and fly to Christ, the rock of refuge. "They were eating and drinking . . . and knew not until the flood came and took them all away; so shall also the coming of the Son of man be." Hearkening not unto the warning voice of Noah, everlasting destruction come suddenly upon them. If you also hearken not, when you shall cry "peace and safety," then sudden destruction will come upon you. "What meanest thou," then, "O sleeper?" Arise and go to Jesus. He will meet you with outstretched arms. Ragged though you are, he will put upon you the clean white garment of righteousness. Poor though you are, he will enrich you with the priceless blessings of redeeming love. He will put new songs in your mouth, and his peace will make music of such strange sweetness in your heart, you will love to abide in his presence and delight to do his will. Come! O come! and receive the gift of eternal life.

Glances at Assumptions.

BY MARIA M. WEAVER.

Maintaining that we are "one" in Christ Jesus, there being neither "male or female," I again notice some of the writings of the leading men who oppose the "Life views."

Says W. Sheldon, Cor. Ed. of the "World's Crisis," in an article headed "Resurrection Theology:"

> "Paul says, 'This I confess unto thee . . . there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and unjust.' 'Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?'"

And, says Eld S.:

> "This question needs to be reiterated generally at the present day of skepticism. And many need to be reminded of the Saviour's address to the Sadducees who denied that the dead were to rise: 'Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God.'"

Again:

> "A familiarity with the Scriptures ought to remove doubts from the minds of all Bible believers; and the 'power of God' to perform what he has promised ought not to be questioned. The Saviour here recognizes the power of God as the only prerequisite to a resurrection; and this power can be exercised on sinners as well as saints; but the indwelling of the Holy Spirit is made a pre-requisite to a resurrection to immortality, or a resurrection like Christ's."

In the first place, we ask, what is this "power of God" under consideration? We read of his power to create, to uphold, to provide and care for mankind; but what does it mean in this connection? I believe it means his plan of salvation; or, in Bible terms, the gospel. Says the apostle, "I am not ashamed of the gospel of Christ, for it is the power of God unto salvation." Furthermore, we read of Christ's being "declared to be the Son of God with power by a resurrection from the dead." This is the gospel power "unto salvation," and all who experience it will be saved eternally,

We indeed do believe that God will "perform what he has promised;" but he nowhere promises to exert his power to revive unholy men for the sake of aggravating them with a sight of joys and glories not obtainable to them, or to torture them with pains that can neither benefit them or anybody else. God uses his "power" with more honor and dignity. He never yet stooped to corruption but to better its nature or condition. Glory be to the Lamb for the purity of his gospel revealed to us through him.

Br. Sheldon asserts that "the power of God is the only prerequisite to a resurrection." The Bible says no such thing; on the contrary, the "only prerequisite" is a connection with Christ the Life-giver. And to those connected with him, he giveth life everlasting. S. says, "this power can be exercised on sinners as well as saints." This is an unreasonable assumption, without a shadow of Bible proof to support it. Such an act would upset the plan of redemption entirely. The plan is made to save only those who get into a savable condition—become connected with the Saviour. Now, to say it can save those outside of it just as well as those who have been recognized as inside, is childishness in the extreme. It is very easy for human judgment to say, what God can do; but the question should be, what will he do? Let us not make a gospel to suit our preconceived opinions, and then to fortify it, cry out, God can do this or that. Let God do what he purposes, and if it be contrary to our expectations, our language should be, "He doeth all things well."

Eld. S. in one place says, "God quickened Christ with 'the power of an endless life,' and he will . . . in like manner quicken those who possess the Holy Spirit." True, entirely, but how untrue what follows: "The 'power of God' will resurrect all men, regardless of character." This is an assertion that cannot be proved.

Furthermore, "It was the power of God that raised Lazarus, and others; but as Christ was the 'first-born from the dead,' to an immortal life, they must have been raised to a mortal state; and the wicked will hereafter be raised on the same principle. But we will not here pause to argue the point."

Without giving our opinion about the nature of Lazarus' new life, we remark, there are but two types presented in the Bible of mankind in their saved state. Moses represents those who have been dead and made alive again; and Elias stands to represent those who do "not sleep," but are "changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump." But where do you find a being to represent the wicked dead? They have no remembrance in the final account, at all. Christ is a sample of first-fruits of them that sleep in him; but it is rather bemeaning "Lazarus, and others," whom Christ thought worthy to work miracles on, to introduce him in society as a sample or first-fruit of the wicked, miserable, abominable. . . . hosts of satan, that have gone down into death totally unfit for future life and altogether out of God's plan of futurity. O, consistency, consistency, how thou art rejected. Indeed, Br. Sheldon has not paused "here to argue the point;" and if we trace him still further we shall simply find him inferring or assuming this or that, and warning us not to doubt God's ability to do whatever is preached by his mistaken servants! When our opponents will "pause" to "argue the point," we may hope to see them growing in knowledge. When people have plenty of ammunition on hand it don't take much of a "pause" to use it, and is it not best to get provided before we commence firing?

God's word will endure. Truth will triumph. Let us labor in patience.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM ELD. GEO. BANGS.

BR. STORRS: I feel that I ought to apologize to you, and to the readers of the HERALD OF LIFE, that I have so long neglected to write, and that I have not written often concerning the very important truth, "No Life out of Christ," so ably and so fearlessly held forth in its columns; for truly, I consider it the truth of God; now specially designed by him as meat in due season for the household of faith; particularly at this time, when so great light is shining upon the inspired word, in these last hours of time, so that the Bride may make herself ready to welcome the Bridegroom when he shall come to celebrate the marriage; which glorious event seems to be not far in the future; and is so much desired by the true follower of the Lamb.

I can truly say, the more I search on the subject, "No Life out of Christ," the more firmly I am convinced it is Bible truth; and the more clearly do I see the attributes of mercy; and justice brought to view, as pertaining to the character of God. For, how could God be more merciful to the impenitent, unbelieving sinner, than to let him "remain in the congregation of the dead?" And, how can He be more just than to execute the penalty of the law, which is death? And how could He manifest his great love, or pity to a fallen race, more perfectly, than by giving "His only begotten, his beloved Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life?"

When I consider the perfection of God's judgment toward the race of mankind, I feel to adore him as the righteous judge of all the earth, and worship him as the source of all light, life and happiness, both present and future.

I thankfully acknowledge to have received and read with satisfaction every number of the HERALD OF LIFE since my first subscribing for the paper; and wish much to have it continued to me, and will do what I can to meet the expense of publishing it, and spread the reading of it in this locality. But there is a strong opposition here by those who ought to do otherwise, and great indifference on the part of the people generally about looking at the subject without prejudice. Yet I hope some good has been done, and more may be accomplished even here. Yours, in hope of Life when Christ shall come. Amen.

DANVILLE, P. Q., CANADA, Oct. 2, 1870.

FROM WM. C. METCALF.

BR. STORRS; I can truly say, I rejoice in the advance of light and truth, and the success with which our heavenly Father is crowning the efforts put forth by yourself and the devoted band of brethren and sisters who are so earnestly and fearlessly cooperating with you in disseminating the glorious doctrines of the Divine word, connected with the Life views. Though sad that any, whose names have been so dear, and influence so salutary, should be drawn away, yet I rejoice that the number is steadily increasing of those who, being convinced of the truth, are willing to sacrifice even their good name and the favor of friends, if need be, that they may be instrumental in leading others to come and accept of Life eternal as the gift of a God of love,—through faith in Christ alone.

I intended to have been present at Springfield, to enjoy with you the feast of good things a loving Father's hand so bountifully provided for his believing children there; but was denied that privilege. It gives me great pleasure to learn that the spirit of union, harmony, brotherly kindness and love, was exhibited in all your deliberations; that the tract cause received such an impetus for good, and last, not least, that the precious HERALD and its venerable Editor received such pledges of material aid, as well as intellectual, as to insure not its existence merely, but its onward and upward career of usefulness. I fully agree with others who express the conviction that our paper is the best religious paper they are acquainted with, and that it improves with age. I have read nearly every number from the first to the last, and I can truly say, though all have been interesting, their interest with me has much increased during the last few months.

May the choicest of Heaven's blessings attend you; the Holy Spirit dwell in and comfort you; unfold to you, more and more, the rich treasures of wisdom and knowledge, and make you the messenger of light to thousands more who are now held by the bonds of tradition and man-made theology.

HOLDEN, MASS., Oct. 3, 1870.

FROM LEVI BOUGHTON.

BR. STORRS: I am well pleased with the HERALD. No other paper, printed, as far as I am informed, makes our future Life rest solely on Christ, and through the resurrection. All seem very tenacious about having a corruptible resurrection, as well as an incorruptible one; which we find no where in the Bible. Our good Lord is preserving your life for the one purpose of putting down error, and you will be successful just as long as you are possessed with His Spirit. The end seems near by the events now fulfilling. The beast gone, and its rider thrown; we may look for the violence, compared to a great millstone cast into the sea, on that great city Babylon. Soon our Lord and LIFE-GIVER will be here. May we be ready.

VICTOR, N. Y., Oct. 1870.

FROM JARED HOADLEY.

BR. STORRS: It is gratifying to see how earnestly the friends of truth step forward with material aid to sustain the HERALD OF LIFE. The exhibit contained in the issue of Sept. 14, manifests a real interest in continuing so valuable a medium of light in a dark world. With the experience and mind to guide, which now presides over it, may it continue until the Lord comes.

About one year has elapsed since I first commenced an investigation of the Bible with the idea that man is wholly mortal. As a result, permit me to record my convictions that the Bible teaches no future life except to those in Christ. He is the LIFE-GIVER. This is the essential foundation of all truths. The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life. Reason and the principles of philosophy, also, demonstrate that the whole of man returns to dust. Life or death is the destiny which awaits him.

Life is prominently presented for his acceptance as a free gift; still, he may refuse, and death will be his reward. This is just the truth needed to keep him from sliding into disbelief of the gospel.

In these days of fables and traditions, the inventions of men declare, "the soul is not subject to decay and dissolution, as the body is." I would ask, Which sins? the body, or the soul? All that sins is subject to death. "The soul that sinneth it shall die." "The wages of sin is death." Admitting that man consists of soul and body, shall it be thought impossible that God should make man of a mortal soul and body? If he may be supposed to be wholly born, he must wholly die. As matter is mortal and corruptible, so that which depends on matter must also be corruptible. If this, as a reason, is sufficient to prove the mortality of the souls of beasts and fishes, (for they are represented as souls), will it not also apply to man? "Man hath no pre-eminence above beasts . . . that which befalleth the other . . . all have one breath."

"Why will ye die?" is the pathetic appeal addressed to his understanding. "As I live saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that he turn from from his wicked way and live."

Yours in the hope.

NILES, MICH., Oct. 6, 1870.

FROM GEO. H. WATERHOUSE.

BR. STORRS: The HERALD OF LIFE, I cannot do without. I do rejoice in, and believe the truths it advocates, without a doubt of the soon coming of Christ and no life out of him, the great and glorious LIFE-GIVER. It has not been in my power to do so much for the support of the HERALD as I would have been glad to do, but I do feel to rejoice and thank the good Lord that there are so many brethren and sisters that have done so nobly in the support of the paper, that has so ably held up Christ as the only LIFE-GIVER to this dying world. I do feel to rejoice that I have been led by the Spirit of God and his word to see and embrace this blessed truth of No Life out of Christ. My trust is in him who has tasted death for every man. The apostle says, We both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God, who is the Saviour of all men, specially of those that believe. And as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up.

This was a universal offering of life to the Israelites; but was there not a condition in the offering, and it shall come to pass, that every one that is bitten, when he looketh upon it, shall live. Even so must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have eternal life. The Son of God was a universal offering to the world; for God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved.

These Israelites that did not look on the fiery serpent must die as surely as they would if the serpent had not been lifted up. Even so will all surely die, and remain in the state of death that do not believe on the only begotten Son of God, as they would if Christ the LIFE-GIVER had not been given. So it looks to me.

O may the Lord help us to do his will and keep his commandments that we may have right to the tree of life and may enter in through the gates into the city.

EAST SAUGUS, MASS. Sept. 1870.

FROM WM. MONTGOMERY.

BR. STORRS: I have been endeavoring to study the prophecies this last twenty years, and every event that occurs, year after year, only tends to deepen my interest in the subject. In reading over the long list of kings or rulers spoken of in Dan. xi., the last one where it is said, "he shall come to his end, and none shall help him," and also the scarlet colored beast, Rev. xvii., I have always supposed represented Louis Napoleon. "The beast that was, and is not, and yet is," answering to the three Napoleons, father, son and nephew.

John saw the woman sit on the scarlet colored beast a short time before the judgment; and it is a fact, known to the world, that Napoleon protected and kept the Pope in Rome ever since the commotions in 1848, but now the woman is "unhorsed" and the beast gone into perdition, or into a lake burning with fire and brimstone; a striking emblem of the strong sulphurous smell of fire, and smoke of a battle-field.

If this view is correct, then the next link in the grand chain of prophecy is the standing up of Michael, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people.

Here, now, I must stop, as I cannot go one step farther without more light; and I have no doubt but in the good providence of God, he will make such developments as will enable us to see and understand the signs of the times. In the meantime, let us be faithful, always "looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ.

Yours, looking for that blessed hope.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Oct., 1870.

FROM BENJAMIN MELLOR.

BR. STORRS: How cheering it is to read the little epistles of our dear brethren and sisters: how our heart is revived and refreshed as with new wine by the reflection that there are such a goodly number of dear ones whose hearts and souls are so much in unison and harmony with our own, and whose affections are centered on the same loving and adored Lord and God, looking and hoping for the return of the same King Jesus, with the same anxious longing that a bride looks and longs for her absent betrothed. How we love to hear them tell of their faith, hope, and love; and how our heart seems to leap toward our beloved ones as if we would embrace them as parts of our Divine Head. Yes, beloved, now we are the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be; but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is; and every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as He is pure.

Oh that we may all be found having oil in our vessels with our lamps, when the Bridegroom shall come. Amen.

Please find inclosed ten dollars, and credit to my pledge. I am well pleased with all your new arrangements at your anniversary. How good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity.

Love to all waiting for Christ.

ROCKDALE MILLS, PA., Oct. 3, 1870.

FROM G. B. MARTIN.

BR. STORRS: LAST evening I received No. 47 Vol. 7, of HERALD OF LIFE, filled, as ever with the best of instructive reading; and I love it more and better than ever: hope the Lord may doubly bless its mission in the future, as long as it may be needed.

I think the signs of the times are certainly very ominous that the present dispensation is just about closing, and a better one to usher in, when Christ will take the kingdom, with his saints, and displace all other kings and kingdoms, and reign on mount Zion, and before his ancients gloriously. God speed the blessed hour.

I feel to rejoice at the unanimous effort put forth, and success attending the seventh anniversary, at Springfield, to sustain the HERALD OF LIFE for vol. viii.; and that Leonard C. Thorne was created Assistant Editor for the coming volume, a good choice, a zealous and excellent man. I hope the Lord may spare, sustain, and bless you both.

I hope the blessing of God may attend all the dear brethren and sisters who have contributed so liberally to the sustainance of the HERALD, Tract, and other matters; such as, the afflicted, etc., all these sums are in the Lord's Treasury, and will bring good interest: wish I could do more, but I can't at present. Yours, in the bonds of Christianity.

GOLDFIELD, IOWA, Oct. 2, 1870.

FROM JAMES HARLING.

DEAR BROTHER IN THE BLESSED HOPE: Rejoicing in the light of "Jesus only," the blessed LIFE-GIVER and ransom from the grave, I hail with joy the good news of the HERALD OF LIFE still to go forth to show the true character of our all gracious, pitiful and merciful Father. LOVE: and our precious Jesus the way, the truth, and the life; the blessed gift of a blessing Father! Yes, adored be his name, not willing that any should perish—to be as though they had not been—but imploring man to live eternally with Him. Praise the Lord for a simple faith; that union by obedience this side of the grave is the only escape from that drear abode. How it horrifies me to hear that my dear Jesus (that has pleaded and suffered so much for me, that has given me many, many a reconciling kiss) is to be the means of placing Adam's race in a thousand times worse position than did Adam! No, never will my heart believe it of Him or my heavenly Father. He was to save HIS people from their sins. Glory to God for the light on the Scripture. Being justified freely by his grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus. Then it's a favor to be redeemed from the power of the grave. Yes, my heart is often cheered with the faith of soon seeing my all-glorious Jesus. It stimulates me to strive against all infirmities and transgressions, so to be ready to welcome my long desired Emancipator, my life and peace, my all.

I rejoice that we can number near twenty Life believers in heart, and a vast number of sympathizers. Our good brother Dr. Everson, loans us his room every Lord's day afternoon. He has been overcome by the tract on the "Atonement," and by meditation and study of the word; was sweetly led into the light of "Life only in Jesus." We have one noble souled woman that dares to ask of Jesus the light to enlighten. So was easily fed by wisdom, faithfulness and truth. The Lord help us to be simple and sincere; earnestly, lovingly contending for all such God-honoring, Christ-exalting truth.

It would cheer you on in your labors if you were to see the few of us that meet to talk over this blessed truth. Nothing short of rejoicing with joy unspeakable and full of glory. Yours, in Covenant love.

CHICAGO, ILL., Oct. 1870.

FROM WM. H. CONNELL.

BR. STORRS: I like the HERALD too well, after reading it for the last year, to have it discontinued now. It is more than four years since I embraced the "Life views;" yet I often read letters in the HERALD that give me new ideas on that subject. I have read your tract on Baptism, and have sent it around, hoping it may enlighten some on that subject. I have been connected with the Adventists for more than twelve years, and most of the time have taken either the "Crisis" or "Voice of the West;" and in those papers read more or less on the subject of Baptism, yet I think your tract on the subject has given me more light upon the question than any thing I ever read before. Hoping to share with the redeemed the glories of the everlasting kingdom, and welcome the LIFE-GIVER when he comes, I remain your brother.

DELAWARE CENTRE, IOWA, Sept. 1870.

MARTHA A. HANSE, Mendota, Minn., writes: Ever since I became acquainted with the truths advocated in the HERALD OF LIFE, last winter, I have been anxious that others too might enjoy the light which I have received, and have tried to make what effort I could to enlighten them. I have received some favorable letters in reply to papers and documents which I have sent. The last letter, from a brother of mine, I received yesterday. I will inclose it to show you that the effort seems not wholly lost. The Mr. ——, he speaks of, is a Congregationalist, and has preached in that neighborhood for several years. I wish to send to him some of your Campaign Documents. Select such ones to send to him as you think proper.

GEO. W. PEARSON, Milford, Pa., writes: We cannot get along without the HERALD OF LIFE. It is the only preaching that we have here. My wife and myself being entirely alone as regards the Life views in this place. I sometimes try to do a little preaching in my own way; but the people turn away and change the subject. A careful examination of the nature of man and gospel plan of salvation seems to be the last thing that men wish to think of. We are watching the events now transpiring in France and Italy, and are hoping that the Master's return will not be delayed; in which hope, we sign ourselves your brother and sister, trusting that He will soon come and destroy these devices of man and reign in glory and power over the whole earth.

JOHN W. STOKES, Lewiston, Me., writes: I prize the HERALD OF LIFE, and hope that we shall be instructed by it as much the coming year, if time holds out, as we have the past year: it is about all the Life preaching we have. We long for the paper to come every week. Thank the good Lord that we are fully convinced that there is no future life without a connection with Christ the LIFE-GIVER. If all should turn from this belief, we must stand fast to the end; which we believe to be very near indeed. Glory to God: praise his holy name, that we were ever brought to see the glorious truth of No life out of Christ. Oh how it makes us love God: glory to his holy name. We should like to have the privilege of conversing with you, or to hear you preach the gospel truth of "No life out of Christ."

T. A. DEAN, Sandwich, Ill., writes: I cannot do without the HERALD OF LIFE. I prize it next to my Bible. I am nearly alone here. I try to have some read the HERALD; but they seem to be afraid the truth will hurt them. I bless God I was led to embrace the truth as it is in Christ. The Bible reads a great deal plainer to me than ever before. Some ask me, if I still hold on as I started? I tell them, I am stronger in the faith than ever. It seems strange to me that I was so long kept in error and did not see that the Bible reads as it does, that man is a mortal being, destitute of inherent immortality, and of the earth, earthy. Yours, in the hope of life when the LIFE-GIVER comes. God bless you and the cause you are engaged in.

M. C. CONVERSE, Ettie, Iowa, sends $5, and writes: I would not like to be without the HERALD OF LIFE, for it is all the preaching I get: the people here do not like to hear that the Lord is coming, though they profess to love him. I often wish I could live where I could meet with those of like precious faith; but I do not expect to, until the kingdom is set up under the whole heavens; and my prayer is, that we may all meet then and enjoy eternal life through our LIFE-GIVER. Your unworthy sister.

F. WINANS, Chicago, Ills., writes: I think the paper grows better and better. I do not keep any on hand, but circulate to any that will promise to read them. I am very much delighted with the culminating evidence that the King is about to appear in his beauty, and the ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with everlasting joy, and sorrow and sighing flee away forever.

ALFRED ANNABLE, Manchester, Mass., writes: I appreciate the HERALD OF LIFE and of the Coming Kingdom, and the great mission to which it is devoted, viz., "No Life out of Christ." I am also very much interested in the articles copied from "The Rainbow;" and more especially in the articles which appear from your pen and those of the brethren on the glorious theme of the age to come. Yours, in hope of the glory soon to be revealed.

ELD. L. L. HOWARD, late of Richmond, Me., now of Hallowell, Me., writes: Some time since, I became acquainted with Br. W. H. H. McAllister, of St. Albans, Vt., and through his kindness I have since had the pleasure of reading the HERALD OF LIFE. I am much pleased with the spirit manifested in its writings, and am interested in the questions discussed in its columns. I have always felt that I would not be bound by any church fetters or influence, and that I would investigate freely those questions which seem to demand our notice in these last days. I hope to be guided into all truth. Your Br., in the Lord.

ANN M. DICKINSON, Cleveland, Ohio writes: I send $5 for the HERALD OF LIFE, that blessed Messenger. My prayer is, May the Lord bless you and give you a double portion of grace and strength to help forward this great work in sending the truth broadcast, that such as will read may know in whom we have eternal life. May the Lord bless all his dear children, everywhere, in these days of trial. Pray for me.

CONSTITUTION OF "THE LIFE AND ADVENT UNION."

ARTICLE I. The object of this Union is to use all available means to promulgate the doctrine of Life only in Christ, the personal, proximate advent of our Lord Jesus, and all sentiments calculated to spread vital godliness.

II. Any person believing in Life through Christ alone, (thereby denying any future life to the wicked) and sustaining a Christian character, may become a member of this Union by subscribing to the Constitution.

III. The officers of this Union shall be a President, Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, and five Directors, who together shall constitute the Managing Board, and who are to be elected annually.

IV. The Managers shall be authorized to collect funds for the Union, which funds shall be transmitted to the Business Agent, who shall keep account of the same, and transfer them to the Treasurer.

V. The Annual meeting and such other meetings as may be deemed necessary by the Board of Managers, shall be called by giving three weeks' notice.

VI. The Secretary shall keep a record of the names and post-office addresses of the members.

VII. This Constitution may be amended by a two-thirds vote at any Annual meeting.

NOTE.—This organization is in no sense a Church, as that term is usually understood. It is simply a Union for the transaction of the business specified in the first Article: in other words, it is a "Business" association; and the 1st and 2d Articles were so framed as to make it impossible for any one to vote in its meetings who does not harmonize in the main object. Hence, the Union, at its seventh annual meeting (1870), declared, by the decisive vote of 54 to 7, that by "Life only in Christ," we mean, there is no entity in man, called spirit or soul, that survives in death; and that persons holding such views are ineligible to vote in the transaction of the business of the Union. All such persons do really deny the fact intended to be set forth in Article I., of "Life only in Christ." They make the life principle to be, first, of themselves; and only secondarily of Christ; thus perverting the truth which the Union was formed to promote.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Couldst Thou not Watch one Hour?

Thy night is dark—behold the shade is deeper
  In the old garden of Gethsemane,
When that calm voice awoke the weary sleeper,
  Couldst thou not watch one hour alone with me?

O, thou so weary of thy self-denials,
  And so impatient of thy little cross,
Is it so hard to bear thy daily trials,
  To count all things a gainful loss?

What if thou always suffer tribulation?
  And thy Christian warfare never cease?
The gaining of a quiet habitation
  Shall gather thee to everlasting peace.

But here we all must suffer, walking lonely
  The path that Jesus once himself hath gone;
Watch thou in patience through this hour only,
  This one dark hour before the eternal dawn.

The captive's oar may pause upon the galley,
  The soldier sleep beneath his plumed crest,
And Peace may fold her wing o'er hill and valley;
  But thou, O Christian, must not take thy rest.

Thou must walk on, however man upbraid thee,
  With Him who trod the wine-press all alone;
Thou wilt not find one human hand to aid thee,
  One human soul to comprehend thine own!

Heed not the images forever thronging
  From out the foregone life thou livest no more;
Faint-hearted mariner, still art thou longing
  For the dim line of the receding shore.

Wilt thou find rest of soul in thy returning
  To that old path thou hast so vainly trod?
Hast thou forgotten all thy weary yearning
  To walk among the children of thy God?

Faithful and steadfast in thy consecration,
  Living by that high faith to thee so dim,
Declaring before God their dedication,
  So far from thee, because so near to Him.

Canst thou forget thy Christian superscription—
  "Behold, we count them happy which endure?"
What treasure wouldst thou, in the land Egyptian,
  Repass the stormy water to secure?

And wilt thou yield thy sure and glorious promise
  For the poor fleeting joys earth can afford?
No hand can take away the treasure from us
  That rests within the keeping of the Lord.

Poor wandering soul—I know that thou art seeking
  Some easier way, as all have sought before,
To silence the reproachful inward speaking—
  Some landward path unto an island shore!

The cross is heavy in thy human measure,
  The way too narrow for thine inward pride,
Thou canst not lay thine intellectual treasure
  At the low footstool of the Crucified.

Oh, that thy faithless soul one hour only,
  Would comprehend the Christian's perfect life,
Despised with Jesus, sorrowful and lonely,
  Yet calmly looking upwards in the strife.

For poverty and self-renunciation
  Their Father yieldeth back a thousand-fold;
In the calm stillness of regeneration
  Cometh a joy they never knew of old.

In meek obedience to the heavenly Teacher
  Thy weary soul can only find its peace;
Seeking no aid from any human creature,
  Looking to God alone for his release.

And he will come in His own time and power,
  To set his earnest-hearted children free;
Watch only through this dark and painful hour,
  And the bright morning yet will break for thee.

Shining Light.

BY W. H. H. MCALLISTER.

"Ye are the light of the world. A city which is set on a hill cannot be hid. Neither do men light a candle and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house: Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven.—Matt. v. 14, 15, 16.

Jesus here, as elsewhere in his teachings, uses a familiar illustration to enforce a practical truth. At his first advent the whole world was groping in thick spiritual darkness. He came a light into the world. Isaiah, in prophetic vision, saw and described this: "The people which sat in darkness saw great light; and to them which sat in the region and shadow of death light is sprung up."—Matt. iv. 16. Jesus was that light; and when he came into the world to accomplish his great mission, he said plainly, "I am the light of the world." A state of sin is very appropriately termed a state of darkness. A course of wickedness if persistently followed, not only shuts a man out from the light of truth in this world, but it consigns him to the "blackness of darkness forever." Light is the opposite of darkness as truth is of error; and when the whole world was in the darkness of sin it needed a great spiritual luminary to arise and dispel its deathly gloom. Coming to Christ is represented as coming from this state of darkness to the light; and the condemnation of the world is, "that light is come into the world and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil." In the language of this illustration the distinction is drawn between the two classes: "For every one that doeth evil hateth the light neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved. But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest, that they are wrought in God."

This line of thought might be greatly extended, but the words I have quoted at the head of this article were intended for a practical rather than a theoretical application. Jesus here calls his disciples the light of the world. The illuminating rays of divine truth constituted them a light even as Christ was a light; and every one who has received this truth is likewise a light. While Jesus was in the world he was the light of the world, but after he was taken from the world, the apostles and their successors with all believers constituting the Christian church have been its light. And could all the influences attributable to the Christian religion be removed, the world would be dark indeed. I will leave each of my readers to draw the picture in his own imagination.

Every one, then, who has named the name of Christ is a light, and must bear his part in dispelling the spiritual darkness around him. How must this be done? Jesus instructed his disciples to imitate the example of worldly men with a literal light. They do not conceal a lighted candle by putting it under a measure, but place it upon a candlestick, and they experience a practical result. "It giveth light unto all that are in the house." I do not think Jesus would have spoken these words if he had not thought that some timid, fearful disciple sometime would need the caution and encouragement. And how many of us can take the implied reproof home to our own hearts! How many of us have had the light of divine favor shed upon us abundantly, still we have been too chary of reflecting its glorious rays. Men all around us groping in darkness and our light concealed! Men going down to everlasting death, and we casting at best but a feeble light on the way of life! Is your light, my reader, is my light under a bushel? Is the light God has given us beaming with a clear and steady glow, lighting all who come within the circle of our influence? These are important questions and by them we should examine ourselves, and if wrong set ourselves aright at once.

Let us do as Jesus bids us do: let our light shine before men. Let it shine in our lives, in our thoughts, our words, our deeds; let it shine in all our intercourse with our fellow-men; let it shine at home and abroad; let it shine on every feature, giving the whole countenance a divine radiance, and may such a halo of divine effulgence rest upon and emanate from us that others seeing our good deeds may be led to glorify our Father which is in heaven.

The Restitution.

BY JOEL A. SIMONDS.

"Whom the heavens must receive until the times of restitution of all things.—Acts iii. 21.

The times of restitution signify the period during which the work of restitution will be accomplished.

The times of restitution will begin at the coming of the Lord. When the time to commence the restitution shall come, then the Lord will send Jesus Christ to do that work. He will come, and his arm shall rule for him, his reward is with him, and his work before him. Then he will gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them that do iniquity. Then shall he begin to reign and to subdue all things unto himself. Nothing will be restored till he come. The whole work of restitution is beyond that event, and under the reign of Christ.

Restitution means, to bring back to what has been, or to replace in a former condition.

The world has been in a good condition. When the heavens and the earth were finished, and the preparation of the kingdom completed, then the Lord saw every thing that he had made, and said, it was very good. Then, according to the arrangement he had made, and for the purpose for which he had made it, the Lord took the man he had formed, and put him into the garden of Eden, which he had prepared for him. In this garden the Lord made to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food; the tree of life, also; and the tree of knowledge of good and evil; and in it was there a river of water which flowed in four directions. And the Lord put the man into this garden to dress it and to keep it. And the Lord said to man, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat. But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it, for in (after) the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die. This condition of the world was very good. The earth was to bear grass, grain, and fruit, as food for its inhabitants. Man was to multiply and replenish the earth by families; he was to have dominion over the animals below him; and cultivate and subdue the earth. He was made subject to the law of God, which provided for him to live as long as he should be obedient, but when he should become disobedient he must die. His probation was an easy one. He was completely furnished with every thing that God had provided for him, and he was only required to be obedient to secure his position, with all the prosperity, and development, that must grow out of it. The world, in this condition, does not need restitution.

Man sinned. The curse of the law under which he was to live, forever, was passed upon him, and upon the earth for man's sake. The world now needs to be restored to its former condition; to be brought back from under the curse to the integrity of its original position.

This restitution God has promised in the gospel. The things to be restored are those that have been affected by the curse; viz., the earth, with its inhabitants.

The instrumentality by which to affect this restitution is the creature of the gospel. It is called the Seed of Abraham; the children of the promise. Christ and those that are his. They are not of the world; but they have been chosen out of the world. They are one with Christ, as he is one with the Father. They are joint heirs to the same position, and to the same work. Christ has already become the heavenly, by a resurrection from the dead. Those that are his, will become heavenly, like the angels, in the same way, in due time. These, when perfected by a resurrection from the dead, will be complete in Christ the head of all principality and power. This heavenly class in distinction from the earthy, will constitute the instrumentality by which the restitution of all things spoken by the mouth of all the holy prophets since the world began, will be accomplished. They are not the restored. They will not occupy a restored position; but they are the prepared instruments of restitution, and will occupy a position suited to their work.

The things to be restored are one thing, and they will be restored to a former position. The instruments are another thing, and they will do the work of restoring. The instruments of restitution must be perfected before the work of restitution can begin. The things to be restored are earthy. The instruments of restitution are heavenly. The object of restitution is not to change the earthy to the heavenly, but to restore the earthy to a former earthy condition. The earthy condition, to which the earthy things will be restored, is one in which the people will marry and be given in marriage; they will have dominion over the animals below them, and over all the earth; their business will be, to cultivate and subdue the earth; to sow and reap; to plant vineyards and eat the fruit of them; to build houses and inhabit them; to prepare for winter and prepare for summer; to prepare for day and night, and to do all kinds of business that will legitimately grow out of their earthy natures, and earthy surroundings, as long as the earth continues: and through the endless future they will have access to the tree of life that they may live forever.

The probation given to Adam will be restored to them, so that all the blessings of their restored position, and surroundings, with all the legitimate growth, prosperity and developments of it, may be secured forever by continued obedience. All of this belongs to the restored, and not to the restorers.

The Restorers will occupy the throne of the kingdom that is to be restored, and have power over all the nations of the earth. They will be heavenly in their nature like the angels, and can die no more. They will neither marry nor be given in marriage. Their business will be to bless all the nations of the earth by restoring them to their former position before sin entered into the world. They will rule in righteousness, and execute judgment and justice in the earth. They will be priests as well as kings upon the throne, so that they can pardon the repenting sinner, and restore him to loyalty and the favor of God, and give him the position he had lost in Adam. They will do all the legitimate business belonging to their position as the rulers and restorers of the world.

When the work of restitution is completed, then all the nations whom God has made shall come and worship before him and glorify his name. Then every knee shall bow, and every tongue confess that Jesus Christ is Lord to the glory of God the Father. Then, the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters do the sea. Then, they shall not bring forth for trouble, and none of them shall be sick; for the leaves of the tree of life have healed them all. Then, there will be no more pain nor death, for they will have free access to the tree of life that they may live forever.

Then, the earth shall yield its increase, and the shower shall come in its season, and the land that was desolate shall become as the Garden of Eden; and instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle tree.

Then, the wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together, and a little child shall lead them, and the cow and the bear shall feed, their young ones shall lie down together, and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain, for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea.

Then there shall be no more curse.

This will be the condition of the world after it is restored, and this will be its condition forever. None of the Restorers are included in this description.

Then, the heavenly—those who have accomplished this work of restitution, they shall reign forever and ever, over the nations who have been healed by the leaves of the tree of life.

Grand Rapids, Mich. Sept. 1870.

Are the Dead Really Dead?

BY ALBIN CHANDLER.

Many of our brethren say, they believe sinners must have a second life that they may die the second death for the sins committed in the first life. I have often asked, and do now ask such, if they sincerely believe that the apostle James, when he says, "Sin when it is finished bringeth forth death," means literal death? If so, that is the end of their sin. Hence, if a second literal death is imposed, without a second probation and a second life of sin, it is punishing twice for the same offence; which our brethren must admit, or take the other horn of the dilemma, which is, the death common to all in a state of consciousness, and acknowledge they have been wrong in preaching the unconsciousness of the dead, these many years. But we hear them often ask, "What is the difference in their death; and are not the righteous punished just as much as the wicked?"

Now dear friends, for once, please carefully to read the apostle's distinction, and treasure it in your memory. Paul says, in 1 Cor. xv. 56, "the sting of death is sin:" and in verse 55, the saints sing, "Oh death, where is thy sting?" and John says, 1 John. iii. 14, "He that loveth not his brother abideth in death:" and Jesus said, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness even so the Son of man must be lifted up, (why?) that whosoever believeth in him" (that act of faith extracts the sting of the serpent, and sin also) "should not perish, but have eternal life;" or, have the wound of death healed; which can be easily accomplished by the law of righteousness (the free gift of the Father), as after extracting the poison of the serpent the flesh wound will heal by the law of nature, otherwise the poison will extend by circulation from the wound through the whole body, and the patient dies. See the case of Jesus, "who was made a little lower than the angels, for the suffering of death." Not made for sin: for in that He died; He could not be holden of death: for He had no sting or poison of sin in him. He was not under the law of sin and death, (Rom. viii. 2); but the law of death, alone, for the deliverance of all mankind, if they will come to Him. The great Physician who is able, by the power and divine skill given him of God the Father, to extract the poison of sin and apply to the ghastly wound the sweet spirit of love and obedience, which will cause the new life to appear. Then, in due time, the loving and faithful child can sing, Oh death, where is thy sting? thy power to give hades the victory, as in the case of those who would not come to Christ to be healed?

Come now, dear brethren, be consistent; see and acknowledge, to the glory of God and his Son Jesus, that the dead now are dead, and sin finished in their case; for the man that dies in his sins his case is hopeless; the poison is all in him. While those that are cleansed from sin, by Jesus, will be victoriously presented to the Father, who will crown them as kings, his honored children, before the holy angels and all the world besides; while the shame of the faithless and unbelieving will be as manifest to the immortal family, by their absence from this glorious and triumphant coronation, as would their literal, conscious presence under condemnation before a mortal court.

A Word to Tobacco Users.

Dear reader, do you use tobacco? And have you never thought how displeased your Saviour would be, were he here with his people, to see you puffing the stupifying smoke about you, or constantly spitting the filthy juice around, absorbing the deadly poison into your system? Though the Master is now absent at the right hand of the Father, do you not know that your conduct causes him equally as much displeasure as if he were with you to utter audibly his protest? It does seem to me if angels ever wept over the self-destruction of a candidate for immortality, they have shed their tears over the tobacco consumers.

It seems hardly necessary to call to your mind the disastrous effects of tobacco, both mentally and physically; for if its use will not be discontinued for Christ's sake, we can hardly expect it tobe given up at all. We are commanded to cleanse ourselves "from all filthiness of the flesh;" for Christ will have a "chosen people"—yes, a pure people—to dwell with him in the kingdom, which great and ominous signs warn us will soon be set up. If you reach that blessed realm, dear brother, you will find none of the filthy weed there to satisfy your unnatural appetite. "For this ye know, that no . . . unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolator, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ."—Eph. v. 5. Beloved in the Lord as living representatives of our absent Saviour, known and read of men, let us set him before us as the great pattern to imitate, and follow him more closely every day and hour, that when our Master comes in all his triumphant glory we may hear the blessed words of acceptance—"Well done!"

Our Pet Mocking-Bird.

BY UNCLE WILLIE.

Most of our readers are no doubt quite familiar with the gay and noisy bird that we call Parrot, as nearly every Italian fruit-shop in our cities has a "Pretty Polly" swinging and chattering among the oranges, lemons, and bananas. But they do not so often see that rare and interesting bird that is found in our own middle and Southern States, known as the "mocking-bird."

It is about the size of a robin, and looks much like one, with the exception of its breast, which is rather a whitish gray than red. It is called "mocking-bird" from its very rare skill in mocking or imitating the notes of other birds, which it does so completely that most of our feathered songsters are fairly deceived by its notes, and think on hearing it that one of their own species is somewhere near them and singing to them. On hurrying to their supposed comrades they find, to their dismay, a perfect stranger, and then hurry away again, absolutely puzzled to know what has happened to them.

This rare bird is such a mimic of nearly every noise that it hears, that naturalists, who give Latin names to all the birds whose habits they study, call it the "many-tongued mimic;" and Uncle Willie will attempt to show that this is a very proper name to give to these birds by telling the story and the cunning tricks of one of them that happens to be a favorite member of his own family.

Our pet mocking-bird was captured in Virginia by a dear brother who was a soldier there during the late war, and who sent it north to us to show us what saucy little rebels he sometimes used to hear singing in the forests as if their throats would burst, imitating every sound that reaches their ears. This brother gave to his prisoner the name of "Thaddeus Stevens," thinking that his bird was about as bold and independent as this great statesman, who died but a few months ago; but as this is rather a long name for one that we have to talk to so much, we simply call him "Thad," which answers our purpose much better.

Now Thad is as cunning and noisy a little rogue as ever made a Northern home cheerful with his songs and odd ways. We keep him in a very large cage in our sitting-room, so that he hears and sees every thing that is going on, and we hear and see all his notes and his pranks. Just as the day breaks he begins, and generally with a lusty crow; not a cock in the neighborhood is allowed to wake up the hens of the barnyard but that he thinks it is his bounden duty to imitate him, and this he does with a delicate little crow that any young and aspiring rooster might be proud to excel.

Next come the robins with their early songs, and then Thad treats us to their notes so perfectly imitated that again and again we have been sure that a familiar robin was sitting on our window-sill. And now he is fairly started for a stream of melody for a few hours in the morning so that it seems he cannot stop. He sometimes scarcely allows himself time to eat his breakfast, but while standing at his dish will take a few mouthfuls, and before they are fairly down will dash off a trill or a flourish and then return to his meal. This being fairly over he mounts his perch, and runs with amazing facility over all the songs that ever bird has sung in his hearing. One moment he is a canary, then a cat-bird, and then a bobolink; again he is a pee-wee, a swallow, or an oriole; and then he will whisk off into a collection of songs so numerous that none but one who knows the notes of all the birds of the forest can recognize them.

When he has pretty fairly exhausted the birds he is ready for any thing that may turn up; he will cackle as completely as any hen that ever laid an egg, will caw like the crows, whistle furiously after the dogs and imitate their barking and yelping, and will let no four-footed beast pass his domicile without trying his throat on whatever utterance it may make; and the only time we ever knew him completely to break down was in trying to neigh like a horse. This was a little too much for him, although he did not seem to know when he was beaten, possessing the same indomitable qualities as the great man whose name he bears.

Thad is perfectly at home in all sorts of domestic noises; nobody ever sneezes in his presence without a compliment of a repetition of it by him; and when a few weeks ago we all had the influenza, it kept Thad busy sneezing half the time in keeping us company. During that affliction he also learned a new accomplishment, and he now blows his nose with inimitable skill, and occasionally clears his throat with great dignity. He never questions the quality or origin of a sound; for him it is enough to hear it, and repeats it. Not far from his cage a door once began to creak on its hinges; he heard it in an instant, and now always creaks with it, and we let the door creak as a source of amusement to him and to us. A railroad passes a few hundred yards from his window, and the shrill whistle shrieks as the engine flies by, and he whistles at it as regularly as it whistles to the traveler "to look out for the locomotive;" and now and then, when the freight train is blowing and puffing up grade, Thad blows and puffs too, as if he had a heavy pull before him.

A few days ago, while receiving a visit of a friend in an adjoining room, we suddenly heard a great outcry, as if a hawk had attacked a whole brood of chickens. Our visitor, assuming rather an anxious countenance, inquired if we kept chickens, being too amiable to add "in the house." We simply replied, "O no, it is our bird Thad." And thus the little rogue runs from one thing to the other all day long, piping and whistling and trilling and flourishing, as if he felt it his bounden duty to keep up a continual uproar.

The volume and power of his voice are remarkable; on quiet days he can be heard at a distance that seems incredible, and one wonders how so much strength can be concentrated in so small a body. When he sings his loudest his whole frame seems to be engaged in the work, and we think he must soon sink down exhausted; but he keeps at it with his whole soul, as if singing were so exquisite a pleasure that he cannot afford to lose a moment. We have sometimes endeavored to suppress him, fearing that he would wear himself out, and the only way in which we can do it is to shut him in a very dark room, so that it is night to him. But if we do so he seems only to sing with greater energy afterward. Even his nights are not always spent in peace, for sometimes in the midst of the night he will break out with a great gush of song for a minute, so that it is a common saying with us that "Thad is dreaming." And he has really set us to seriously thinking over the question as to whether birds do not dream, and sing in their dreams, just as little folks so often talk in their dreams.

Need we add after all this that Thad is a great pet in our house? and that he gets all the flies and spiders and oranges and apples and all other little tidbits that he wants? He is a hearty eater, for a bird that works so hard in singing must have strong food. He lives mainly on "mocking-bird food," prepared by the bird-dealers in New York, and this consists largely of meat. Then he is fond of fresh meat, and bread and milk, and red pepper; and in the season he is crazy after elder and poke berries; he will revel among these until he is as red as a beet.

Thad has a large cage, but he has also the full liberty of the room. He frequently comes flying to the shoulder of his mistress to be fed some little dainty, and he is often caught in the work-basket looking after little trifles that he likes to carry off to his cage. He is as tame as a chicken and as pert as a fox. Can our little friends wonder that we greatly esteem Thad?—Selected.

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should allow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is of desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures." The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE "MORTAL RESURRECTION."

A LETTER TO ELD. MILES GRANT.

BY STEWART CARLISLE.

WILMINGTON, DEL., Sept. 16, 1870.

ELD. MILES GRANT—Dear Brother: I have been reading for the past four years the views of brethren as they have appeared in the "Crisis" and HERALD OF LIFE; also the views of Eld. Waggoner's tract on the resurrection of the wicked dead. But the glorious doctrine of "No life out of Christ," is as clear to my mind as that man in his present natural condition is only mortal and corruptible. It has often been a matter of surprise to me that brethren of your views have not answered some of the arguments advanced in the HERALD OF LIFE. You may doubtless imagine that this has been done; but, to my mind, all efforts in that direction are like the efforts of orthodoxy to prove the doctrine of the soul's immortality. The simple question of "How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?" is a question of some perplexity to those who believe in the resurrection (to life) of the wicked dead: hence, the man-made doctrine of a mortal resurrection.

But, "How are the dead raised up, and with what body do they come?" Ans. "That which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body which shall be." Why, Paul, is not this a great mistake? Are not these bodies sown mortal bodies and raised mortal bodies? But Paul's answer is, "Thou sowest not that body which shall be." Now if these bodies are sown mortal (which none can deny truthfully), and as such, are not that body which shall be, then the doctrine of a mortal resurrection, however ingeniously put, is found to be at variance with the teachings of Paul, who unhesitatingly declares that "the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and this mortal must put on immortality." We have no hesitancy, therefore, in pronouncing this mortal resurrection theory unscriptural, purely human, and of recent date.

The only ground of hope for life in a future state, must be based on the promise of God; and the Scriptures clearly and definitely speak of two lives only; the one, "the life that now is;" the other, "the life which is to come." The life which now is, terminates in death, and leaves man forever in the dust of the earth from whence he came. The life which is to come, is God's special promise to his people; and although many of his dear ones have "died without receiving the promise," yet precious in the sight of the Lord has been their death, and the fulfilment of his promise necessarily includes their resurrection to life, at his appearing and his kingdom. In this promise, the wicked have no part or lot.

But of them the Scriptures plainly affirm: "They are dead; they shall not rise:" they "shall remain in the congregation of the dead;" they "shall not see life;" but that dying, in their sinful, mortal state, they are "like the beasts that perish." Like them, they are dead beyond the promise, or hope, or power of living again, and will never see light or life, but "be as though they had not been."

"The life which is to come," being the promise of God, of which the "righteous hath hope in his death," is eternal in its duration; and when Christ (who was God's manifestation and exemplification of eternal life), shall appear, it will be to give eternal life to all that are his, whether they sleep or wake.

A limited life in a future state, whether for a longer or shorter period of time, with no other object in view than that of administering punishment, purely vindictive, and without any design or purpose, whatever, to reform those who are thus punished, may do to be put forth by those who have driven down their theoretical stakes, and made fast their cords to the opinions of men, but must ever be opposed by those who having caught the sympathetic accents of infinite love, in its tender yearnings for perishing man, as God expostulates with him in tenderest affection, "Why will ye die?" at the same time assuring them that he has "no pleasure in their death" (not two deaths), but, dying without faith in the promise of the life to come, they die beyond the power of a resurrection to life again.

Now if God has "no pleasure in the death of the wicked," can we suppose that the attribute of justice demands that the attribute of love shall be silent and submissive, while justice enters the domain of death and raises up the wicked dead just to kill them over again, and place them where they came from, the dust of the ground? Does it require an exhibition of this kind in order that the justice of God may appear to men? If so, then why not go a single step farther and say that this exhibition is to be eternal? for, when the exhibition is over, and ceases to appear, then the justice of God ceases to appear also; so, that the justice of God shall be eternally apparent, sinners must be eternally dying and never be dead! If justice demands such an exhibition to be made for a single hour, then who can prove that such an exhibition will not be an eternal necessity? and in that event, where or how can the attribute of love, which is God himself, appear? Will you tell us that is seen in the resurrection and eternal life of all that believe, in their glorified state, in the possession of their Eden home? We grant it; but then his tender mercy is over all his works; and the wicked, being the work of his hand, (but not their wickedness), the judgment of God in their case is, that they "shall surely die;" that is, they lose "the life that now is," and have no part or lot in "the life which is to come;" and justice and judgment, and righteousness, and love, are all made apparent to men and angels; and all shine with undimmed lustre and heavenly beauty, in the God-honoring doctrine of "No life out of Christ."

No, no, Br. Grant, this doctrine of a mortal resurrection will not do. God's word condemns it; enlightened, sanctified reason revolts at it; and the harmonious attributes of our loving Father in heaven forbid it; and this man-made doctrine of a mortal resurrection must die of its own inherent mortal weakness, and be as though it had not been.

And now, dear brother, as this doctrine has been made the wedge to split in two the Advent body of believers, and leave one part, as God's people have always been, in the minority as to numbers, we shall accept the situation, and more than ever "cease from man, whose breath is in his nostrils," but "whose foundation is in the dust," and nestle closer to the sympathizing heart of him who says, "Fear not little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom."

Hoping that we shall all come to the unity of the faith, to the knowledge of the Son of God, to the perfect stature of men in Christ, and all speak the same words and mind the same things, and finally share the same glory in the same kingdom.

I remain yours, looking for the return of the LIFE-GIVER, who says, "I give unto them eternal life;" and a life in the future state that is not eternal will be about as difficult to find as that a soul in the present state is immortal.

STEWART CARLISLE.

THE WOMAN GOING TO JUDGMENT.

BY MARK E. GREEN.

"And there came one of the seven angels which had the seven vials and talked with me, saying unto me, Come hither, I will show unto thee the judgment of the great whore that sitteth upon many waters."—Rev. xvii.

THERE is a universal agreement that this whore is the Roman Catholic Church, with its head centre at Rome, with the Pope at its head or as its mouth-piece; and, of course, when we write on this subject, we treat with the Pope. All charts and diagrams that I have seen to illustrate this subject the woman has been placed on the back of the scarlet beast, which I believe has been the cause of leading us to take a wrong view of this subject.

John says that the whore was sitting upon many waters when she was going to judgment. These waters are explained, in verse 15, to be people, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues; and the woman is explained to be a great city which reigneth over the kings of the earth. The explanation here given does not place the woman on the beast's back at all, but that she is ruling over kings of the earth, which is explained to be peoples, and multitudes, and nations, and tongues; and not one single kingdom, or empire, like France, on which some have supposed was the kingdom upon which she was going to judgment.

When the angel came to John, he was upon the isle of Patmos, where he had seen all the visions prior to this time; but John was taken in spirit into the wilderness, which, in chap. xii., is measured by a time and times and half time, or 1260 years. If we get a correct understanding of this vision we must take our stand where John stood, somewhere near the end of those days.

That John confines himself to what followed from this point to the time of her judgment cannot be true; for in the explanation, the angel says, "I will tell thee the mystery of the woman and of the beast that carrieth her, which hath seven heads and ten horns." We see from this, that the angel is going to give John a history of the woman during her connection with the beast, and therefore we must begin where John begins. The first thing the angel says, "The beast that thou sawest was, and is not, and shall ascend out of the bottomless pit and go into perdition." That this cannot refer to the Napoleon dynasty is evident, for this beast had an existence before that dynasty came into existence; for the angel says, the beast was before he had the vision; which was in the wilderness state of the church, which days were ended before that dynasty became history. Rome is the only place to look for the history of the woman and the beast.

Rome became a fornicator with the woman when the church chose the Emperor Constantine as the "2d David to fight her battles." The Roman Bishop Lactantus pronounced the marriage ceremony.—See Gibbons, chap. xx. This was in A. D. 313. From that point the history of this woman begins her harlot life. Constantine was then Emperor of Rome; but about twelve years afterward he removed the seat of government to the East and left Rome in charge of St. Peter, the Pope, until his death, when the son of Constantine became Emperor of Rome. In 476 Rome came to an end for a time which is the first change marked in what the angel told John, "The beast thou sawest was," etc.

E. B. Elliott, a writer on Rev., in a letter to Dr. Keith, says, "Was not even Odacer's destruction of the imperial authority in the Western empire, A. D. 476, sufficient in your judgment to put an end to the term of old Rome's supremacy? At that time the power and glory of Rome, as bearing rule over any nation, had become extinct, when she who had ruled over nations sat in the dust like a second Babylon and there were no thrones where Cæsar had reigned."

This celebrated writer on prophecy shows conclusively that this beast came to an end in 476; and it "was not" for 324 years, when Charlemagne was crowned with the crown of the Cæsars, and is called, by historians, the "restorer of the Roman Empire."

Before tracing the history of this empire, after its restoration, I will notice the history of the woman when this beast "was not." According to Daniel's prophecy the Roman empire was to be divided into ten kingdoms, which was accomplished by 483. Three of those ten kingdoms were Arians, who were opposers of the Catholic church; two were plucked up by Clovis, the French king, and one by Justinian, through the direction of the Catholic church. The remaining seven were supporters of the Pope for 324 years; which I suppose answers to the heads of this beast upon which the woman sat, for we have no evidence that she ever sat on the beast, only on the heads, and never on the back, as we have had it exhibited on the charts. The question will be asked, Did not the Eastern Emperors, who had become the sole emperor of East and West, support the Pope? I answer, that from the days of Justinian until the Roman empire was restored, there were eighteen emperors, and only four of them were favorable to the Pope, or were able to support the Catholic church in the West; and the Pope was obliged to rely upon these kings in the West for support, and therefore the fitness of the figure sitting on, or being supported by these heads or kings.

This view of the subject carries the history of the woman down to the time of the restoration of the empire in 800. The angel says that this beast was, and is not, and yet is: and ascendeth out of the bottomless pit. One thing is certain, the beast could not ascend out if he was not first put in. I may differ with some as to what constitutes the bottomless pit. It is generally admitted that the bottomless pit in chapter ix., symbolizes the false religion of Mahomet. If the bottomless pit is a false religion in one place, in this book, we must make it the same in every place. If the false prophet does not propagate a false religion, then he is not a false prophet. I conclude that any government that will bind itself by an oath to support a false religion is shut up in a pit without a bottom.

Taking this view of the subject, we will notice the facts connected with the restoration of this kingdom, and see upon what condition it was restored. Says history, "The coronation oath of Charlemagne was, that he would maintain the faith and the privileges of the church." Did not Charlemagne subject himself, in taking this oath, to the Catholic church or to the Pope? and was not that oath as binding as though he was bound with a great chain? and any one who dared to violate that oath was consigned to hell fire eternally by the Pope. So says history.

Again: We are informed by history that every king or emperor that was crowned by the Pope from that time, was obliged to take the oath administered to Charlemagne. For one thousand years all emperors were crowned by the Pope, until Bonaparte, who refused to submit, and took the crown of the Cæsars and placed it on his own head, and proclaimed, "I am Cæsar; I am Charlemagne." The dragon was no longer in the abyss.

The woman when going to judgment was not sitting on heads, but was reigning over people, multitudes, and nations; but was about to fall from that position, after which her judgment came. The woman must have had kingly power, for she could not be said to reign without.

About forty-six years before the restoration of the Roman kingdom, the Pope was crowned king of Rome; and what is termed Peter's patrimony, or the Ecclesiastical States, was held sacred and exclusively the Pope's dominion.

The next thing is to ascertain what kings, etc., she reigns over. The angel says, "And there are seven kings; five are fallen, and one is; the other is not yet come; and when he cometh he must continue a short space." These kings I understand to have risen after the Pope was made king; and that they stand as representatives of dynasties, beginning with Charlemagne, who represents the Carlovingian dynasty. He was the first of the Cæsars that took the oath to obey the Pope. That dynasty continued from 800 to 879. The dynasty that succeeded, was the German, or Otho dynasty, who was crowned with the Cæsar crown in 961, and was succeeded by the Franconian dynasty in 1014, and that dynasty was succeeded by the Swabian dynasty in 1155. The next was the Spanish dynasty, crowned in 1530, and was succeeded by the House of Hapsburgh, or Austrian dynasty in 1713, and continued until 1800. This is the sixth king, and was reigning when John saw the woman going to judgment. Austria was the last king that received the crown of the Cæsars by or from the hands of the Pope. During the reign of this dynasty the Austrian emperor, in 1781, refused to obey or have any thing to do with the Pope; and from this point we may date the fall of Babylon; her lovers began to leave her. The seventh king was Napoleon Bonaparte, who crowned himself with the Cæsar crown in 1804, and was dethroned in 1814, only continuing a "short space," ten years.

The eighth, which is of the seven, we shall notice after we ascertain where to locate the ten kings that had not received power when John saw this vision. They were to receive power one hour, or a short time, with the eighth king. The most likely place to find the rise of these kings would be when the seventh king came to his end in 1814.

In 1815 the powers of Europe called a council at Vienna to restore or to bring order from the confusion that had been caused by Napoleon. In settling the Italian kingdom they divided it into ten kingdoms. Says Hugh Murray, in his "Encyclopædia of Geography"—"The local . . . divisions of Italy are more than usually prominent. For though the country is united by name, by a common language, and by a strong national feeling, it has yet been partitioned into a number of States, politically independent of each other. The numerous little republics, which indeed once made so brilliant a figure and disputed for supremacy, have in the late convulsions lost the feeble remains of their existence and emerged into the great States.

Italy is thus divided into ten portions: 1st, The Ecclesiastical State; 2d, Tuscany; 3d, Lombardy; 4th, Sardinia; 5th, Naples; 6th, San Marino; 7th, Modena; 8th, Lucca; 9th, Parma; 10th, Monaco. So far we have a perfect harmony in connection with the history of the woman. These ten kings were to hate the woman and make her desolate and naked, and eat her flesh and burn her with fire.

The next thing to ascertain is, who this beast is that is to go into perdition. When these ten kings first became history there was no king in Italy; but in 1859 Victor Emmanuel was made king of Italy; and nine of these kings gave their power and strength to this king; and from that time they have been making the woman desolate and naked until they have taken possession of Rome, and the last of the ten kingdoms (the Ecclesiastical States), have voted to give their power and strength to Victor Emanuel, who, with the Pope, or false prophet, are to go into the lake of fire and brimstone alive, both together; and the remnant, the ten kings, are to be slain with the sword of him that sat upon the horse, which proceeded out of his mouth; and all the fowls were filled with their flesh. —Rev. xix. 19–21.

Whether this lake of fire is intended to symbolize modern warfare, I do not feel positive. Some suppose that Rome will sink into a lake of fire and brimstone; while others think otherwise. There is one thing certain, that the ten kings are the remnant here to be slain by the sword that proceeds out of the mouth of Jesus Christ; for it is said of them that, "These shall make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb shall overcome them; for he is Lord of lords and King of kings; and they that are with him are called, and chosen, and faithful."

These ten kings are the last phase of the Roman Empire, which winds up the last of Daniel's vision of the image, the iron and the clay; that is, the kingly representing the iron, and republican representing the clay, which do not cleave to the iron. When these come to an end, then all the kingdoms come to an end, if I understand Daniel; for it says that when the stone strikes, "Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer's thrashing floors, and the wind carried them away," etc.

This makes a clean riddance of all earthly kingdoms. A few more days and we will witness the last great battle of the great day of God Almighty. Let us take heed to our Saviour's words, that we be not overcharged with the cares of this world, that that day come upon us unawares; for, as a snare shall it come upon the whole world; and blessed is he that watches and keeps his garments. Amen.

"THE IMMORTALITY OF THE SOUL."

A REVIEW BY JOEL A. SIMONDS.

[Concluded from last week.]

His Third Proposition.—The Punishment of the Wicked will be Eternal.

Proof.—"These shall go away into everlasting punishment." We admit, and claim, that this proposition is true. We also admit that the proof is conclusive. We are perfectly agreed as to the duration of the punishment.

But we are disagreed as to the nature of this punishment. B. urges this argument to prove the immortality of the soul. We claim that it is perfectly fatal to that doctrine. B. claims that this punishment will be misery. We claim that this punishment will be death.

The point now to be settled is the meaning of the word death. B. insists that the meaning of death is the separation of soul and body. He did not give any proof. We insist that the meaning of death is, extinction of life

1. Webster says that "death is that state of being in which there is total and permanent cessation of all the vital functions."

2. The Bible defines death to be the extinction or cessation of life. Gen. ii. 17, "Thou shalt surely die." This death is the punishment or penalty for transgressing God's law. Man sinned, and this punishment was explained, Gen. iii. 19, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken; for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." When man returns to dust, his life becomes extinct; his thoughts perish, and he is dead. The tree of life was guarded lest he should eat of it and live forever. To break off life, so that it will not continue forever, is death. "And all the days that Adam lived were 930 years, and he died." Death cut off his life; it extinguished his life; Adam did not live any longer. Death terminates life. The experience of the world demonstrates this. The wages of sin is death; and death passed upon all men because all have sinned.

Another Explanation of what Death is.

God said to Noah, Gen. vi. 17, "I will bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven: and everything that is in the earth shall die." The flood came: "And all flesh died, that moved upon the earth; both of fowl, and of cattle, and of beast, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, and every man: all in whose nostrils was the breath of life, died. And Noah only remained alive, and they that were with him in the ark." Peter says, "The world that then was, including the ungodly men, being overflowed with water perished." Upon this record I will remark,

1. This punishment was because the earth was filled with violence.

2. This punishment was death; sudden death by water.

3. The water came, and every man, and every animal wherein was the breath of life died, was drowned, destroyed, perished.

4. Not one that was outside of the ark remained alive. Their life became extinct; they lived no longer; death terminated their existence.

In the first example the man who was made of dust, the man who breathed the breath of life, the man who became a living soul, and who was to have dominion over all the earth, and who was to people the earth, and subdue it, the man who was named Adam, and who alone was made responsible to God's law, this is the man that was to die and return to dust, so as not to live forever. This is the death that is "passed upon all men." If this man who is dust, and who returns to dust, is not the responsible man, who is? Is the soul ever, in a single instance, made responsible, where it does not mean the living person or body? If not, then death means the extinction of life. It comprehends all there is of man in the sentence, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

In the second example. All men and animals, in whose nostrils was the breath of life, were drowned. This was their death: "as the one died, so died the other." They all had one breath; they died alike. The flood destroyed them. It put an end to their lives. It caused a total and permanent cessation of all the vital functions. As the light of a burning candle disappears when the blaze is extinguished, so the powers and attributes of a living man disappear when his life is extinguished. This is the universally accepted meaning of death, when applied to any thing except the human soul, which is only an attribute of the living man. Then to go away into everlasting punishment is the same as to be punished with everlasting destruction. If life is a blessing, to be deprived of life is a punishment; and to be deprived of life forever, would be everlasting punishment. The wages of sin is death. Hence the punishment of the wicked will be eternal; but this does not prove that the soul is immortal.

Gen. ii. 7, "God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul." B. thought that when the man breathed the breath of life, he received an immortal soul. But he did not press this point with much assurance. That the thought of an immortal soul, from this passage, was a mere assumption, will appear from the text itself. The man became a living soul; not an immortal soul. The breath of life did not become a living soul; the man did not become possessed of a living soul, but the man himself was the living soul.

God's treatment of the man shows that he had no immortal soul. God gave to Adam a law; the penalty of which was, death. Its words were, "Thou shalt surely die." Adam sinned, and then God explained his punishment, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." To secure this result, God excluded him from "the tree of life, lest he should eat of it and live forever;" and as the final execution of this punishment, it is written, "All the days that Adam lived were 930 years, and he died." This record is plain, distinct, and complete. It is a brief history of the man who was made of dust, and breathed the breath of life, and became a living soul. He was made subject to a law which provided for him to live forever, by being obedient and having access to the tree of life, and which also provides that if disobedient he should die. He sinned: God pronounced the sentence upon him. Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return; and excluded him from the tree of life. Adam lived 930 years, and he died. This is the history of the first Adam, who was of the earth, earthy. And as was the earthy, such will be the earthy. If the first Adam did not have an immortal soul, his posterity will not have such souls. If he had an immortal soul, his posterity will have the same, for they are like him. If the first man did have such a soul, the history not only does not give the slightest intimation of it, but on the contrary, is flatly against it. It makes him subject to a law which punishes with death; it excludes him from the tree of life, and finally records his death.

If the first man could have such a soul under such a record, then his posterity may have such souls, notwithstanding the Bible does not give the slightest intimation of it; but, on the contrary, affirms and reaffirms, that the wages of sin is death; that when lust hath conceived it bringeth forth sin, and sin when it is finished, bringeth forth death; that the wicked shall utterly perish; that all the wicked will God destroy. If under such an apparent description of facts men may still have immortal souls, the only possible way to maintain such a position is by a bold and unblushing assumption of the doctrine.

The Fifth and Final Argument.—That the Bible everywhere assumes that the soul is immortal, as it does the existence of God.

The Bible does say, "That there is one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all."—Eph. iv. 6. But it does not say, There is an immortal soul. The Bible does say, that God is eternal, omnipotent, immortal, invisible, the only wise God. But it does not affirm the existence of any of the attributes of an immortal soul. The Bible does use language in describing the Being, character, and works of God, which is significant of such Being, character and works. But it does not use language in describing the soul which signifies an immortal soul; but on the contrary it often says, that the soul shall die.

B.'s Admissions.

1. That the words immortal and immortality never apply to wicked men.

2. That the descriptions which are equivalent to immortality, such as die no more, shall not die, live forever, everlasting life, and such like, do not apply to the wicked.

These admissions being true, there can be no proof of the immortality of the soul of a wicked man in the Bible. Immortality is a blessing promised to those only who seek for it by a patient continuance in well doing.

Conclusion.

We have examined carefully B.'s arguments and proofs for the immortality of the soul, and we have not found one statement that is applied to the soul separate and distinct from the body; nor one word that even intimates the existence of an immortal soul; neither do we find any proof that the soul is responsible, only where it means the body, or person.

We have found no proof that the Bible assumes the immortality of the soul anywhere.

These considerations, in connection with B.'s admission that all the descriptions of immortality found in the Bible do not apply to wicked men, lead to the unavoidable conclusion, that there is no such thing as an immortal soul.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

THE TRUE VIEW.

BY L. D. TANNER.

SCRIPTURE interpreted by Scripture, and Scripture interpreted by existing facts, is one thing; while the nominal church interpretation is often another, and quite a different thing. Those who trust in the might of multitude will lean to the latter; while those who trust solely in the power of truth, will look to the former with greater confidence.

In the thousands of sermons and exhortations I have listened to, since I was a child, Matt. vii. 13, 14 has invariably been construed as relating to persons within the church, as the strait-gaters; and those without, as the broad-road-ers. Whereas, if Scripture and facts are allowed, as manifestly they should be, in order to ascertain the meaning, nothing can be more incorrect than such an application of the passage. For, taking fairly into account the numbers actually belonging inside as members of the Papal and Protestant nominal churches, and those who are of the same temper and tendencies (and mean to become such before they die) without, and you would find, by actual survey, you had encompassed nine-tenths, if not nineteen-twentieths of Christendom.

So it was at the time that Christ delivered these words. The mass and great multitude were in the nominal church interests; and as now were rapidly approaching their well-deserved destruction. Hence the pertinence of his instruction, if one would avoid that pending overthrow. Enter ye in at the strait gate—righteousness, truth, home-honesty. Actually doing to others as ye would they should do to you, as had just been expressed. Verse 12.

The nominal church in order to cover up its frauds and dishonesty, its worship of wealth, and practice of wickedness, keeps up its cry and exhortation to people to enter in at the strait gate, as if becoming one of them was to do so. Whereas, the voice from heaven, to every true believer in Christ is, Come out of her my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins; and that ye receive not of her plagues.

But what a turning of tables must the practical application of this text, as above indicated, make with the millions looking only for a step beyond their last breath to be ushered into an ethereal paradise, they name, heaven. How similar to the disappointment of the oil-less virgins—the guest without a wedding garment—or those other expectants who pleaded abundant entrance on account of their personal acquaintance with Jesus, and their wonderful works: to whom, he professed, I never knew you. Depart from me, ye that work iniquity.

THE CAMPMEETING IN MAINE.

Monday Sept. 5, we selected our lots and put up our tents, which were 15 in all; the brethren and sisters came on the ground early on Monday morning, and labored hard, erecting their tents. They looked and labored just as though they were going to have good times, in the Lord, for one week, while together; but when night overtook us it found us a tired company. Monday evening had a social meeting under the Big tent, owned by the Life Brethren in Maine and Bro. Daniel Holt, of N. H. Tuesday A. M., social meeting front of the stand. Preaching by various brethren, with social meetings followed during the week, and closed Sunday night. Our meeting on old Camp Herman was joyous, but sad to part. For one, I can say, we had one of the freest meetings I ever attended in Maine.

LIBERTY WETHERBEE.

BANGOR, ME., Oct. 6, 1870.

FROM C. W. CHICK.

BR. STORRS: I am glad to see that the HERALD OF LIFE will be sustained; but sorry to say, that I am unable to do any thing pecuniarily for its support. I had hoped to have paid more on vol. vii.; but want of work, together with sickness, has made it difficult to obtain the necessaries of life for my family.

I have been sick nearly four weeks, but I am slowly improving, and hope to be out in a week or ten days. I write these facts that you may be assured that I still love the glorious truths of Life in Christ.

My head has been so affected by fever that I can scarcely express myself. I wish to say, that having been unable to pay for the last volume of the HERALD, I do not, in my present situation, feel that it would be right for me to offer myself as a subscriber. I fear you have too many unfulfilled promises already. I am sorry to lose it, but I desire to act right, though I make a great sacrifice.

May God bless and sustain you unto the Lord's coming.

Your brother in Christ.

Note by the Editor.

Fear not, Br. Chick; the HERALD will continue to go on its mission to you, pay or no pay, for the present. May the Lord bless and sustain you.

APPOINTMENT.

NEW YORK, (Cooper Institute, Room 24), Oct. 30. WM. STUART.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 19, 1870.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

THE SCARLET BEAST AND TEN KINGS.

THE article on this subject, on the first page, is one of much interest, historically, if in no other light; and few men among us have a better knowledge of history than the writer. We have before said, there are difficulties connected with the subject of the ten kings, who are with the scarlet-colored beast, that we have seen nothing yet to unravel. While we accord to the writer of the article before us a careful examination of the subject, and certainly a well connected history of the beast and papacy down to the beast and ten horns, on which the harlot rides to judgment, we cannot as yet see how the ten States of Italy can answer to the prophecy concerning the ten kings.

Our greatest difficulty (though that is not all) is, that these ten kings are to make war with the Lamb, and the Lamb is to overcome them. It seems to us such an idea by no means covers the prophecy of Rev. xix., or that of Rev. xvi.; the last named describing the gathering to the battle of Armageddon; and the first named, the same battle; in which the fowls, that fly in the midst of heaven, are called upon to gather themselves together unto the supper of the great God; that they might eat the flesh of kings, and the flesh of captains, and of mighty men; which company is to consist of the beast, and the kings of the earth, and their armies; which are said, in chap. xvi., to be gathered from "the whole world;" which expression, it seems to us, could embrace nothing less than the whole of the old Roman empire. How a fragment of that empire, called Italy, and the one king there, though reigning over ten united States, can fill the prophecy that "these shall make war with the Lamb," etc., we confess we do not see.

To us, it seems inevitable that some other combination is yet to be developed to answer the outlines of the prophetic vision. What it is, and how to be developed, we do not yet see or understand: but when developed, it seems to us, it must be atheistical, and embrace a large portion of Europe and a part of Asia. We wait further developments before expressing any thing with positiveness on the subject; yet it seems likely the transactions now passing before our eyes, in Europe, are some of the opening scenes of "that great day of God Almighty."

Let us strive to work the work of God while the day lasts; and be careful to have our minds kept in perfect peace, and free from undue excitement, chastened into a quiet waiting for the Lord, admonished, by past disappointments, not to be too positive as to the immediate events before us. Let us steadily devote ourselves to whatever work the providence, word, and Spirit of God indicates He would have us to do. Thus shall we be always ready; remembering that we are here to serve God and his dear Son, and to love the work to which He has called us, not merely to be glad that this day of labor is nearly over, but to see how much we can still do or suffer for our Lord and Master while the day lasts. May the mercy of our God preserve us all in the path of duty and peace. So shall we meet our Lord's approval when He returns from heaven in His glory; which event draws nigh.

SPIRITISM.

A RECENT issue of "The Christian Union," of this city, contains an article, by a popular writer, in defence of the above doctrine, under the misnomer of "Spiritualism." In the minds of those persons with whom presumption and assumption and unwarrantable conclusions stand for arguments, the article must be regarded as very strong. We are not half so much surprised that such an article should emanate from a Christian source, though it would be a matter of great surprise to us did we not know the inevitable tendency of popular theology, as that the Editor of the "Union" should give place in the columns of his paper to such an effusion. Angels appeared unto Christ and to some others, therefore, reasons the writer, it must be true that disembodied spirits of human beings minister to their friends in the flesh. Citing the circumstance of our Saviour's agony in Gethsemane, when an angel appeared and strengthened him, the writer asks:

"Was that angel of mortal birth? Was it one of our race already in glory? That question may occur to the mind and it is one of deep interest, since there is evidence from other sources that glorified saints are sometimes spoken of as angels, and on other important occasions did minister to him. But the instance is conclusive as showing that the system of our heavenly Father in our guidance to heaven, is, throughout, one of ministration."

The question whether "that angel" was "of mortal birth;" whether it was "one of our race, already in glory," is one which such as care to speculate on what in no way concerns them will answer to suit their individual fancy, but that "there is" Scripture "evidence" that "glorified saints are sometimes spoken of as angels, and on other important occasions did minister to" Christ—is an assertion strongly indicative that its author is not at home in theology, and suggests the thought that the realms of fiction, where she has won her celebrity, is for her a safer field of labor. Why did she not instance some of the cases where glorified saints are spoken of as angels, and did on other occasions minister to him?

Suppose it be conceded that the angel was of mortal birth; what then? It could not possibly prove even the existence of disembodied spirits of dead men, for there were two persons, Enoch and Elijah, translated that they "should not see death," and it might for aught anybody can know have been one of them which appeared to Jesus. Upon the assumption that the "angel was of mortal birth," on no ground, other than that the Bible says nothing of their being made angels, could it be reasonably denied that it was one of them. The circumstance, therefore, is infinitely far removed from the possibility of even indicating the ministration of disembodied spirits of saints. But what, in view of the facts of the case, is to be thought of the remarkable statement: "the instance is conclusive as showing that the system of our heavenly Father in our guidance to heaven, is throughout, one of ministration?" Marvelous logic! truly. This case, standing entirely alone, having no reference to other cases, is said to be conclusive as showing that our heavenly Father always deals with His creatures through instrumentalities—never directly. However, it is in keeping with what follows.

"But the question is put: 'How do we know that departed children of men—spirits of this world perform the offices of ministering spirits? In the first place there is no improbability in this, in the nature of the case, Admitting a system of ministration to men on earth—admitting a band of glorious spirits in heaven to whom this work is committed; admitting that the saints on earth are made a part of this band of glorious spirits, it is difficult to perceive why they should not be thus employed."

As it is impossible to "know" what is not true, "we" cannot "know that departed children of men—spirits of this world perform the offices of ministering spirits." Some people think they know it, but their supposed knowledge is based on the assertions of "evil men and seducers" who "wax worse and worse deceiving and being deceived;" from people who "resist the truth" even "as Jannes and Jambres withstood Moses," and not from the word of God, the only source of truth respecting heavenly things. "The question is put," says our distinguished friend, "how do we know that" disembodied "spirits of this world perform the offices of ministering spirits?" and it is replied, substantially, "O quite easy; there is no difficulty. We have only to admit a system of ministration on earth—admit a band of glorious spirits in heaven to whom this work is committed, and then just simply admit, further, that the saints on earth are made a part of this band of glorious spirits, and it then becomes really 'difficult to perceive why they should not be thus employed,' and that is the way we know it." Exactly so; yes, admit all that to be true, and it really "becomes difficult to perceive why they should not" do a great many things which it would be no more absurd to expect of them and attribute to them than is either consciousness or ministration. Only assume and admit and listen to "false teachers" and neglect the teachings of Scripture, and it becomes easy enough to get to believing the doctrine. That is the way those who believe it think they know it is true.

The transfiguration is next claimed in support of this doctrine. After quoting from the account as recorded by Luke, the writer says:

"This passage is conclusive of the fact, that departed saints are cognizant of, and deeply interested in the events transpiring on earth. . . . If Moses and Elias came from heaven to talk with Jesus about this, we may infer that they were embassadors expressing the feeling of all the departed saints."

The account says, "there talked with him, (Jesus) two men, which were Moses and Elias." Elias did not die at all, but was taken up bodily in a chariot of fire. His appearance, therefore, at the mount of transfiguration affords no aid whatever, either to the idea of the ministration of anything ever connected with the saints on earth, or to that of their existence in a conscious state. As to Moses, let it be remembered, the account says "two men" talked with Jesus. Moses died, and if, as Luke says, he was there as a man it follows, inevitably, that he was raised from the dead. So his appearance proves nothing more for the theory in question than does that of Elias. The person who can see in the fact of the presence on earth of two men, one of whom did not die and the other of whom was raised from the dead, any proof of the existence of disembodied spirits of saints must possess remarkable faculties. The appearance of Moses must, however, be taken in proof of the resurrection of the dead, the very thing which our friend does not, if consistent, believe in at all. The next evidence is sought in Hebrews xii.

"Ye are not come to the mount that might be touched and that burned with fire, nor unto blackness and darkness and tempest.' . . . 'But ye are come to Mount Zion, unto the city of the living God, the Heavenly Jerusalem, and to an innumerable company of angels—to the general assembly and church of the First Born, which are written in Heaven, to God the Judge of all and to the spirits of just men made perfect.' In the chapter before, St. Paul after enumerating the deeds of the Old Testament saints, who he declares lived and suffered, and conquered by faith, represents them as surrounding the Christian church in a solemn assembly, as of old, Greece was gathered in the arena to watch the races in the Olympic games. 'Seeing ye are compassed about,' he says, 'with so great a cloud of witnesses, run with patience the race set before you, looking unto Jesus."

Bear in mind it is not to Gentiles Paul here speaks, but to Hebrews who understood the figures used and objects referred to. In the eleventh chapter Paul defines the nature and represents the excellence of faith in the divine promises, by referring the Hebrews to the eminent examples of the beauties and triumphs of faith which are recorded in their Scriptures. There we read of many who suffered persecution and death rather than prove recreant to their trusts, renounce their principles and yield their hopes. The lesson which Paul desired them to learn from the representation was that it was incumbent upon them to maintain the same unyielding, persevering spirit. That since they were surrounded with so great a multitude of witnesses to the great principle of confidence in God, they should be willing, nay eager to become members of the glorious company, and, by faithfulness, to honor it. The assumption that the "cloud of witnesses" spoken of by Paul are witnesses to our trials and exertions, an assumption adopted wholly because it involves the present conscious existence of those witnesses, is utterly baseless, for Paul's whole argument suggests with irresistible force that they are witnesses to the truth. What says Paul respecting the present condition of the witnesses of whom he speaks? He says: "these all, having obtained a good report through faith, received not the promise;" but they "all died in faith." Who, then, will be so reckless as to assert, in opposition to inspiration, that they (the witnesses) have received the promise, and hence that there is no need for a resurrection. "Let us," says Paul, "run with patience the race set before us, looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith." Does our friend never feel condemned for spurning the exhortation of Paul to look to Jesus, and looking to departed spirits instead? Let all professing Christians beware how they look unto disembodied spirits rather than unto Christ.

The expression, "spirits of just men made perfect" cannot refer to departed (dead) saints, for the apostle not only says they are not yet made perfect, but that God designed "that they without us should not be made perfect." As nothing is more explicitly taught in Scripture than a literal resurrection of the dead saints, it follows that, even admitting their consciousness, there can be no such thing as their perfection until the resurrection transpires. There is a spirit spoken of in Scripture as common to all animals. "They (man and beast) have all one spirit." But the spirit of man, as frequently spoken of, is the man himself; 1 Cor. ii. 11; 2 Cor. ii. 13. The spirit of Timothy is Timothy himself, 2 Tim. iv. 22. The spirits of just men, therefore, with Paul, are just men themselves. In verse 1 of chap. x., Paul says the law could make nothing perfect; and in verse 14 he says, "Christ hath by his one offering forever perfected those who are sanctified." None, however faithful, could be made perfect, nor the plan of redemption be completed by the shedding of the blood of bulls and of goats; but they were made perfect, and the scheme of salvation was completed by the shedding of the blood of Christ. To the assembly of just men thus made perfect does the gospel introduce believers. If by "spirits of just men made perfect" we understand disembodied spirits in heaven, the observation is not only wholly irrelevant, it is not true. In no sense can believers in Christ be said to be introduced into such society; nor could they in that respect be said to have any privileges above good men under the law. Paul tells the Hebrews that under the law the number of God's messengers was small; the word of God was not abundant; there were comparatively few teachers in Israel, and only occasionally did God speak by the prophets. But under the gospel, believers are introduced to a vast assembly, an "innumerable company" of messengers, a community collected from all nations and kindreds, and all members of the "church of the first-born." The general assembly and church of the first-born to which believers "are come" are not said to be now in heaven, but are "written (registered) in heaven." The last of our friend's proof texts is found in Revelations.

"An interpreting angel shows to the apostle the mysteries of the future, and Saint John says: and I, John, saw these things and heard them, and when I had heard and seen I fell down to worship at the feet of the angel which showed me these things; and he said unto me, See thou do it not, for I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them that keep the sayings of this book, worship God."

This is thought to be just the thing. Here is an angel which declares himself one of the prophets. Surely nothing more is needed to prove that "saints on earth" become ministering spirits when they die. But look more closely. Does the angel say any such thing? The language of the Revelator here is elliptical, but the thing to be supplied suggests itself at once to the unprejudiced mind. John falls down to worship the angel. The angel says, in substance, "do it not; I am not a Being to be worshipped. I am only thy fellow-servant, and the fellow-servant of thy brethren the prophets, and the fellow-servant of them that keep the sayings of this book, therefore worship God." To understand the angel as saying he is one of the prophets, is simply a misapprehension of the language. However we may interpret the language, it cannot reasonably be accepted as favoring consciousness in death, for if the angel was one of the prophets we must conclude he was Enoch, or Elijah, or Moses, or one of the many which an evangelist says came out of their graves after Christ's resurrection.

Thus vanishes the boasted Scripture support of "Spiritualism," falsely so called. If the writer of the article under consideration, and all who believe in the conscious existence of anybody, saint or sinner, or any part of them, between death and the resurrection (literal resurrection) will throw away their groundless speculations, and go humbly to the Bible, resolved to know for themselves what it teaches on the subject, they will soon learn that it gives no countenance to the theory; that the doctrine is an error, a stupendous error; that it is subversive of gospel truth, and its fruits are evil and that continually. By the mouth of the Prophet Jeremiah, God said of His ancient church: "My people have committed two evils; they have forsaken me, the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water." To a lamentable extent is this true of religionists to-day. They forsake God by turning away from His word. They found their religious belief largely upon the speculations of men who are "reprobate concerning the faith," and refuse to accept revealed truth. May God help them to read aright and to trust in Him.

By the way, will Mrs. H. B. Stowe be so kind as to tell us what, upon the assumption that saints go to heaven and meet the Lord at death, Paul meant by saying they "which are alive and remain, unto the coming of the Lord, shall not go before (to meet the Lord) them which are asleep?" L. C. T.

MATERIALISM VS. IMMATERIALISM.

BY W. H. SPENCER.

INSTANCES are not rare where we are branded as materialists for denying upon the authority of God's word, that there is any state of conscious existence for man except through the union of spirit with matter under the condition of animal organism. Popular theology denies that matter, whether organized or unorganized, is essential to man's conscious existence. We object to this assumption for various reasons:

First, This so-called orthodox theory charges God with folly in creating this corporeal organization; because it teaches that deliverance of the spirit from this material body is a great blessing. The conclusion is, therefore forced upon us by this theory that when "God formed man of the dust of the ground," He did not form that which should be instrumental in promoting His glory, but it was a material prison-house, in which to confine the invisible being that orthodoxy is pleased to call "the man proper;" thus circumscribing it in the exercise of its functions; for we are told that

"Abstract from the body it is susceptible of more enlarged capacities, so that, with its expanded powers, it comprehends the vastness of divinity, and is able to picture before its expanded vision all the wonders of God's universe at once; and comprehends, appreciates, and admires more in five minutes than all the living put together."

We cannot look upon this as other than a monstrous assertion, and one which is wholly destitute of Scriptural evidence to sustain it. But if it be true that "abstract from the body" the immaterial man "is susceptible of more enlarged capacities," what strange conduct it ascribes to God in creating this corporeal organism in which to confine the spirit, thus preventing "it from using its "enlarged capacities" and "expanded powers" for His glory.

Second, The immaterialistic theory nullifies the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead, and destroys all interest in the second coming of Christ.

In surveying the writings of the apostles the conclusion is inevitable, that if they understood and believed the popular theory of the present day regarding man's hope of a future life, they certainly laid undue stress upon the doctrine of Christ's second coming and the resurrection of the dead; for this event was the nucleus of all their hopes and anticipations regarding a future life. But it is very evident that they knew nothing of orthodox theology, for the second coming of Christ, as the LIFE-GIVER, was the all absorbing theme which seemed to animate their very existence, and everywhere appears as the prominent topic of their epistles.

How sadly different is the theology of to-day! The orthodox pulpits are as utterly silent, regarding this event, as though it was some vain fancy of the ages of darkness which had yielded to the enlightenment of modern times. And what is the cause of this deplorable state of things? There can be but one answer—in placing man in heaven or hell at death—involves no necessity for Christ's second coming and the resurrection of the dead; and consequently this doctrine of primitive times is in such disrepute that we constantly hear the scoffer's argument—"Where is the promise of his coming? for since the fathers fell asleep all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation."—2 Pet. iii. 4.

We can hardly expect a man who is looking for his reward at death to trouble himself much about Christ's second coming; and thus the glorious hope of the church, through the traditions of men, has become nearly obliterated. But blessed be God, it still exists in the Bible, as a "light that shineth in a dark place until the day dawn." The primitive church were "looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God, and our Lord Jesus Christ," (Titus ii. 13), for, "unto them that look for him shall he appear the second time without sin [or sin-offering] unto salvation."—Heb. ix. 28.

"Be patient, therefore, brethren, unto the coming of the Lord."—James v. 7. "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven, with the voice of the archangel and the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together, with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air."—1 Thess. iv. 16, 17. "Amen! even so, come Lord Jesus." Rev. xxii. 20.

FEW OR MANY SAVED.

BY JACOB GRIM.

"Then said one unto him, Lord are there few that be saved."—Luke xiii. 23.

THE above question was asked our Lord, when He was journeying through the villages towards Jerusalem. And the same question is asked daily; and from the actions of some of our good brethren, who are in the habit of fixing rules and regulations for our belief, and saying we must believe so and so, and others who are saying, Unless you believe the gospel as we understand it you cannot, according to our understanding, be saved. Now, we should endeavour to bear in mind one thing: that is, that, Jesus says, I am He, that hath the keys of hell (hades) and the grave. And there is one blessed consolation, that He has never given the keys to any one with power to use them against his children. We always draw consolation from that fact, whenever we hear of some one denouncing us because we have made some new advancement in what we consider to be the cause of truth.

Our mind has been led to the above text from the following words, "After this I beheld, and lo, a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations and kindreds, and peoples, and tongues, stood before the throne and before the Lamb clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands," etc.—Rev. vii. 9. Now, here is an innumerable company which no man could number. Well, this is more than a few. But, says one, may not these come out of the Age to come; when Jesus shall rule in righteousness? No. For one asks the question, "And whence came they? And I said unto him thou knowest. And he said to me, These are they which came out of great tribulation."

Now, if we understand the doctrine of the future Age, as taught by our brethren, it is to be an age of comparative peace, and no persecution of any kind, or tribulation to be endured; but, says one, this is symbolical. Very well; what does the figure portray? But we will look at one more text and see if we can gather any light upon the subject.

We find in Heb. xi. 12, 13, these words, "Therefore, also, were born from one who even to these things had become lifeless, [a posterity] like the stars of heaven for multitude, and like the sand of the shore of the sea innumerable. All these died in faith not having received the promised blessings; but having seen and saluted them from a distance, and having confessed that they were strangers and sojourners on the land."—Emp. Dia.

Now here is one plain text which describes the company of faithful ones who have died in the faith as numerous as the stars in multitude, and as the sand of the sea for numbers. Quite a goodly company of saved out of the present dispensation; for they all died in the faith. And another thought grows out of this; these according to our brethren are all kings and priests, and they shall reign on the earth. Now to carry out the figure, a king, denotes a kingdom; and a kingdom denotes territory and subjects; therefore each one of these kings, as numerous as the stars for multitude, is to have a kingdom. What a vast world the one to come must be to give each one of them a kingdom, with subjects, and a kingdom to rule over.

But, says one, Peter says, Ye are a royal priesthood, a chosen generation, and not kings. But, John the Revelator says, "And has made us unto our God kings, (as well as) and priests: and we shall reign on the earth."—Rev. v. 10. Now it does seem to me there must be something wrong somewhere, or we have made a mistake in our understanding of the subject. There always has been a disposition in the mind of all sectarians to limit the salvation of mankind, somewhat to the narrowness of their own creeds, and judge our heavenly Father by themselves. It was but a few weeks since we were told of one good old brother whom we esteem in the Lord; he did not see how we could be saved. Well, we have had others say the same thing at about every new step we made; and that is the case with the great mass of professors; they do not see how men can be saved who do not believe the truth as they understand it. It does not make much difference whether we can see it or not, so that God can see it; and we are told, that He can see how to save a great multitude that no man can number; and that out of the present and past generations.

The good old prophet thought that he was the only one in the land that worshipped God: but, even then, he was told there were 5000 who had not bowed to Baal. So in Paul's day, there was a remnant according to the election of grace; and so in all the past generations, he that feared God and worked righteousness, in every nation, was accepted of him. What then are we to do with our Saviour's answer to our text, "Lord are there few that be saved?"

We like the rendering given in the Emp. Dia. "Master are those few who are being saved?" Now comes in our rule, Who was the individual enquiring about? and of whom did our Lord speak when he gave the answer? He was travelling towards Jerusalem, and preaching only to the Jews. His mission was only to that people, and we think therefore it has no application to all time, but that out of the people to whom he was sent, and from among these in the midst of whom he was laboring. "Lord are there few being saved?" The answer, "Strive to enter in at the straight gate: for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able. When once the master of the house is risen up, and hath shut to the door, and ye begin to stand without and to knock at the door, saying, Lord, Lord open unto us; and he shall answer and say unto you, I know ye not whence ye are."

From our Lord's answer, there is a proper time for striving to be saved, and there is a time when the same effort will be unavailing. But it has no allusion to the amount or final number who will be saved. We believe that out of every age or dispensation, there will be few saved in comparison with the multitude who choose the broad road; but in the aggregate, when those out of each nation, kindred, tongues, and peoples, shall be gathered together, there will be an innumerable company; so that there will be no contradiction between Jesus, Paul, and John the revelator; and it will need no future age of especial privileges to accomplish all that God hath promised.

As for the shutting to the door, we believe the door has been shut at the close of each dispensation; and one dispensation cannot go in through the same door as did the previous. The covenant of Moses was the door to the dispensation of Israel, and it closed against them; and many of them, like the rich man in the parable, have been knocking ever since at that door, but without avail. And Jesus is the only door opened to this dispensation; for if any man enter by any other door the same is a thief or a robber. Jesus is the way, the truth, and the life.

SUGGESTIONS ABOUT CAMPMEETING.

BY CHARLES C. BARKER.

IN reading a report of the doings of the "Life" Brethren at the Springfield Meeting, I found my name in type as member of a Committee chosen to fix the location of our future camping ground. No action has yet been taken by this committee but I would suggest the propriety of an immediate selection, and renting of a Grove appropriately located for this purpose; because time is wanted in which to perfect and thoroughly arrange advantages and necessaries for such a meeting and many things may be attended to this fall and winter—such as the procural of the needed lumber, etc. etc., with much greater convenience and far less cost than in the hurrying, crowded, busy spring-time, and heated summer.

Where shall the campmeeting be located? That's the question—which should be decided by due consideration of the object and design of such a gathering.

The personal design of our meeting is as I understand it a congregation of as large a number of life believers as possible, for conference communion and edification—its first purpose is not missionary work—but it is arranged for a meeting of the saints—(and a most necessary arrangement is it for mutual aid and encouragement in these "perilous times" just prior to the great day of God Almighty) as an annual rendezvous for God's people—a "Feast of Tabernacles"—"whither the tribes go up."

For this purpose it should be centrally located; equally convenient to all as far as possible, and as I think of the goodly number of "Life believers," in eastern Maine, also our brethren in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, I must say, that I feel that Springfield is without doubt the best spot in sight. Its railroad connections are unsurpassed. All are familiar with its location—easy to find, possessed of a good market, etc., etc., with its many beautiful groves—there is no place that I know to be compared with it.

Besides, our camp ground should be near the dwelling place of brethren that it may be cared for; and I am confident that our Springfield brethren and sisters will gladly and heartily render much valuable personal aid in fitting up and caring for our camp ground.

Brethren of the campmeeting committee shall we not take some immediate action. Let us have a meeting at once.

HARTFORD, CONN., Oct. 10, 1870.

PERVERTING THE WORD.

PAUL foresaw distinctly what would come. He knew that "evil men and seducers would wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." Hence he solemnly charged Timothy, "before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who should judge the quick and dead at his appearing and kingdom, to preach the word. Be instant in season, and out of season, reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and doctrine, for the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine, but after their own lusts heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears, and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables."—2 Tim. iv. 1–4.

How literally has this prediction of the Apostle been verified. All over the world do we witness that state of confusion and darkness consequent upon men departing from the truth. The time has come when men will not endure sound doctrine. They get impatient and angry when the truth is presented to them, and so intolerant that they will not permit others to hear it. They "heap to themselves teachers after their own lusts, having itching ears." Look out upon Christendom at the present time, and behold what a vast army of religious teachers. Besides there are hundreds constantly emerging from the varions theological institutions throughout the world. Paul and Timothy rightly divided the Word and taught the truth. They spoke the same things. They were harmonious in their teachings. But not so with the multitude of religious teachers who lead the people at the present time. They do not speak in harmony, nor do they agree as to what is truth. They teach for doctrines the fables of men, such as sky-kingdom, immortal soulism, purgatorial fire, and hell-torments. Some of them deny the resurrection of the dead in plain terms; others teach what is equivalent to such denial, by affirming that men get reward as soon as they die. Paul taught that the wages of sin is death; but those who pervert the truth say it is eternal torment. Paul taught that immortality was brought to light through the Gospel, and to be obtained by a patient continuance in well doing; but those who have erred concerning the truth, say that all men are by nature immortal. Paul taught that Jesus would return to this earth, at which time he would fashion our vile bodies like unto his own glorious body; modern teachers claim that we put on the heavenly likeness at death. Paul looked for the establishment of the kingdom of God upon earth; popular teachers claim that the earth will be burned up, and the kingdom of God will be in the heavens above.—Selected.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM ELD. W. S. CAMPBELL.

BR. STORRS: It is now over four months since I was taken down suddenly sick, away from home; and so sick that my life was immediately despaired of. During the long and tedious summer I was, most of the time, enduring intense suffering, which I was able to pass through by the especial grace of our heavenly Father, through Christ.

I most fully believe that my life has been continued, for some wise end, through the immediate manifestation of the Divine power, in answer to prayer; the prayers of the people of God in my behalf. I, therefore, wish, in this first article for the HERALD OF LIFE, to express my gratitude and love to God, who, by his Son Jesus Christ, can not only forgive sins on earth, but heal the sick in answer to the prayer of faith, even as in the days of old. All praise and glory to his holy name!

It was a wonder to the most skilful physicians, and to all who saw me, that I could survive. Yet, because the Lord left me not, I was not consumed.

Next, I would express my gratitude to the children of the Most High, and my love for them, who were so prompt and so earnest in urging before the throne of grace the case of a poor, prostrate fellow-laborer whose condition of suffering and sorrow was such as to deprive him of understandingly bringing his own sacrifice. Thanks to the great Head of the church, that the members of his body feel a sympathy for each other; and they will not, therefore, see the needs of one of the number and not ask mercy for him.

I need not here repeat what has been so often asserted, that I am continually grateful and happy in consideration of the munificence of the Life believers. My necessity has been great: my friends have come to my aid, and thus I was, in part, kept up.

At my daughter's I received every attention and kindness; and thus, having a place of quiet and freedom from noise and excitement, I was enabled to secure a better hope of ultimate recovery, as well as strength to endure the fiery trial. It was the last days of May that I was prostrated at Meriden. It was the last of September when we came away.

My present condition is favorable to my final restoration to health; at least, to a degree; but I shall never, probably, recover my strength.

I have the use of my arm and hand, to some extent. My limb is gaining, and I begin to move with a crutch; but make poor work of it.

I have considered the mercy of God in bringing me out of "my distresses," and that in wisdom, not in wrath, have I been afflicted, hoping that the Lord will enable me to improve the little time that remains in the advancement of the cause we so much love.

My experience during these trials has been great, and I may say, that I rejoice in the rock of my salvation.

I hope to be found in the work. I have felt, more than ever, the importance of proclaiming the whole plan of this salvation. The Life doctrines, which are so much neglected, require the energies of all; and I do long to be about the work. And now, when there are such striking fulfilments of prophecy to show the coming of the kingdom at the very door, how those who love the truth wish to speak, and be heard.

I cannot write more now, for the physical and mental fatigue make it necessary that I should rest. I send love to all who love our Lord Jesus Christ.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., Oct. 13, 1870.

FROM JOEL A. SIMONDS.

BR. STORRS: I like the theme of your paper, and the ability with which it is conducted. But the life and immortality, brought to light through the gospel, is not all that should be taught. This is invaluable, but it is only means to an end beyond. To teach this constantly, leaving out the end for which this life is promised, will never give us a well balanced view of Christianity.

While the end is not generally taught, and sometimes denied, the subject of life assumes undue proportions. Christ was raised from the dead to sit down on David's throne. The object for which he was raised to life gives character to the whole transaction, far beyond the idea that he was raised from the dead simply to live forever. Shall we ever be talking of the life, and never of the end for which the life was given? Christ was raised from the dead that he might reign and restore all things. To restore all things is the object for which Christ received his life. The work of restitution is what gives character to his life. Shall we talk simply of his life, and not of the object for which he lives?

Christians will be raised from the dead to share with Christ, not his life, but his inheritance; to sit down with him on his throne; to have power over the nations; to judge the world; to restore the world to its former uncursed condition. It is this work that gives character to their promised life. Shall we talk about the life, and not the work of that life? As money is of value only as it is used, so it is the object of future life that determines its value.

The seed of Abraham shall bless the nation. The seed is the means, the blessing the nations beyond, is the end. It is always the end that determines the value of the means. Is it then safe to talk of the means as the final end continually, as if it were really the final end, when it is not so? Does not this give a false view of the matter?

Here is a machine of great value for a certain end. Now suppose in all the descriptions and praises of this machine, no allusion is made to the object for which it was made; could any one have a just appreciation of the value of this machine? So when the life, promised in the gospel, is described and praised, with scarcely an allusion to the object of that life, other than to be happy, how could any one become well instructed in regard to the bearing of that life upon the final object of the gospel?

I make these remarks, because I have observed that those who are guided by the general tenor of the teaching of your paper know nothing of, and many oppose the great objects of the restitution of all things, as revealed in all the Scriptures, and the things that pertain to the kingdom of God. I do not overlook the fact that there are some worthy exceptions in favor of the gospel of the kingdom, but they are almost as the drop in the bucket.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., Oct. 4, 1870.

We sympathize with Br. Simonds in his remarks in the foregoing letter. It has really seemed to us, for a long time, that some of our friends, who are firm on the Life theme, are too unwilling, or are fearful as to the investigation of the subject of the employment we are to be engaged in when we have attained to the eternal life we seek. Shall we be content to remain in the dark on that point, and think of the attainment only as eternal "happiness?" Is such an idea not too much like the orthodox notion of "sitting on a cloud and singing psalms forever?" Have we not repudiated such an idea? What then shall be our employment? Did not our Lord send his disciples to preach the kingdom of God? In what does that kingdom consist? and what is its work? These are questions of vast importance. Let them be candidly and calmly investigated.

FROM W. H. H. MCALLISTER.

BR. STORRS: I see by a late letter from Br. Geo. U. Lewis of Bethel, that he was disappointed in not seeing me at the Campmeeting. It would have been impossible for me to have spent much time there owing to other absences from home about the same time, especially the one to Springfield Campmeeting; but it was my intention to have spent at least one Sunday with that gathering. I was prevented, however, by the sickness of our little daughter. Br. Lewis and the other friends whom I had expected to meet must accept this as an excuse, and not attribute it to lack of desire to meet them, or lukewarmness in the cause of truth. I am happy to report, at present, the convalescence of my daughter, thanks to a kind heavenly Father. My own health continues good, and I am doing a good amount of labor, official and miscellaneous.

The HERALD comes earlier since ths new volume commenced. It seems to gain activity with years. Perhaps this is due to our Assistant. Be this as it may, early or late, it is always welcome. Please accept this line in answer to the inquiry concerning my non appearance at Bethel Campmeeting.

Yours for the truth.

ST. ALBANS, VT., Oct. 1870.

FROM J. C. DAY.

BR. STORRS: The battle goes well: the truth is slowly but steadily gaining ground, and I have no fears as to the final result. I never was stronger in the entire mortality of man and his hopeless condition, without some help outside of himself, than I am now. I was at the Alton Bay camp-meeting, where I met a goodly number of Life believers. Quite a good number have lately come into the truth, under the labors of Br. H. M. Bryant, of Northwood Narrows. I found Br. Bryant to be a clear headed and liberal minded man, with a good gift to labor; a good singer, and expresses his views in a clear and easy manner. I have just learned, by a letter from Br, Bartlett, that Br. Bryant has buried one of his children since camp-meeting.

I hope Br. Bryant will be encouraged by the brethren to labor in the vineyard.

I also formed a very agreeable acquaintance with Br. and Sister Wood, of Lawrence. Br. Wood has a letter in the last paper. I had my feelings drawn toward them even before I knew they were Life believers. I was glad to see his letter in the paper. O how glad I am, my beloved Br. Storrs, that I have been led into this glorious truth of No life in the future, except we become connected with the LIFE-GIVER while in probation. O may we, as a people, become more closely connected with the LIFE-GIVER and with each other, that when he comes, who is our life, he may say, Well done.

SOUTH ASHBURNHAM, MASS., Oct. 9, 1870.

FROM LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

BR. STORRS: What a work has been ours, and is still before us to prepare: a difficult and hard work. I do not now wonder the Jews rejected Christ as the Messiah they looked for. Tradition and vain philosophy stood in the way. Their Scriptures were plain; but they had another plan, and must keep their own traditions. So we see it much the same at the present time. When driven to the wall by Scripture proof, they will end the controversy with a declaration that they cannot believe that. Others will satisfy their own minds with the plea that there is such a diversity of opinion that we cannot know what is truth; and of course it is of little consequence.

Upon us, who have received such a clear light, rests the responsibility; for to whom much is given, much is required. If we have not earth's treasures, we can recommend the truth by conversation and a corresponding example, and must not be discouraged by rebuff, as we know not which shall prosper, this or that. Above all, we can wield the weapon of prayer, which our gainsayers have no means to reach. How powerful is this weapon—how much it has availed—and does still work wonders. Will the blessed LIFE-GIVER pour on us a spirit of grace and supplication, that like Jacob we may prevail for rich blessings upon our efforts, while we labor on with untiring diligence, rejoicing that we are so richly blessed, looking for rest and reward when the Chief Shepherd shall appear, which the signs of the times plainly indicate is not far in the distance.

Yours, in the faith of No Life out of Christ.

ST. PAUL, MINN., Oct. 7, 1870.

FROM EMELINE WOOD.

BR. STORRS: I was up to see Sister Stubbs. She is delighted with the HERALD OF LIFE: thinks there is not another such an excellent paper in the world: thinks its writers must all be inspired: such food, such blessed expositions of the Word, and the precious letters. She praises the Lord for such a paper. She prays for the Life believers, and that the light may increase and the people see this blessed truth: says she never had such food before.

I went out with tracts this morning: they were gladly received. A lady asked me for some, and I gave her three or four. She thanked me so kindly, and hastened on to church. She was a German. I had a good time and felt the Lord was with me. He has said, They who water shall be watered again. Glory be to His blessed name for all His mercies. I went to see Sister Hoyt: she is poorly. I hope her sufferings will not be long: let all remember her.

I love to go out and work in the vineyard of our Father, and he throws somebody in my way. When people see me at their doors, they come out for tracts. May our Father impress the truth on their hearts. It makes me very tired in this work Sundays; but I have all the week to rest in, and feel thankful that I can do something for the blessed Saviour who has done so much for me. How can I praise the Lord enough for all his gifts? Yet I am called to pass through severe trials. I trust the Lord's arm will sustain me, and then I have nothing to fear.

I was thinking of our dear Saviour, how in his severest trial all his disciples left him. Dear brethren and sisters pray for me. I need your prayers now if ever. I feel how weak I am. I hope our Father will spare our dear Br. E. Wolcott to us. He is a precious brother.

TIMOTHY E. CORLISS, Decorah, Iowa, writes: Dear friends, I feel that I am one of Christ's little ones. Paul has directed us to exhort one another daily, and so much the more as we see the day approaching. I am strongly impressed that the day of Christ is near at hand, and we should watch and pray. First, pray for those who manage the HERALD OF LIFE, and for the preachers, that the word of the Lord may have free course: also, for the weak, and I am one of them: let us pray that they be strengthened by the Spirit of God. O how I rejoice in his faith that works by love. As some of us have been associated with those who have grown cold, let us exercise patience and kindness toward them: and lastly, let us pray for those generous souls who have given material aid to the cause. We pray they may be recompensed at the resurrection of the just; and as they have cheered the hearts of the poor, by giving carnal things, my prayer is, that the God of all grace will make all grace to abound toward them. Your brother, in hope.

ADDIE BICHFORD, Newburg, Me., writes: The reason I have not sent in my subscription before is because I have had sickness in my family, and our dear loved Mother has been taken from us by death's cruel hand. But we mourn not as those who have no hope. She was a firm Life believer: has been about five years. Oh! how much I shall miss her society and counsel from day to day. The Lord give strength, is my prayer, to comfort, and still care for my aged father, and be ready to meet dear mother when Jesus comes to release the just ones from the grave.

Your sister, in gospel hope.

LOUISA J. BEACH, New Britain, Conn., writes: You have undoubtedly heard how we have been afflicted since-camp-meeting. My husband has been very sick with typhoid fever, and is still lying, unable to turn or help himself, suffering with an abscess of the worst kind—putrid, or black erysipelas. It has been very doubtful whether he would recover; but I think he is improving slowly. I was also sick and confined to my bed some time; but I am now able to care for my husband again; and only those who have been here know what a task it has been. The Lord has been good, and has given strength equal to my day, and in the darkest hour, when we were both laid by, raised up friends to care for us. I trust that this affliction may be sanctified to our good, and that we may henceforth be more fully consecrated to the Lord.

JAMES AND REBECCA HERBERT, Point Pleasant, N. J., writes: How can we do without our paper? It is blessed to us, more than ever: we have no place where we can meet with brother or sister to worship; no preaching; and its weekly visits to us are comforting. We live in a retired plaee, and walk every Saturday night two and a half miles to get our HERALD. Now, dear brother, we shall have to ask you to continue to send it, if you can, and we will try to pay you just as soon as wc can. We will pledge ourselves to pay the subscription price of the poor (as we are among that company) for the present volume, and will try to pay the cost of the paper as we pledged to do for the last volume. Now if you can, please do so, and may God in his goodness through his dear Son bless you, and keep you in health to the coming and kingdom of Jesus.

STEWART CARLISLE, Wilmington, Del., writes: We are still contending for the faith once delivered to the saints: and when we present the simple truth, as it is in Jesus, we are very coolly told, "Oh yes, you are very smart: you know more than any one else;" then we have "itching ears," and so they go. We have great need of patience here; and in our patience must we possess our souls. Yours looking for the LIFE-GIVER.

E. M. KELLY, Burlington, Vt., sends $3, and writes: I dare not, in the sight of God, send this as an equivalent for the paper, for I consider it worth many times that sum; but being among the least of God's little ones, with limited means, it seems to be all I can spare for the present. May the good Lord richly bless those dear brethren and sisters who have given so much in time, talent, and means to sustain the paper. May they be blessed in basket and in store, and in all heavenly blessings; and may the Editor and his Assistant find the all-sustaining arm of the Lord to help them to discharge the important duties which God has called them to perform. My kind love to all the faithful ones in Christ Jesus. Your affectionate brother in the Lord, looking for Jesus.

OBITUARY.

TAGERT.—Our daughter, LOUISA F., died July 5, 1870, aged 22 years. She exhibited the religion of Christ in her life, and testified to its sublimest sentiments in death. The doctrine of the kingdom was embraced by her, and the effect of believing the gospel was evident in all her life, having opportunity of judging the effect of the immortal soul theory compared with the gospel hope of the resurrection from the dead. She admired and loved the religion of Christ, and always exhibited its sentiments and spirit, and wished that all would come to the fountain and receive the knowledge of the true God. Having a confiding and amiable nature, her generous sentiments led her to where she understood the teaching of the word, "hast borne and hast patience, and for my name's sake labored, and hast not fainted;" while all her course declared, "live in peace, and the God of love and peace shall be with you." She had the comforting influence of the Holy Spirit applying the promise to the disciples, "I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you." She beheld the "path of life;" that they "which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."

She is now in the grave. The thorns and briars, the painful anguish of the cross-bearing traveller, misapprehended and misunderstood, as Christ and his have always been; but, glory to God, no discomfort ever enters the tomb nor disturbs the sleeping dead. All the apostles and martyrs sleep in peace. Thus they are exalted above the reigning monarchs of earth, and shall finally obtain victory over death, where all the redeemed shall rise in triumph. "Oh death where is thy sting? Oh grave where is thy victory?"

While we feel our bereavement, we are shown, by Divine light, the joy and bliss of the social meeting when the Saviour shall gird himself and serve the guests, as an elder brother. What a scene is the present! one by one, earth's ties are broken; the mourning for the dying and the dead is continual: more than sixty every second close their eyes forever on present scenes of suffering. The thoughtful are led to exclaim by disappointment and sorrow, "I loathe it; I would not live alway." Oh how comforting the consolations of a sympathising friend; one who is touched with the feeling of our infirmities, and never turns a deaf ear to the mourner's tale; but always gives consolation to the fullest extent required by all who come to him: even so great, "though he were dead, yet shall he live." My mind is directed to that period when God shall wipe away all tears, and there shall be no more death. Oh may we all live for that period, and rejoice in anticipation continually.

SHELBURNE, VT., 1870.

KENNEDY.—Died in Hermon, Me., ABBIE G. KENNEDY, of consumption, aged 17 years, 4 months and 18 days. Thus this father and mother have been bereft of a lovely daughter; but they have laid her away not without hope. Words of comfort, from the writer, were spoken to the mourning friends.

ANOTHER:

BICKFORD.—Died in Newburg, Me., Sept. 28, 1870, SUSAN, wife of Ebenezer BICKFORD, aged 79 years. This aged mother in Israel lived and died a Christian. Sister Bickford was a firm believer in the truths taught in the HERALD OF LIFE, which had been her family paper for several years, taken by her daughter, Sister Addie Bickford. The blessed hope gave her strong consolation in the hours of her sufferings. Mother Bickford has left behind a large circle of friends to mourn her loss. Words of comfort were selected by the writer for the occasion from John xi. 25.

ALSO:

MARCHO.—Died in Bangor, Me., Oct. 4, 1870, CLARA A., daughter of Joseph and Sarah MARCHO, aged 20 years. Thus these parents have been bereft of a lovely child, and laid her away in sorrow, hoping to meet her again in joy. Words of consolation from the writer to the mourning circle from Jer. xxxi. 16.

notes territory and subjects; therefore each one of these kings, as numerous as the stars for multitude, is to have a kingdom. What a vast world the one to come must be to give each one of them a kingdom, with subjects, and a kingdom to rule over.

But, says one, Peter says, Ye are a royal priesthood, a chosen generation, and not kings. But, John the Revelator says, "And has made us unto our God kings, (as well as) and priests: and we shall reign on the earth."—Rev. v. 10. Now it does seem to me there must be something wrong somewhere, or we have made a mistake in our understanding of the subject. There always has been a disposition in the mind of all sectarians to limit the salvation of mankind, somewhat to the narrowness of their own creeds, and judge our heavenly Father by themselves. It was but a few weeks since we were told of one good old brother whom we esteem in the Lord; he did not see how we could be saved. Well, we have had others say the same thing at about every new step we made; and that is the case with the great mass of professors; they do not see how men can be saved who do not believe the truth as they understand it. It does not make much difference whether we can see it or not, so that God can see it; and we are told, that He can see how to save a great multitude that no man can number; and that out of the present and past generations.

The good old prophet thought that he was the only one in the land that worshipped God: but, even then, he was told there were 5000 who had not bowed to Baal. So in Paul's day, there was a remnant according to the election of grace; and so in all the past generations, he that feared God and worked righteousness, in every nation, was accepted of him. What then are we to do with our Saviour's answer to our text, "Lord are there few that be saved?"

We like the rendering given in the Emp. Dia. "Master are those few who are being saved?" Now comes in our rule, Who was the individual enquiring about? and of whom did our Lord speak when he gave the answer? He was travelling towards Jerusalem, and preaching only to the Jews. His mission was only to that people, and we think therefore it has no application to all time, but that out of the people to whom he was sent, and from among these in the midst of whom he was laboring. "Lord are there few being saved?" The answer, "Strive to enter in at the straight gate: for many, I say unto you, will seek to enter in, and shall not be able. When once the master of the house is risen up, and hath shut to the door, and ye begin to stand without and to knock at the door, saying, Lord, Lord open unto us; and he shall answer and say unto you, I know ye not whence ye are."

From our Lord's answer, there is a proper time for striving to be saved, and there is a time when the same effort will be unavailing. But it has no allusion to the amount or final number who will be saved. We believe that out of every age or dispensation, there will be few saved in comparison with the multitude who choose the broad road; but in the aggregate, when those out of each nation, kindred, tongues, and peoples, shall be gathered together, there will be an innumerable company; so that there will be no contradiction between Jesus, Paul, and John the revelator; and it will need no future age of especial privileges to accomplish all that God hath promised.

As for the shutting to the door, we believe the door has been shut at the close of each dispensation; and one dispensation cannot go in through the same door as did the previous. The covenant of Moses was the door to the dispensation of Israel, and it closed against them; and many of them, like the rich man in the parable, have been knocking ever since at that door, but without avail. And Jesus is the only door opened to this dispensation; for if any man enter by any other door the same is a thief or a robber. Jesus is the way, the truth, and the life.

SUGGESTIONS ABOUT CAMPMEETING.

BY CHARLES C. BARKER.

IN reading a report of the doings of the "Life" Brethren at the Springfield Meeting, I found my name in type as member of a Committee chosen to fix the location of our future camping ground. No action has yet been taken by this committee but I would suggest the propriety of an immediate selection, and renting of a Grove appropriately located for this purpose; because time is wanted in which to perfect and thoroughly arrange advantages and necessaries for such a meeting and many things may be attended to this fall and winter—such as the procural of the needed lumber, etc. etc., with much greater convenience and far less cost than in the hurrying, crowded, busy spring-time, and heated summer.

Where shall the campmeeting be located? That's the question—which should be decided by due consideration of the object and design of such a gathering.

The personal design of our meeting is as I understand it a congregation of as large a number of life believers as possible, for conference communion and edification—its first purpose is not missionary work—but it is arranged for a meeting of the saints—(and a most necessary arrangement is it for mutual aid and encouragement in these "perilous times" just prior to the great day of God Almighty) as an annual rendezvous for God's people—a "Feast of Tabernacles"—"whither the tribes go up."

For this purpose it should be centrally located; equally convenient to all as far as possible, and as I think of the goodly number of "Life believers," in eastern Maine, also our brethren in Massachusetts and Rhode Island, I must say, that I feel that Springfield is without doubt the best spot in sight. Its railroad connections are unsurpassed. All are familiar with its location—easy to find, possessed of a good market, etc., etc., with its many beautiful groves—there is no place that I know to be compared with it.

Besides, our camp ground should be near the dwelling place of brethren that it may be cared for; and I am confident that our Springfield brethren and sisters will gladly and heartily render much valuable personal aid in fitting up and caring for our camp ground.

Brethren of the campmeeting committee shall we not take some immediate action. Let us have a meeting at once.

HARTFORD, CONN., Oct. 10, 1870.

PERVERTING THE WORD.

PAUL foresaw distinctly what would come. He knew that "evil men and seducers would wax worse and worse, deceiving and being deceived." Hence he solemnly charged Timothy, "before God and the Lord Jesus Christ, who should judge the quick and dead at his appearing and kingdom, to preach the word. Be instant in season, and out of season, reprove, rebuke, exhort with all long suffering and doctrine, for the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine, but after their own lusts heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears, and they shall turn away their ears from the truth, and shall be turned unto fables."—2 Tim. iv. 1–4.

How literally has this prediction of the Apostle been verified. All over the world do we witness that state of confusion and darkness consequent upon men departing from the truth. The time has come when men will not endure sound doctrine. They get impatient and angry when the truth is presented to them, and so intolerant that they will not permit others to hear it. They "heap to themselves teachers after their own lusts, having itching ears." Look out upon Christendom at the present time, and behold what a vast army of religious teachers. Besides there are hundreds constantly emerging from the various theological institutions throughout the world. Paul and Timothy rightly divided the Word and taught the truth. They spoke the same things. They were harmonious in their teachings. But not so with the multitude of religious teachers who lead the people at the present time. They do not speak in harmony, nor do they agree as to what is truth. They teach for doctrines the fables of men, such as sky-kingdom, immortal soulism, purgatorial fire, and hell-torments. Some of them deny the resurrection of the dead in plain terms; others teach what is equivalent to such denial, by affirming that men get reward as soon as they die. Paul taught that the wages of sin is death; but those who pervert the truth say it is eternal torment. Paul taught that immortality was brought to light through the Gospel, and to be obtained by a patient continuance in well doing; but those who have erred concerning the truth, say that all men are by nature immortal. Paul taught that Jesus would return to this earth, at which time he would fashion our vile bodies like unto his own glorious body; modern teachers claim that we put on the heavenly likeness at death. Paul looked for the establishment of the kingdom of God upon earth; popular teachers claim that the earth will be burned up, and the kingdom of God will be in the heavens above.—Selected.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM ELD. W. S. CAMPBELL.

BR. STORRS: It is now over four months since I was taken down suddenly sick, away from home; and so sick that my life was immediately despaired of. During the long and tedious summer I was, most of the time, enduring intense suffering, which I was able to pass through by the especial grace of our heavenly Father, through Christ.

I most fully believe that my life has been continued, for some wise end, through the immediate manifestation of the Divine power, in answer to prayer; the prayers of the people of God in my behalf. I, therefore, wish, in this first article for the HERALD OF LIFE, to express my gratitude and love to God, who, by his Son Jesus Christ, can not only forgive sins on earth, but heal the sick in answer to the prayer of faith, even as in the days of old. All praise and glory to his holy name!

It was a wonder to the most skilful physicians, and to all who saw me, that I could survive. Yet, because the Lord left me not, I was not consumed.

Next, I would express my gratitude to the children of the Most High, and my love for them, who were so prompt and so earnest in urging before the throne of grace the case of a poor, prostrate fellow-laborer whose condition of suffering and sorrow was such as to deprive him of understandingly bringing his own sacrifice. Thanks to the great Head of the church, that the members of his body feel a sympathy for each other; and they will not, therefore, see the needs of one of the number and not ask mercy for him.

I need not here repeat what has been so often asserted, that I am continually grateful and happy in consideration of the munificence of the Life believers. My necessity has been great: my friends have come to my aid, and thus I was, in part, kept up.

At my daughter's I received every attention and kindness; and thus, having a place of quiet and freedom from noise and excitement, I was enabled to secure a better hope of ultimate recovery, as well as strength to endure the fiery trial. It was the last days of May that I was prostrated at Meriden. It was the last of September when we came away.

My present condition is favorable to my final restoration to health; at least, to a degree; but I shall never, probably, recover my strength.

I have the use of my arm and hand, to some extent. My limb is gaining, and I begin to move with a crutch; but make poor work of it.

I have considered the mercy of God in bringing me out of "my distresses," and that in wisdom, not in wrath, have I been afflicted, hoping that the Lord will enable me to improve the little time that remains in the advancement of the cause we so much love.

My experience during these trials has been great, and I may say, that I rejoice in the rock of my salvation.

I hope to be found in the work. I have felt, more than ever, the importance of proclaiming the whole plan of this salvation. The Life doctrines, which are so much neglected, require the energies of all; and I do long to be about the work. And now, when there are such striking fulfilments of prophecy to show the coming of the kingdom at the very door, how those who love the truth wish to speak, and be heard.

I cannot write more now, for the physical and mental fatigue make it necessary that I should rest. I send love to all who love our Lord Jesus Christ.

NEW BRITAIN, CONN., Oct. 13, 1870.

FROM JOEL A. SIMONDS.

BR. STORRS: I like the theme of your paper, and the ability with which it is conducted. But the life and immortality, brought to light through the gospel, is not all that should be taught. This is invaluable, but it is only means to an end beyond. To teach this constantly, leaving out the end for which this life is promised, will never give us a well balanced view of Christianity.

While the end is not generally taught, and sometimes denied, the subject of life assumes undue proportions. Christ was raised from the dead to sit down on David's throne. The object for which he was raised to life gives character to the whole transaction, far beyond the idea that he was raised from the dead simply to live forever. Shall we ever be talking of the life, and never of the end for which the life was given? Christ was raised from the dead that he might reign and restore all things. To restore all things is the object for which Christ received his life. The work of restitution is what gives character to his life. Shall we talk simply of his life, and not of the object for which he lives?

Christians will be raised from the dead to share with Christ, not his life, but his inheritance; to sit down with him on his throne; to have power over the nations; to judge the world; to restore the world to its former uncursed condition. It is this work that gives character to their promised life. Shall we talk about the life, and not the work of that life? As money is of value only as it is used, so it is the object of future life that determines its value.

The seed of Abraham shall bless the nation. The seed is the means, the blessing the nations beyond, is the end. It is always the end that determines the value of the means. Is it then safe to talk of the means as the final end continually, as if it were really the final end, when it is not so? Does not this give a false view of the matter?

Here is a machine of great value for a certain end. Now suppose in all the descriptions and praises of this machine, no allusion is made to the object for which it was made; could any one have a just appreciation of the value of this machine? So when the life, promised in the gospel, is described and praised, with scarcely an allusion to the object of that life, other than to be happy, how could any one become well instructed in regard to the bearing of that life upon the final object of the gospel?

I make these remarks, because I have observed that those who are guided by the general tenor of the teaching of your paper know nothing of, and many oppose the great objects of the restitution of all things, as revealed in all the Scriptures, and the things that pertain to the kingdom of God. I do not overlook the fact that there are some worthy exceptions in favor of the gospel of the kingdom, but they are almost as the drop in the bucket.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., Oct. 4, 1870.

Remarks by the Editor.

We sympathize with Br. Simonds in his remarks in the foregoing letter. It has really seemed to us, for a long time, that some of our friends, who are firm on the Life theme, are too unwilling, or are fearful as to the investigation of the subject of the employment we are to be engaged in when we have attained to the eternal life we seek. Shall we be content to remain in the dark on that point, and think of the attainment only as eternal "happiness?" Is such an idea not too much like the orthodox notion of "sitting on a cloud and singing psalms forever?" Have we not repudiated such an idea? What then shall be our employment? Did not our Lord send his disciples to preach the kingdom of God? In what does that kingdom consist? and what is its work? These are questions of vast importance. Let them be candidly and calmly investigated.

FROM W. H. H. McALLISTER.

BR. STORRS: I see by a late letter from Br. Geo. U. Lewis of Bethel, that he was disappointed in not seeing me at the Campmeeting. It would have been impossible for me to have spent much time there owing to other absences from home about the same time, especially the one to Springfield Campmeeting; but it was my intention to have spent at least one Sunday with that gathering. I was prevented, however, by the sickness of our little daughter. Br. Lewis and the other friends whom I had expected to meet must accept this as an excuse, and not attribute it to lack of desire to meet them, or lukewarmness in the cause of truth. I am happy to report, at present, the convalescence of my daughter, thanks to a kind heavenly Father. My own health continues good, and I am doing a good amount of labor, official and miscellaneous.

The HERALD comes earlier since the new volume commenced. It seems to gain activity with years. Perhaps this is due to our Assistant. Be this as it may, early or late, it is always welcome. Please accept this line in answer to the inquiry concerning my non appearance at Bethel Campmeeting.

Yours for the truth.

ST. ALBANS, VT., Oct. 1870.

FROM J. C. DAY.

BR. STORRS: The battle goes well: the truth is slowly but steadily gaining ground, and I have no fears as to the final result. I never was stronger in the entire mortality of man and his hopeless condition, without some help outside of himself, than I am now. I was at the Alton Bay camp-meeting, where I met a goodly number of Life believers. Quite a good number have lately come into the truth, under the labors of Br. H. M. Bryant, of Northwood Narrows. I found Br. Bryant to be a clear headed and liberal minded man, with a good gift to labor; a good singer, and expresses his views in a clear and easy manner. I have just learned, by a letter from Br, Bartlett, that Br. Bryant has buried one of his children since camp-meeting.

I hope Br. Bryant will be encouraged by the brethren to labor in the vineyard.

I also formed a very agreeable acquaintance with Br. and Sister Wood, of Lawrence. Br. Wood has a letter in the last paper. I had my feelings drawn toward them even before I knew they were Life believers. I was glad to see his letter in the paper. O how glad I am, my beloved Br. Storrs, that I have been led into this glorious truth of No life in the future, except we become connected with the LIFE-GIVER while in probation. O may we, as a people, become more closely connected with the LIFE-GIVER and with each other, that when he comes, who is our life, he may say, Well done.

SOUTH ASHBURNHAM, MASS., Oct. 9, 1870.

FROM LUCRETIA B. LAMB.

BR. STORRS: What a work has been ours, and is still before us to prepare: a difficult and hard work. I do not now wonder the Jews rejected Christ as the Messiah they looked for. Tradition and vain philosophy stood in the way. Their Scriptures were plain; but they had another plan, and must keep their own traditions. So we see it much the same at the present time. When driven to the wall by Scripture proof, they will end the controversy with a declaration that they cannot believe that. Others will satisfy their own minds with the plea that there is such a diversity of opinion that we cannot know what is truth; and of course it is of little consequence.

Upon us, who have received such a clear light, rests the responsibility; for to whom much is given, much is required. If we have not earth's treasures, we can recommend the truth by conversation and a corresponding example, and must not be discouraged by rebuff, as we know not which shall prosper, this or that. Above all, we can wield the weapon of prayer, which our gainsayers have no means to reach. How powerful is this weapon—how much it has availed—and does still work wonders. Will the blessed LIFE-GIVER pour on us a spirit of grace and supplication, that like Jacob we may prevail for rich blessings upon our efforts, while we labor on with untiring diligence, rejoicing that we are so richly blessed, looking for rest and reward when the Chief Shepherd shall appear, which the signs of the times plainly indicate is not far in the distance.

Yours, in the faith of No Life out of Christ.

ST. PAUL, MINN., Oct. 7, 1870.

FROM EMELINE WOOD.

BR. STORRS: I was up to see Sister Stubbs. She is delighted with the HERALD OF LIFE: thinks there is not another such an excellent paper in the world: thinks its writers must all be inspired: such food, such blessed expositions of the Word, and the precious letters. She praises the Lord for such a paper. She prays for the Life believers, and that the light may increase and the people see this blessed truth: says she never had such food before.

I went out with tracts this morning: they were gladly received. A lady asked me for some, and I gave her three or four. She thanked me so kindly, and hastened on to church. She was a German. I had a good time and felt the Lord was with me. He has said, They who water shall be watered again. Glory be to His blessed name for all His mercies. I went to see Sister Hoyt: she is poorly. I hope her sufferings will not be long: let all remember her.

I love to go out and work in the vineyard of our Father, and he throws somebody in my way. When people see me at their doors, they come out for tracts. May our Father impress the truth on their hearts. It makes me very tired in this work Sundays; but I have all the week to rest in, and feel thankful that I can do something for the blessed Saviour who has done so much for me. How can I praise the Lord enough for all his gifts? Yet I am called to pass through severe trials. I trust the Lord's arm will sustain me, and then I have nothing to fear.

I was thinking of our dear Saviour, how in his severest trial all his disciples left him. Dear brethren and sisters pray for me. I need your prayers now if ever. I feel how weak I am. I hope our Father will spare our dear Br. E. Wolcott to us. He is a precious brother.

TIMOTHY E. CORLISS, Decorah, Iowa, writes: Dear friends, I feel that I am one of Christ's little ones. Paul has directed us to exhort one another daily, and so much the more as we see the day approaching. I am strongly impressed that the day of Christ is near at hand, and we should watch and pray. First, pray for those who manage the HERALD OF LIFE, and for the preachers, that the word of the Lord may have free course: also, for the weak, and I am one of them: let us pray that they be strengthened by the Spirit of God. O how I rejoice in his faith that works by love. As some of us have been associated with those who have grown cold, let us exercise patience and kindness toward them: and lastly, let us pray for those generous souls who have given material aid to the cause. We pray they may be recompensed at the resurrection of the just; and as they have cheered the hearts of the poor, by giving carnal things, my prayer is, that the God of all grace will make all grace to abound toward them. Your brother, in hope.

ADDIE BICHFORD, Newburg, Me., writes: The reason I have not sent in my subscription before is because I have had sickness in my family, and our dear loved Mother has been taken from us by death's cruel hand. But we mourn not as those who have no hope. She was a firm Life believer: has been about five years. Oh! how much I shall miss her society and counsel from day to day. The Lord give strength, is my prayer, to comfort, and still care for my aged father, and be ready to meet dear mother when Jesus comes to release the just ones from the grave.

Your sister, in gospel hope.

LOUISA J. BEACH, New Britain, Conn., writes: You have undoubtedly heard how we have been afflicted since camp-meeting. My husband has been very sick with typhoid fever, and is still lying, unable to turn or help himself, suffering with an abscess of the worst kind—putrid, or black erysipelas. It has been very doubtful whether he would recover; but I think he is improving slowly. I was also sick and confined to my bed some time; but I am now able to care for my husband again; and only those who have been here know what a task it has been. The Lord has been good, and has given strength equal to my day, and in the darkest hour, when we were both laid by, raised up friends to care for us. I trust that this affliction may be sanctified to our good, and that we may henceforth be more fully consecrated to the Lord.

JAMES AND REBECCA HERBERT, Point Pleasant, N. J., writes: How can we do without our paper? It is blessed to us, more than ever: we have no place where we can meet with brother or sister to worship; no preaching; and its weekly visits to us are comforting. We live in a retired place, and walk every Saturday night two and a half miles to get our HERALD. Now, dear brother, we shall have to ask you to continue to send it, if you can, and we will try to pay you just as soon as we can. We will pledge ourselves to pay the subscription price of the poor (as we are among that company) for the present volume, and will try to pay the cost of the paper as we pledged to do for the last volume. Now if you can, please do so, and may God in his goodness through his dear Son bless you, and keep you in health to the coming and kingdom of Jesus.

STEWART CARLISLE, Wilmington, Del., writes: We are still contending for the faith once delivered to the saints: and when we present the simple truth, as it is in Jesus, we are very coolly told, "Oh yes, you are very smart: you know more than any one else;" then we have "itching ears," and so they go. We have great need of patience here; and in our patience must we possess our souls. Yours looking for the LIFE-GIVER.

E. M. KELLY, Burlington, Vt., sends $3, and writes: I dare not, in the sight of God, send this as an equivalent for the paper, for I consider it worth many times that sum; but being among the least of God's little ones, with limited means, it seems to be all I can spare for the present. May the good Lord richly bless those dear brethren and sisters who have given so much in time, talent, and means to sustain the paper. May they be blessed in basket and in store, and in all heavenly blessings; and may the Editor and his Assistant find the all-sustaining arm of the Lord to help them to discharge the important duties which God has called them to perform. My kind love to all the faithful ones in Christ Jesus. Your affectionate brother in the Lord, looking for Jesus.

OBITUARY.

TAGERT.—Our daughter, LOUISA F., died July 5, 1870, aged 22 years. She exhibited the religion of Christ in her life, and testified to its sublimest sentiments in death. The doctrine of the kingdom was embraced by her, and the effect of believing the gospel was evident in all her life, having opportunity of judging the effect of the immortal soul theory compared with the gospel hope of the resurrection from the dead. She admired and loved the religion of Christ, and always exhibited its sentiments and spirit, and wished that all would come to the fountain and receive the knowledge of the true God. Having a confiding and amiable nature, her generous sentiments led her to where she understood the teaching of the word, "hast borne and hast patience, and for my name's sake labored, and hast not fainted;" while all her course declared, "live in peace, and the God of love and peace shall be with you." She had the comforting influence of the Holy Spirit applying the promise to the disciples, "I will see you again, and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you." She beheld the "path of life;" that they "which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."

She is now in the grave. The thorns and briars, the painful anguish of the cross-bearing traveller, misapprehended and misunderstood, as Christ and his have always been; but, glory to God, no discomfort ever enters the tomb nor disturbs the sleeping dead. All the apostles and martyrs sleep in peace. Thus they are exalted above the reigning monarchs of earth, and shall finally obtain victory over death, where all the redeemed shall rise in triumph. "Oh death where is thy sting? Oh grave where is thy victory?"

While we feel our bereavement, we are shown, by Divine light, the joy and bliss of the social meeting when the Saviour shall gird himself and serve the guests, as an elder brother. What a scene is the present! one by one, earth's ties are broken; the mourning for the dying and the dead is continual: more than sixty every second close their eyes forever on present scenes of suffering. The thoughtful are led to exclaim by disappointment and sorrow, "I loathe it; I would not live alway." Oh how comforting the consolations of a sympathising friend; one who is touched with the feeling of our infirmities, and never turns a deaf ear to the mourner's tale; but always gives consolation to the fullest extent required by all who come to him: even so great, "though he were dead, yet shall he live." My mind is directed to that period when God shall wipe away all tears, and there shall be no more death. Oh may we all live for that period, and rejoice in anticipation continually.

SHELBURNE, VT., 1870.

KENNEDY.—Died in Hermon, Me., ABBIE G. KENNEDY, of consumption, aged 17 years, 4 months and 18 days. Thus this father and mother have been bereft of a lovely daughter; but they have laid her away not without hope. Words of comfort, from the writer, were spoken to the mourning friends.

ANOTHER:

BICKFORD.—Died in Newburg, Me., Sept. 28, 1870, SUSAN, wife of Ebenezer BICKFORD, aged 79 years. This aged mother in Israel lived and died a Christian. Sister Bickford was a firm believer in the truths taught in the HERALD OF LIFE, which had been her family paper for several years, taken by her daughter, Sister Addie Bickford. The blessed hope gave her strong consolation in the hours of her sufferings. Mother Bickford has left behind a large circle of friends to mourn her loss. Words of comfort were selected by the writer for the occasion from John xi. 25.

ALSO:

MARCHO.—Died in Bangor, Me., Oct. 4, 1870, CLARA A., daughter of Joseph and Sarah MARCHO, aged 20 years. Thus these parents have been bereft of a lovely child, and laid her away in sorrow, hoping to meet her again in joy. Words of consolation from the writer to the mourning circle from Jer. xxxi. 16.

Waiting for the Saviour's Coming.

Saviour, dear Saviour, we're waiting for thee,
As mid earthly perils we roam;
Our hearts are now sighing, while sin is so rife,
To see thee in majesty come.

O long we have waited—in darkness of night,—
And wandered in sorrow and tears;
But thou we know, soon in thy glory will come
To reign through eternity's years.

Saviour, dear Saviour, we're waiting for thee,
The signs are all passing away;
We know thou art coming, as oft thou hast said
To reign through an endless day.

We've waited here long, and watched in the sky,
For thy blessed coming from heaven,
To give us our glorious immortal reward,
And rest in thy kingdom be given.

Oh, blessed Saviour, draw near to us now,
Thy promises all may we claim,
To cheer our hearts on 'mid this sorrow and strife
Till thou come in glory to reign.

Oh hasten the time when thou shalt appear,
And we thy blest face may behold,
And sin shall be vanished, and our sadness cease
And we shall be safe in thy fold.

Rochester N. Y., Sept., 1870.

From Walter Patterson.

Being dyed in the wool with respect to the theological fables of the present day, when truth sent its arrows of conviction to my heart, it had every fortress to storm; and the bulwarks of popular theology had to fall one by one, before I could unhesitatingly accept of the Bible doctrine of life through Jesus Christ, and through him alone. Amongst the last of these bulwarks that fell, was what I conceived to be the torments of the damned as represented by the rich man in hell.

Even after I learned to look upon that passage as a parabolical representation of the condition of the Jews, after the ecclesiastical and national death of that people, until their national resurrection as typified by the vision of dry bones, I was troubled with the idea of torment being associated with hades. Had the word gehenna been used it would have seemed more natural. Hades is never associated with the idea of pain or torment in the Bible; but if cast into the fires of gehenna then the idea of torment would be more natural.

But upon reflection, I have concluded the torment the rich man endured was not a necessary element of that hell in which he lifted up his eyes. Now I see the wisdom of inspiration in the choice of the word hades. Hades is a place or state from which there is hope of deliverance through the mercy and salvation of God. The Jews died an ecclesiastical and national death; and were cast into a national grave, or hades; from this grave they have the promise of a national resurrection: see Ezk. xxxvii.

There is no hope of salvation from gehenna. Had that word been used in this parable it would have been an emblem of utter destruction. "In hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torment." It does not say he lifted up his eyes in the torments of hell. This word is never associated with torment. We can find the cause of their torment without making it a necessary ingredient of that place, or condition. First, it was internal. They were filled with the fire of jealousy at seeing the poor, despised Gentile in Abraham's bosom, or enjoying the blessings of the Abrahamic covenant, while they themselves were cast out. But these fires were not only internal, but also external, as they endured the reproach and persecutions of the wild beast governments during the supremacy of Gentile nations. "Therefore, I will be unto them as a lion; as a leopard by the way will I observe them; I will meet them as a bear that is bereaved of her whelps, and will rend the caul of their heart, and there will I devour them like a lion; the wild beast shall tear them."

But the "seven times" punishment is nearly, if not quite, filled up. Although the Jew may yet be blind to his position, and insensible of the blessings in store for him, yet "God's counsel shall stand, and he will do all his pleasure." "Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves, and shall put my Spirit in you, and ye shall live, and I will place you in your own land; then shall ye know that I the Lord have spoken it, and performed it, saith the Lord." Haste the happy day.

Christ Coming.

BY HELEN ROBERTSON.

There is a strong impression amongst the "little flock" that the Lord is coming soon. We have been looking for him now a long time, and in the lapse of that time, we have often met together, and talked the matter over, and looked at it from all the different stand points, and prayed about it, and the burden of our prayer has been, with earnest longings, Come and reign, Jesus on thy throne. Then the question is, Have we any more reason now to expect it soon than we ever had?

The student of prophecy, and those who are watching the signs of the times well know that the redemption is drawing nigh. We don't need to go over the events. The secular papers bring us daily tidings, and seem to say, Let him that readeth understand. It seems as if every honest hearted student of the word of God must know our whereabouts; and now seems the time for heart searchings, honest searchings of self, bringing everything to the light, having no part dark; also for admonishing one another, and so much the more as we see the day approaching.

Little flock: we are not in darkness. That day is not coming on us as a thief! We are the children of light, the children of the day: therefore let us not sleep as do others. There is a note of warning here. What is it? We are not to do "as do others." What are others doing? They are asleep; and if not sound asleep, are dreaming. That is to say, so far as pertains to the Lord's coming. What are we to do? We are to have our lamps trimmed and burning, and we ourselves like unto men that wait for their Lord. We are to be in a waiting position, so when he comes we can joyfully say, "Lo, this is our God, we have waited for him; our King, he will save us."

Brethren and sisters; it is no time now for half-hearted workers. We cannot serve God and mammon. There is no safety only by being wholly in Christ, abiding in him in such a manner that we are bringing forth good fruit. He says, himself, "Herein is my Father glorified that ye bear much fruit, so shall ye be my disciples." And, "By their fruits ye shall know them." "Not every one that says Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven."

We are coming near to the hour of decision, when it will be known who are the Lord's and who are not. It will be a great thing to be chosen of him at last; to have him say, "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom." That kingdom which is incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved for you, who are kept by the power of God.

But we notice it is not every one that says, Lord, Lord, that can enter in; and we ask, Who then? John says, "We know that when he shall appear we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." Are our characters to be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye? We don't understand it so. "Every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself even as he is pure," says John. The gospel has called us to liberty, only we are not to use that liberty for an occasion to the flesh. It is by grace we are saved, through faith; not because of our own good works. Still whenever we get this precious hope in us of seeing Jesus, we want to be like him. Yes, just as near like him as we can be. We hunger and thirst after righteousness, and cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit.

The time will come, and who knows how soon? when it will be said, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still: and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still. And behold I come quickly; and my reward is with me, to give every man according as his work shall be."

The above is very searching, very decided; but it is God's word, and we say, Amen. Even so, come Lord Jesus. Come quickly.

Paul counted all things but loss and refuse, that he might win Christ, and be found in Him, not having mine own righteousness. Like Paul, let us keep under our bodies and bring them into subjection, counting all things loss, to win Christ. Still, like him entirely rejecting self-righteousness. "Being justified by faith, we have peace with God, through our Lord Jesus Christ; by whom also, we have access by faith into this grace, wherein we stand and rejoice in hope of the glory of God."

From M. M. Eastman.

Br. Storrs: I send you pay for the Herald of Life. I should lose a rich feast every week should I be deprived of it. It grows better and better. I wish more of our good brethren could read it; if they could, I am sure they would not tell so much about this common salvation: bringing all mankind to life from the dead to be burnt up. I think they ought to give it another name than "salvation, to be saved from a worse condition." But they are honest, and see it in that way. It is hard for them to see that the wicked have any punishment unless they die twice; not satisfied with the penalty God gave, "In the day thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die;" and, "the wages of sin is death." An awful punishment! But, "the gift of God is eternal life." Why can't they see it is a punishment to be deprived of life—to "remain in the congregation of the dead." But this question ought not to divide God's dear children.

We had a great and good campmeeting at Alton Bay. Prof. Lummis was there all the week, and said it seemed to him like a Methodist campmeeting thirty years ago. He said, he believed the Lord was coming very soon to usher in the Millennium. He believes in a future age about as you do. But he thinks there is something about us that is conscious after death; but like our sleep. Then there is not much to it, said I. "No, there is not," said he. He heard Br. Couch preach upon Dan. xi., bringing us down through that chain of prophecy to the events now transpiring, filling up the last remnant with the time of trouble coming on apace, when Michael (Dan. 12) is going to stand up to deliver his people, every one that shall be found written in the book; and he said, he believed that was a clear and correct explanation of that prophecy. Then said I, you must think the Lord will very soon come. "I do," said he. Would that he might sound the alarm to earth's inhabitants. But here is the trouble; it is an unpopular truth!

The burthen of the preaching there, this year, was, the present signs of the times, and the Lord must come soon; and for entire giving up, and complete preparation to meet him. It was good to be there.

Could we in 1844 have had this move among the nations, with the Pope being made infallible, and the apostate church going down like a mighty millstone; crime and murders so multiplied; iniquity abounding, and the love of many waxing cold, ministers crying peace and safety, smiting their fellow servants, eating and drinking with the drunken, and women adorning themselves in all the vain, foolish and ridiculous fashions of this year; such sea and waves roaring as we had in 1868 and 1869, those awful tidal waves—and now men's hearts failing them for fear, etc., the mighty men waking up, and preparing for God's war, and that time of trouble spoken of by Daniel the prophet; knowledge increasing at a wonderful rate, and a multitude of other signs the Master gave us: there would have been but few houses or hearts closed against this message.

But the faith of God's people must be tried, and show which we love best; the things of this world or the kingdom of our Lord and his Christ. We did not think in '44 we could get into the kingdom with all our pride and conformity to this world and desire to gain its honors, applause, or riches; and we cut loose from it all, then, and stood out a waiting bride for her Lord; and we may be sure we shall never get in any cheaper; it will take all we have: all pride, self-will, and everything unlike the divine pattern set us by the Master.

There is a great work among Adventists to secure that spotless robe, or we shall be like the man found at the marriage supper without the wedding garment on. We are too near the consummation of this blessed and glorious hope to give it up now.

It is a great prize we started after—Immortality, and a home in Paradise restored; where the inhabitants will never say, I am sick. No weary wasting of the frame away, or hearts torn with anguish over the sick and dying couch of loved ones. Oh blessed day: haste thy dawning. Come Lord Jesus, and come quickly.

Landaff, N. H. Sept. 28, 1870.

The Chaotic Condition of Europe: What Does it Portend?

Europe at present is like a ship at sea in a terrific storm, when all on board are at their wits' end to know how to save themselves. She is rocking and surging on the waves of war and revolution. The old statesmen who have had the helm in hand have become unsteady and obstinate, not willing to throw overboard the dead weight of the past, and no bolder and more capable men have yet appeared to lighten and guide the ship. The monarchs and aristocracies are intent upon crushing, or, at least, checking the revolution. They have but one thought—to save their crowns and privileges. To do this they would rather have the war continued and all the Continent in a blaze than yield to the revolution. The sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of lives, or millions even, and the accumulation of stupendous debts, weigh as nothing in the scales against their prerogatives. On the other hand the sentiments of liberty, republicanism, progress and emancipation from despotic rule are deep-seated in the hearts of the people. These are upheaving society everywhere like a mighty earthquake. But the people lack organization and able leaders. While they are the real and great power they have been so long under the heel of monarchical and aristocratic rule that they hardly know how to use their strength. Still, with all the disadvantages they labor under, and with all the organized power of the old rulers and the enormous military forces under their control, the people are making the great efforts toward self-government. It is this conflict between the privileged and the masses—between the ideas of the past and the present—that is now raging in Europe and that has brought about the chaotic state of things there.

This struggle is seen very prominently in the relentless war which the Prussian monarchy is making upon the republic of France. Without avowing it, and, indeed, while it is denied by Count Bismarck, there is no doubt that the chief object of the war now on the part of Prussia is to squelch the republic—to strangle it in its infancy—lest republican ideas should spread in Germany and over Europe. This is natural; just as much so as for a man to exert all his efforts to save his property when threatened. The monarchs and aristocracies have regarded the people as their heritage and government over them as their right. Consequently there is nothing they will leave undone to maintain their privileges. They know very well that a republic in France is a standing menace to them and their pretensions. They saw the effect in 1840 and 1848 of revolution in France. From the central position of that country, as well as from the electric force of revolutionary ideas that rise there, the whole Continent becomes agitated. It has always been, and still is, the focus of revolutionary and republican contagion in Europe. Is it not natural, then, for King William of Prussia to wage war against the French republic in the interest of himself and family and for his brother monarchs? Is not this a sufficient reason why the other crowned heads, and why Queen Victoria and the British aristocracy, stand aloof and do not attempt to stop the war?

Another evidence of this conflict of ideas and the chaos into which Europe is thrown is the activity of monarchial and imperialist agents. Almost all the news received in America and spread over Europe is either given out or concocted by these agents with a coloring to suit their purposes. At one time we hear of dreadful doings in Paris and other parts of France by the "reds" and disorganizers, and this in the face of the fact that the French people are acting with great unity to preserve internal order while they are heroically fighting the foreign invader. The object of such pretended news is apparent. It is to operate on the public sentiment of the world, to create alarm of the republic, and to make people believe order can only be maintained under monarchical government. Now we have on one day a pretended imperialist manifesto of Napoleon, emanating from an imperialist organ established in London, and on the next day a report that this is bogus. But whether bogus or not it shows the active agency of parties in Europe to damage and check republicanism, to sustain monarchy and to make the present confusion more confounded. And it is well to note that the British capital, more than any other place, is the hotbed of this spurious news and these anti-republican movements.

But what does this chaotic state of things portend? What is to come out of it? From present appearances all Europe, and may be a part of Asia and Africa, is going to be involved in war and revolution. Even those monarchs not engaged in war may resort to it to avert revolution at home and to give another direction to the public mind. This, however, may prove in the end a two-edged sword. The people are now too enlightened, probably, to be deceived by that, and the revolution the rulers would avert by such means may lead to it. Then there are national and territorial questions springing up, and questions of race and religion, as well as the adjustment of the balance of power, which add to the complications and make the future very uncertain. Russia is moving for some object, and, probably, for accomplishing her long desired purpose in the East. England is trembling and the prey of uncertainty. Austria is anxiously watching events, and doubtful what course to take. Italy has made great strides and obtained a great and positive result in taking Rome and uniting all the Italians, but she is in the throes of revolution and fast tending to a republic. Chaos reigns supreme. No one can say how long the struggle will last, or what dreadful scenes Europe has to pass through.

We give the foregoing extract from a New York daily, of ten days ago, as expressing our view of the existing state of Europe. Let it be pondered well, and see if events do not prove that Nebuchadnezzar's "Image" is beginning to "break in pieces."

European War.

The great war in Europe is now the grand topic in all circles. It has been a grand surprise to all the world—not only in its advent, but in the rapidity, the awfulness and decisiveness of detail. A glance at the position when the fighting commenced would never have predicted such a terrible defeat of Napoleon in such a short time. The French had been long recognized as a martial nation, and had grown very confident and apparently powerful through the success of their arms. Their army was not lacking in numbers, and many of the soldiers were veterans. In arms and weapons of destruction, both offensive and defensive, they were supposed to excel the world. They were upon their own soil, and led by a Napoleon, who was generally supposed to be the shrewdest man in existence; and furthermore, the French ardor was roused to its highest pitch. We cannot believe that the superiority of the Prussian soldier has accomplished it all. To us there is but one plausible solution of the mystery—the hand of God. Viewing the matter thus, we venture no prediction as to what complications may yet arise, or what further downfall may result from this bloody strife; for "who knoweth the mind of the Lord." The great panorama of the Apocalypse is apparently unfolding its last scenes.—The Nazarene.

We have heard it said that one of the greatest absurdities is a Minister of the Gospel, in the enjoyment of a salary up in the thousands and enjoying the comforts and luxuries of life, preaching self-denial to poor folks.

Children's Department.

The Weeds in Augusta's Garden.

Augusta was an only child, for her two brothers had lately died of scarlet fever, which had raged for a number of weeks in the town of Bingen. She was a beautiful little girl, had as bright eyes as ever you saw, a quick mind, and was nearly always lively and cheerful. I do not wonder that she was very much praised by everybody, for she behaved very well when she was in the company of others, and was always respectful to her parents and older persons.

Augusta's father was an officer in the army, and was compelled to be from home a great deal of his time. Her mother was very sickly; and owing to these two causes, Augusta was very much neglected. Her parents did not know that she was beginning to be troubled with certain bad qualities which would seriously affect her in later life, for they thought that it would be well nigh impossible that their well-behaved, cheerful, and respectful Augusta could ever be anything else than what she then was.

I must tell you about a particular fault which now began to spoil Augusta in the sight of others. She had been so highly complimented by everybody who knew her, and so many things were said even to her face in her praise, that she became vain and proud. She would often stand ten minutes at a time before the looking-glass and admire her beauty, and when she went along the street, she would compare her clothes with those of other children, and would always conclude that she was the finest-looking girl in the whole town. In due time her mother noticed that this fault grew upon her, and she studied a great many means to cure her of it. She knew that Augusta was very fond of hearing her relate stories; and after praying that she might be directed to some special means for curing her of her increasing fault, she remembered a circumstance that had taken place in her own life, and which seemed especially appropriate to Augusta's case.

One afternoon, Augusta went up on the hill, back of Bingen, to take a look at the beautiful country through which the Rhine flows. She saw a castle here and there, and the boats going up and down the Rhine, and the little island in the river where Bishop Hatto's old tower stands, and she admired all that she saw. But she thought to herself: "Of all the girls in Bingen, I think I have the nicest clothes, and I that think people have said most things in my praise." These and a great many similar thoughts passed through her mind as she took the path leading through the vineyards toward her home. When she reached it, she found her mother sitting out in the little summer-house, and she had no sooner taken her seat than she asked her mother to tell her a story about the Rhine, or about anything that she liked.

This was now a favorable opportunity for Augusta's mother to teach the lesson for which she had been waiting. So she said to her: "Now, if I tell you a story, will you try to remember it?"

"Yes, mother," she replied.

"Well, will you also try to see if the story fits you?"

"Oh! yes, mother," replied Augusta.

"Now, if the story fits you, will you try to do better afterward?"

"Yes, I will, mother."

So Augusta's mother related the following circumstance, with which she had herself been connected when she was quite young:

"When I was nine years old," said Augusta's mother, "I went to visit an uncle who lived in the beautiful city of Coblence, on the Rhine, where I stayed six or seven weeks. On leaving, he gave me twenty or thirty different kinds of flowers, and packed them all in a large basket, and brought them down to the Rhine boat as I was going to start for home. When I reached home, one of the first things that I did was to plant them in the garden, and I took great pains with them. There was one difficulty which I met with, however, and it seemed a very strange thing to me that I could not get clear of it. I found that the weeds grew faster among my flowers than they did in any other part of the garden, and though I tried in every way to learn the cause of it, I could not do it for some time. So I finally went to old Jonas, who took care of my father's large garden, and I told him that my flowers were very beautiful, but that the weeds grew so fast among them that I could not make much progress. Old Jonas smiled, and looked just as if he knew the cause of it. So he said: "Come, let us look at the flowers."

"So I went with him, and we saw the weeds which had grown at an enormous rate since the shower of three days before.

"Well," said he, "let me see what you will do with the weeds."

"So I immediately took out of my pocket my little knife, and cut off three or four weeds even with the ground. That made old Jonas laugh aloud, and I must confess that I was a little provoked at his doing it.

"What is the matter with you, Uncle Jonas?" said I. "What makes you laugh when I cut down the weeds?"

"Oh!" said he, "you do not know how to treat the weeds, or they would not trouble you so much?"

"Well, but how do you treat your weeds, Uncle Jonas? What can be better than a knife?"

"Well, let me see what I can do with them."

"So old Jonas then put his hand around the top of several weeds, and stuck his fingers a little way into the ground under them, and pulled the weeds up. They had long roots, and I was surprised to see that he should pull them up instead of cutting them off. Then said the old man:

"'If you want to destroy all the weeds among your flowers, you must pull them all up by the roots, and never think of cutting them off even with the ground. Just as long as the root stays in the ground a new top will come to it, and so the weed won't be killed at all, but will grow every time it gets a new shower.'

"Now, all this was new to me, for I had never thought that there could be a better way of getting free of the weeds than to cut them off. After that I tried old Jonas's remedy for getting rid of the weeds in my garden, and I never found that one troubled me again after I had pulled it up by the roots."

While Augusta's mother was relating this circumstance, she saw that her daughter was affected by it. And, indeed, she saw the tears beginning to flow down Augusta's cheeks. She pressed her to her heart, and said to her:

"Now, my dear child, you have been trying to get clear of your vanity by cutting the weeds off at the top of the ground. The only way to get clear of it, and all the weeds that grow in your heart, is to go to your Heavenly Father, and ask him for a new heart. He will destroy the weeds, and the flowers which he plants there will have nothing to disturb their growth, but will become more beautiful and fragrant all the time."

Now, if little Augusta had been like some children, this story would have produced only a slight impression upon her. But she loved her mother, and she showed her love by following her advice; and it could ever after be said of her vanity, as well as of several other bad qualities that had begun to manifest themselves, that they had been pulled up by the roots.—Sel.

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should allow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is of desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures." The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

SIN: HEAVEN AND HELL:

OR, POPULAR THEOLOGY TESTED.

BY BENJAMIN CATLEY.

IF there be a heaven, what and where is it? If there be a hell, what and where is it? and how must I shun the one, and obtain the other? I think even the most skeptical in religious belief will admit that these are pertinent questions, on which the mind should be well satisfied. Man is here, and as taught by modern theologists, he must be saved or he must be damned. To be saved, I suppose implies heaven and eternal happiness. But to be damned, what does it imply? I must have clear proof from the Holy Book e'er I can say, fire and brimstone, and tormenting devils in liquid fire. God is love.

I make no assertions. I am simply inquiring after truth; truth that will stand in death's dark hour, when weeping friends are lingering by, and loving children waiting for a long and last farewell. To have some solid ground on which to rest our hopes in such a crisis, is surely necessary, and I therefore hope that whoever may be my instructor will do so in the spirit of love, knowing that if Christ died for the ungodly, it was love constrained him so to do.

Now, sir, if I am to be damned it must be in consequence of sin; but what is sin? and in order that I may be clearly understood on this important matter, I answer my view is, that sin is a conscious disobedience of a known law, or known laws against the will of God. But sin, as entailing the consequences as taught by modern revivalists, strikes the reflective mind with awe, and the feelings of common humanity with dread. What wonder if we inquire, whence was such a foul blot begotten, or when and where did it first begin?

Now, sir, I am aware that the popular notion is that sin originated in heaven, the dwelling place of the Most High, by his satanic majesty, the devil. Don't brand me as an infidel, when I say, I don't believe it; not a word of it. Deem me not an atheist, nor consign me with the damned; but love me as a brother should; and pray that I may heaven gain; remembering that Christ hath died for every erring, sinful man, when again my repetition is, I don't believe it. No, sir, I don't believe it. But I'll give you reason why I don't; then if I am wrong let some pastor of souls or bishop of flocks, who travails as in birth by earnest prayers, and laborious instruction to teach erring men the truths of the Bible and the way to salvation, at least make some effort to set an erring mortal right, and guide him in the path of truth.

First: It is contrary to reason and common sense; for where eternal happiness reigns, sin and consequent misery cannot come.

Secondly: If sin originated in heaven, and its consequences were so devastating, so depopulating and cruel, what is the hope of those who die in Christ, and are looking forward to a resurrection from the dead, and an eternal happiness in heaven worth? What assurance have they, that some of the warriors of past or modern days, who have been whitewashed by priestly absolution, and dispatched on angel's wing past purgatory to the highest offices in heaven, may not engender the spirit of Napoleon, assume the title of commander devil, and embroil the hosts of glory in another bloody war? If there was war in heaven when the devil fell from his holy position, and he with all his host were expelled, what evidence is there that another, equally depopulating in its inhabitants and destructive in its results, may not occur again?

Now, sir: If there was, or is, or may yet, at some future time, be sin in heaven, then it cannot be a place of eternal security, for that which is eternal can have neither beginning or end. Is there security and happiness when the inhabitants are embroiled in war? I leave the answer to the witnesses of the late wicked rebellion. Sin and happiness are antagonistic principles and cannot possibly dwell in harmony; and I presume, however we may differ on other points, we shall at least agree in this one.

Do we need proof of the influence of sin? Read the history of the present devastating and unholy Franco-Prussian war. The fearful destruction of property, and the insatiate thirst for power, territory and blood, are only the present evils of this fearful slaughter; close on its heels will follow the wailing cry of wives for murdered husbands, of mothers for slaughtered sons, and of children for fathers slain! But who can enumerate the dire misery brought upon two great nations by the ambition of the proud and vanquished, vain and cowardly despot, Napoleon? The bread-winners of thousands of orphans lay ghastly in death; the smile of many a mother's loved and hopeful son, lays slain in his blood, while thousands of young and loving wives have lost their children's counsellor and their own support. But space would fail to tell, what time alone reveals, the universal evils of contending foes.

How can I then suppose that sin, that hydra-headed monster, sin, the essence of misery, the curse of humanity, and the cause of death, should or could have its origin in heaven? Why, if such a heaven means happiness, then there is no eternal happiness; how can there be? Echo answers, How?

We will just briefly notice our objections to the revival, or orthodox damnation. I have laid before me the Bible, and in addition to our ideas that love is the natural affection of mankind, generally, one toward another, I have the unqualified assertion in 1 John iv. 8, that God is love. Henry says, that his nature and essence are love; his will and works are primarily love; in fact the chapter is full of love; and who can fail to see the force of reason and the power of love embodied in the first verse of that chapter: Beloved, believe not every spirit; but try the spirits whether they be of God. And Paul, in his letter to the Thessalonians is full of the same spirit of love, and speaks with equally clear and forcible language: Prove all things; hold fast that which is good. Here, then, we have two direct appeals to our reason from letters that are full of holy adoration to God, and love to man. Yet each forcibly enjoins the duty of self and unbiased investigation; exacts only an obedience to that which reason dictates to be true. On this ground we take our stand, guided by holy writ, and in the comparative character of the (God of Love) of the Bible, and the descriptive, revengeful character of the God of modern revivalists. We candidly confess, we see no analogy; while we can see one to be a loving, just, and holy Being, guiding the worlds in their motions, and ruling in love, we cannot find a trace of the other, except apart from the Bible.

I am afraid I shall occupy too much space, or much more might be said. In conclusion allow me to state, any means proposed to punish which is inadequate to the sin, my reason will reject. The terrors of a brimstone hell, and the liquid fire of dark damnation, will be equally unavailing to deter me from exposing to ridicule the author of such a place. If I must be saved, which I hope to be, it will be by the power of love and the light of reason; and reason revolts at such a hell; and humanity shudders at the thought of such a place as some men tell us God has made for the wicked.

Eternal justice, sons of God! tell me, if ye can tell,
What there I saw, what then I heard. Wide was the place,
And deep as wide, and ruinous as deep;
Beneath I saw a lake of burning fire, with tempest tossed
Perpetually; and still the waves of fiery darkness 'gainst
The rocks of dark damnation broke, and music made
Of melancholy sorts; and overhead, and all around,
Wind warred with wind, storm howled to storm, and lightning,
Forked lightning crossed; and thunder answered thunder,
Muttering sounds of sullen wrath; and as far as sight could
Pierce, or down descend in caves of hopeless depth, through
All that dungeon of unfading fire, I saw most miserable
Beings walk, burning continually, yet unconsumed;
Forever wasting, yet enduring still; dying perpetually,
Yet never dead; some wandered lonely in the desert flames,
And some in full encounter met, with curses
Loud and blasphemies, that made the cheek of darkness pale;
And as they fought, and cursed and gnashed their teeth, and wished to die,
Their hollow eyes did utter streams of wo, and to their
Thirsty lips presented frequent cups of burning gall.
There were groans that ended not, and sighs that always Sighed, a tear that ever wept and ever feel, but Not in mercy's sight; and as I listened I heard these Beings curse Almighty God, and curse the Lamb,
And curse the earth, the resurrection morn, and seek
And ever vainly seek for utter death, and to their Everlasting anguish, still the thunders from above
Responding spoke these words, which through all the Caverns of perdition, forlornly echoing fell on every Ear, Ye knew your duty and ye did it not.

If you will allow me space, I perhaps may at some future time make a few remarks in connection with such a hell as here described.

Yours, respectfully.

PITTSBURG, PA., Oct., 1870.

Remark by the Editor.

The author of the foregoing article was once a Methodist Preacher in England. He accompanied the article with the following note:

Herein contained are some of my theological views. If you deem them worthy of circulation, well. If not, I hold them till the light of reason shall dispel them. I have arrived at the conclusions by laborious investigation, and am yet, if in error, willing to be set right. In fact, it's by publishing each other's ideas, and subjecting them to the light of investigation that we arrive at the truth.

THE LAYMAN AND THE MINISTER. IMMORTALITY.

NEWARK, N. J., Oct. 13, 1870.

BR. STORRS: I herewith send you for publication in the HERALD OF LIFE the following correspondence between myself and Rev. R. Stainton of Sheffield, England, hoping that it may be interesting to Life believers, and as a continuance of my former correspondence, in which the above name has figured.

THOS. JOHNSON.

NEWARK, 1st Aug., 1870.

REV. MR. STAINTON: Dear Sir: My sister in her letters to me has frequently mentioned your name, and spoken of your kind interest in my welfare, and has several times promised me that you would write me concerning the peculiar views which I hold, and which are directly opposed to those which I once believed, and which she and you still believe and teach.

I have been many months looking for your communication; for sister has told me that she had shown you my letters. In her last, received a few days ago, she mentions your having said, a few weeks since, "I wish your brother would write me first and ask me any thing; then I should know better what to write him, and would do so at once." Whatever I may ask you it will be with a sincere desire to elicit or bring out the truth of the Scriptures on any subject that may come under consideration; believing that I am accountable only to God for my individual actions; for God shall bring every work into judgment, with every secret thing, whether it be good, or whether it be evil.—Eccl. xii. 14; and I am content to abide the result, knowing that the "God of all the earth will do right."

On the question, then, of man's nature and destiny, I will ask you something. Do the Scriptures teach that the man, whom God made out of the dust of the earth, had an additional entity given to him called an immortal soul? If so, where is it so recorded in the Bible? I should like you to give me the chapter and verse. "Never dying soul" is another term in very frequent use; but I don't know where to find it in the Scriptures. Can you inform me? "The death that never dies" is a term in constant use in the Methodist and other societies; will you also give me the Scripture references to such an expression; for I have learned from the Bible that man is mortal; "dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return:" the same identical "thou," which ate of the forbidden fruit and afterward in fear hid himself until the dreadful Where art thou? called him forth to receive his sentence. "Hast thou eaten of the tree, whereof I commanded thee not to eat?" After which interrogations, answered in the affirmative by the same personal pronoun thou, the threatened punishment, of Gen. ii. 17, was immediately commenced which should terminate eventually in death, "for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return."

It seems to me this punishment directed and given by God would be very likely to fall on the intelligent and self-condemned representative of our race, and not merely upon his body, as the common orthodoxy maintains, who hold to the separate entity, called the soul; which is represented as living on after the body is dead. I want to find out all about this immortal soul, and if the Scriptures say any thing about it, won't you be good enough to give me chapter and verse? This question first settled, others will follow in their natural course; but for the time being, I prefer that we should deal with one question at once. I hope you will fairly, truthfully, and candidly answer these interrogations in the light of the Scriptures of truth, and as their importance demands.

Yours, in hope of eternal life,

T. JOHNSON.

MR. STAINTON'S RESPONSE.

SHEFFIELD, 26th Sept., 1870.

MR. JOHNSON: Dear Sir: Want of time has prevented me answering yours of the 1st August; and it is best to be frank at the outset by saying, that my time is far too much taken up to admit of me entering into a long controversy on the topics suggested in yours.

Allow me to say, however, in reply to your questions about the soul. I think you are wrong in going to the Bible for the proof of its being. The Bible is not revealed to prove a God or a soul. The natural world proves the former, Psa. xix.; and the consciousness of man proves the latter. But still I think the very earliest mention of man in the Bible indicates his immortality: "Let us make man in our own likeness."—Gen. i. 26. What is the divine likeness? Is it material and mortal? Surely not, but spiritual and immortal. You have a mind. Now what is mind? Not matter. What is matter? Never mind. What decays and dies? Material substances; such is your body. Mind not being matter cannot corrupt or decay, and is immortal. Trusting that this will make it plain that you have an immortal nature, and that you may see this to be in harmony with the first mention of man in the Bible as above, and wishing you every blessing for both worlds,

I am, very truly, yours,

R. STAINTON.

REJOINDER BY T. JOHNSON.

NEWARK, N. J., Oct. 13, 1870.

REV. R. STAINTON: Dear Sir: Yours of Sept. 26 was received on the 11th inst., in answer to mine of 1st August. I have been long waiting for it, and must say, I am disappointed at its shortness, and altogether unsatisfactory character. I asked you for the Bible teachings on certain plain questions touching the nature and destiny of man; and especially regarding his "immortal soul," and you answer me by saying, "I think you are wrong in going to the Bible for the proof of its being. The Bible is not revealed to prove a God, or a soul. The natural world proves the former, and the consciousness of man proves the latter."

I have read your letter over several times, and the above are your exact words. Shall I take this as a candid confession on your part, that the Bible nowhere teaches the doctrine? for such is the natural impression of your words thus far; and in this conclusion, I can heartily agree with you; but such is not your conclusion, as the balance of your letter shows; for you immediately refer me to the earliest mention of man in the Bible as indicating his immortality: Gen. i. 26.

Is there not some inconsistency here? I am wrong in going to the Bible for proof of the immortal soul's existence; and yet, in the very next sentence, you refer me to Gen. i. 26, as indicating man's immortality! Did you not say, just now, that the Bible is not revealed to prove a soul? the consciousness of man proves it? Why then this reference? If you purpose to prove man's immortality outside the Scriptures, you have a very difficult task to perform, and in doing so, you will not in any wise answer the plain question I propounded to you, "Do the Scriptures teach that the man whom God made out of the dust of the earth had an additional entity given to him, called an immortal soul?"

Your quotation of Gen. i. 26, "Let us make man in our own likeness," is incorrect, as you will see on reference. You ask, "What is the Divine likeness? Is it material and mortal? Surely not, but spiritual and immortal." Granted, but does it necessarily follow that man also is immortal? See 1 Tim. vi. 16, and learn that God only hath immortality. As well might you say that man was omnipotent, or omniscient, because those are the glorious attributes of the Almighty, and man was made after his likeness, and it would be equally as just in you as to claim for him unconditionally that immortality which he can only obtain by patient continuance in well doing. What is the Scripture view of the image? I refer you to Col. iii. 10: "Renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him."

Your next argument in the form of question and answer: "Now what is mind? Not matter. What is matter? Never mind. What decays and dies? Material substances, such is your body. Mind not being matter cannot corrupt or decay, and is immortal." I fail to see any weight in the foregoing argument, for we constantly see instances of the failure of mind as well as body. Memory is a faculty of the mind. Does not that decay? I can cite you to a sad instance of that in my poor dear mother, whom I saw two years ago after an absence of twenty years, and so impaired is her mind that for many years she has not been able to write me a letter; and yet you tell me that "mind not being matter cannot corrupt or decay."

I shall, until convinced to the contrary, believe that man as a whole is perishing or going out of existence; but I have many precious promises, of holy Writ, assuring me that I shall not perish eternally; for by faith in Christ I expect a resurrection at the last day; when, for the first time, I shall put on immortality and reign in life through Jesus Christ our Lord.

It seems to me that this glorious truth of Life only in Christ, to perishing men and women, is not preached with the clearness that it ought to be, in consequence of our misapprehension of our own nature; and it is of importance to me, at least, that I should know myself; and thus become acquainted with the love of God, who gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him might not perish, but have everlasting, or immortal life.

Truly yours, T. JOHNSON.

A REAL Christian loves close, pointed, searching preaching, and seeks not the ministry of those who speak with enticing words of man's wisdom.

THAT THRONE.

BY M. L. F.

IN the Scriptures, several thrones are spoken of. There is the throne of majesty, or God's great throne of universal sovereignty and precedency which He exercises over all the universe. There is, again, the throne of Grace, where we may obtain mercy, and find grace to help in time of need. There is also the throne of glory, which is the ultimate of another throne called the throne of David, about which we have somewhat to say. Before the establishment of the Davidic throne the Israelites were ruled by judges, with the exception of the reign of Saul. When Moses was appointed and commissioned as their leader, it was with the design that he should lead them to victory over all their enemies. But the great underlying principle of success with them against their enemies was, obedience; and it would seem from their history that this they lacked. Moses the prophet said, "And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe to do all his commandments, which I command thee this day: that the Lord thy God will set thee on high above all the nations of the earth." One of the commands given, and indeed which seems to be the mainspring of all the rest, is, "Sanctify yourselves, therefore, and be ye holy, for I am holy." This command, together with the promise of exaltation above all the nations of the earth, evidently shows us the design or intention of the great Jewish law.

First, the people were to become holy—righteous—by implicitly obeying all the commands given, which would rid them of all idolatry, and other evils which infected them, rendering them pure in the sight of their God.

Secondly, having become holy they were to go forth and conquer all their enemies, and not stop till all the unholy or impious nations of the earth were vanquished, and only one song went up from the groaning earth, viz., Great is the Lord our God, for he hath conquered all His foes. The Israelites understanding this, and knowing of their failure to become what they should be, and supposing their want of success to be in consequence of their judges, desired a king; and one was granted; but still no more success than before. He was removed and another placed on the throne, who seemed to be zealous for God; but, alas, he too met with difficulties in trying to bring his people to the proper standard of obedience, as well as himself breaking two of the commands of the decalogue.

After the death of this king, others succeeded to the same throne, known now as the "Throne of David." Some of the kings were good, and some decidedly bad kings; and part of the time Israel met with success, and then again with adverses, until God declared by his prophet the very emphatic prophecy, "Therefore, thus saith the Lord God, Because ye have made your iniquity to be remembered in that your transgressions are discovered, ye shall be taken with the hand, and thou profane wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come when iniquity shall have an end. Thus saith the Lord God, remove the diadem, and take off the crown: this shall not be the same: exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him."

Why is all this? Because this people would not hearken unto God; hence their calamity. Said David in his distress and perplexity, "O that my people had hearkened unto me, and Israel had walked in my ways! I should soon have subdued their enemies, and turned my hand against their adversaries. The haters of the Lord should have submitted themselves unto him." Does not this plainly teach us the intention of the law, "Be ye holy?"

Without arguing the point, we will affirm what seems to be admitted by all, viz., that the law was imperfect and needed a "better covenant." The new covenant was brought in and fully ratified; so we will not waste time in discussing that, but simply state the fact that the bringing in of the new covenant did not alter the law, "Be ye holy;" but only did away with the works of the law requisite to bring about that holiness.

Now let us take up the thread of the kingdom once more. The prophet declared, "It shall be no more till he come whose right it is, and I will give it him." Now let us introduce an angel's testimony: "And behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name JESUS. He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever." This is evidence which cannot be impeached. It is a fact that the Son, Jesus, was born, and he is the man upon whom the kingdom or throne of David is to devolve. But before that event—the re-establishment of the throne of David—there is work to be done, a peculiar, holy people to be brought out through him; for he said, he came to "fulfil the law;" and the law required such a people; and the law after requiring such a people, promised them victory over all their enemies.

In the saying of our Lord, "Think not that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets: I am not come to destroy but to fulfil," I think we shall find all necessary information in regard to his specific work.

First, He says, I am not come to destroy the law, but to fulfil it. Why did he come to fulfil the law? Simply because the law was not able to fulfil itself, being destitute of "life." But in the expression, "fulfil," are we to understand that he came to abrogate the law? Not at all: for he immediately adds, "Not one jot or tittle shall pass from the law, till all be fulfilled." This also applies to the prophets, for those prophecies which are given without a condition are also incapable of fulfilling themselves. Therefore we conclude that Jesus the King, to whom the throne of David falls, and who has been Divinely anointed to reign till all his enemies are put under his feet, and fulfil the prophet's declarations by subjugating the nations to himself, will bring out to himself a peculiar people—holy and righteous—and fulfil the design of Moses in bringing that people to be exalted above all the nations of the earth.

The better covenant, under the heavenly reign of Jesus, is to continue until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled, in order to secure the necessary obedience of the elect, and also their resuscitation; or, in other words, Jesus is to reign till the time appointed of the Father, when he shall confer upon him the supreme authority and royalty of David's throne; when he shall then descend from his heavenly position, and at the head of his royal and loyal subjects, he shall go forth to fulfil the designs of the great Jewish law, or carry into effect the original design of God, to wit, the clearance of the earth of all ungodly and impious nations.

At that time, which is close at hand, we may expect to behold Israel flocking to Jerusalem, and the city once more under the direction of the great Architect, raised out of its ruins, to shine in all the glory of Divine Royalty; then shall "Many people say, Come ye and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord . . . for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem, and he shall judge (rule) among the nations and shall rebuke many people, and they shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks." But before all this, a terrible work of carnage is to be. O that we may be able to escape the wrath to come, and when the glorious age comes, may we be ready to hail its King with joy and gladness. Then our eyes shall behold the King in his beauty, and witness the wonderful fulfilment of those astonishing prophecies of Ezekiel to Zachariah.

PRAYER IS A KEY.—1. Because it opens the door of the knowledge of God. None spiritually understand the character and glory of their Maker but such as go to him to be enlightened. By the very act of calling upon the Father of light, we put ourselves beneath the radiance that shines from him. We come to the light, and he is always ready to open unto us the door, when we come by the use of the key.

2. Because it opens the door of self-knowledge. Just as I bring an object out of darkness into light, which I wish to examine, so I bring my dark heart into light, when I go to God in prayer. In the light of his holiness, and goodness, and joy, I see my own sinfulness, and shame, and misery. The nearer I get to him, the more perfectly I understand myself. Prayerless persons do not, but praying people do know their own hearts. "Now mine eye seeth Thee, wherefore I abhor myself."

3. Prayer opens the glories of the natural world to the mind. A prayerless man does not see one in a thousand of the beauties of nature, and what he does not see, he does not enjoy, as do the spiritually-minded. "For thou, Lord, hast made me glad through thy work; I will triumph in the works of thy hands." God makes those glad in his works who love to draw nigh unto him.

The key that can turn back so many bolts, and open so many doors, and put people in possession of so many blessings, can be had by any mortal willing to take the pains to procure it. Many children, as well as older persons, have found it, and are reaping a noble harvest from its use. And we are assured that no person who fails of having and using this key, will fail of at least laying all the blame and shame at his own door.—Selected.

Breakers Ahead.

BY HELEN ROBERTSON.

When the gallant ship is out on mid ocean there seems to be no danger from rocks or breakers, and there are no signals of danger; but when she is nearing land there are buoys and light-houses, and other signals which the mariner well understands. If he be a wise seaman he well understands how to steer his ship in the proper course, and thus get safely to land. Those signals all speak to the sailor and tell him to take heed. If he neglects those warnings, and a storm comes up, his gallant bark will be dashed against the rocks, and he himself perish in the waters.

This life may well be compared to an ocean. Those sailing over it cannot rest down permanently and make it their abiding place; the surging and heaving of the waves and tide carry them along, and they must either go safely ashore and wait an entrance to land, or be dashed against the rocks and thus perish.

We well know that we are not at present on mid ocean. There are buoys, lighthouses, and other signals, all around, which tell us there are breakers ahead, and we are nearing port. Those signals have all been placed by a wise, experienced Seaman, our Pilot, the Captain of our salvation. He navigated the ocean before us, and in locating all those signs, gave loud warning. He says, "Take heed to yourselves;" and "Watch ye therefore and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man."

Paul says, "Ye brethren are not in darkness that that day should overtake you as a thief." Why are we not in darkness? If we are wise virgins, we have our lamps trimmed and burning; we have oil in our vessels with our lamps, and we are studying our charts faithfully, and watching every token and sign of the near approach of land. O how plain the signs are at present. Why, we see and know of ourselves, that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand. Therefore we begin to look up and lift up our heads, for our redemption draweth nigh.

But the question comes up here again, Can we safely steer our own barks clear up to the land? No. Just as the ships and steamers, when nearing land, have to be piloted in by a tow-boat; so we. We have a Pilot, a safe Tow-boat, and if seasonably fastened on, and remain there, we shall certainly get in, full sail.

But, alas, there are many who see all the signals; they can't help it; they feel the surgings and heavings of kingdoms and empires; they know there are reefs and rocks all around, and breakers ahead; but their lamps have gone out; they are in the dark; they have not been studying their charts, and, worst of all, have lost sight of their Pilot, Christ, in their darkness, and we say, alas for their fate! Their hearts will soon begin to fail them for fear, when the dreadful storms and darkness will close in upon them.

How dreadful to be nearing shore in a heavy tempest, when neither sun nor stars in days appear, and the steamer begins to beach! We have been in just that place, and know what it is. Then stout men's hearts fail them for fear and dread of the dashing billows. But O the joy when the sun shone out, and we got our eye on a pilot-boat.

This seems dark and doleful to write, but we cannot cry peace and safety, when we well know that sudden destruction is near. That there are breakers ahead, and no possibility of escape, only by being in the Life-boat, where we have sun and stars, and light sufficient to guide us to the haven of rest.

Now is the time for us to "take heed to ourselves, lest at any time our hearts be overcharged with surfeiting, and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and so that day come upon us unawares. For as a snare shall it come on all them that dwell on the face of the whole earth." Let us "remember Lot's wife," and not love the world; for the love of the world is enmity with God.

Friendship.

BY H. TAGERT, M. D.

There is a sublimity of sentiment in true friendship. There is an exalted and abiding internal principle which no painters, skill nor poetic eloquence could ever ascend to, or manifest, or describe. The friendship of the world is only for selfish purposes, and varies with self-interest: but true and abiding friendship is ever the same, like the mariner's compass, in the storm or calm, in light or darkness, its directing influence never varies. Thus it was manifested when Lazarus was raised from the dead; between David and Jonathan; Damon and Pythias. Yet how seldom found, though universally admired and professed, and there is often much external similarity; but not any internal relative qualities. True friendship is not changed by poverty or riches, time or distance; like the sun in its course, no trifling, varying conditions can affect its unwavering effulgence. But pretended friendship may be compared to the marshy vapor which only "leads to bewilder and dazzles to blind." In the words of Solomon, "A friend loveth at all times." True friendship can only exist with the pure in heart, only where there is an approving conscience and the testimony of Divine approbation. It cannot be purchased with gold, or obtained by worldly honors. It is the property of the humble Christian. In order to obtain it, we must labor for those qualities which are necessary for it to make up its abode with us.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 26, 1870.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The European War has no new features; the news is stale and as unreliable as ever. All sorts of rumors are afloat, but nothing really reliable, only that confusion seems to prevail, none of the parties seeming to know where they are or what to do next. We wait to see. Let them work out their own destruction or deliverance the best way they can; and we will keep preaching Life eternal, through Christ alone.

The Kingdom of God.

WHAT IS IT? AND WHERE LOCATED?

If men would have less to do with fancy and more to do with the Bible and common sense, we should have less difficulty in understanding the Scriptures. They soar away above the stars, and thus live on a fancy God, a fancy heaven; and to them the kingdom of God is a creation of their own imagination. If we but understood, it is with this world we have to do, and not with an imaginary one, we should be saved from infinite perplexity in regard to what is Scripture truth; but a large portion of professed Christians, like heathen philosophers, will take rapturous flights in the fields of fancy. We give the following as a specimen. It is a flight of imagination by a Clergyman of much talent and reputation, not far off. He said, in speaking of heaven:—

"There are millions in that world of glory that once lived here. Heaven is made up of little colonies, filled up with those we loved on earth, looking down on us from the stars. That mother in heaven when she sees her son, on earth, coming back to God how her heart swells—she gives a shout of joy in high heaven."

How does this popular minister know that "heaven is made up of little colonies?" How does he know those colonies are "filled up with those we loved on earth?" How does he know that heaven is located "above the stars?" Some of those stars are at such distance from this earth that it is supposed it would take the light from them thousands, if not millions of years to reach this earth: yet far off, up there these little colonies are located! Aye; and the sharp eyes of those immaterial spirits can look down on us! Yes, and see us, too! Wonders on wonders, truly! Aye, more. "That mother" in that far off place "sees her son, on earth coming back to God;" yes, "how her [immaterial] heart swells!" What next? "She gives a shout of joy in high heaven!" But how does this minister on earth know this is so? He has fancied this mother up in heaven with her motherly feelings. Now let him not flinch from his position, but let him go on with his fancy, and fancy that mother sees a beloved daughter, that she left on earth, dying; and as she expires she is plunged down to howl and wail with devils and damned ghosts in endless and unmitigated torture. Does "her heart swell" now? Does "she give a shout of joy in high heaven?" Or, does her heart wither, and she give a groan of horror? Please tell us, Mr. Fancyman. Do not flinch. Has that mother's heart all at once turned to stone? Is she unmoved at this sight, and as her daughter goes on groaning in anguish, in ceaseless ages of torture, is that mother to remain unmoved?

Let it be remembered, the minister of whom we are speaking is, by profession, a believer in endless torture; he is not therefore to turn away from our suggestion with the reply—"That is none of our concern." He has concerned himself in the other. But all this is fancy: so we will awake from it and attend to sober facts as developed in the Scriptures of truth.

LOCATION OF THE KINGDOM.

Our inquiry about the kingdom of God we commence with our Lord's words to his followers, as recorded Matt. xxv. 34. "Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the FOUNDATION of the world." Here is a clear indication of the location of the kingdom. It is not a kingdom above the stars. As our blessed Lord refers us, in his language, directly back to the beginning of this world, we turn to Genesis, first chapter. Here we learn, verses 26, to 28, that this earth is the place of the kingdom, and see that man was here given dominion. "God said, let us make man . . . and let them have dominion . . . over all the earth. So God created man . . . male and female created he them. And God blessed them, and God said to them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it; and have dominion . . . over every living thing that moveth upon the earth."

Here, most assuredly, is a kingdom, and dominion is given, "from the foundation of the world." But we will compare it with Psa. viii. "What is man? Thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, [Elohim—gods] and hast crowned him with glory and honor. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet," etc.

In Eden, then, we find the Kingdom of God in its embryotic state—or state of development. Eden was the place of the throne, or seat of Empire. That place is the same that we call Palestine, on the western border of Asia, or east of the Mediterranean. That Eden and Palestine are one, in location, the examination of a few texts will serve to satisfy us. In Ezekiel xxviii. the Lord, in addressing "the prince of Tyrus," says "Thy heart is lifted up, and thou hast said, I am a God, I sit in the seat of God," etc. At verses 13 and 14 the Lord saith to the king of Tyrus—"Thou hast been in Eden, the Garden of God . . . thou wast upon the holy mountain of God," etc. Tyrus lay on the northwest border of Palestine proper, and is, in fact, a part of the land that God included in the gift to Abraham and his seed. Ezekiel xxxi. the Lord directed the prophet to speak unto Pharaoh king of Egypt, and say to him, "The Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon," 3; verses 8 and 9, "The cedars in the garden of God could not hide him . . . nor any tree in the garden of God was like unto him in beauty. I have made him fair . . . so that all the trees of Eden, that were in the garden of God envied him." We then have a description of his pride and punishment; and it is added, verse 16, "I made the nations shake at the sound of his fall when I cast him down to hell with them that descend into the pit; and all the trees of Eden, the choice and best of Lebanon, . . . shall be comforted," etc. The prophet then turning directly to Pharaoh, adds—"To whom art thou like in glory and greatness, among the trees of Eden? Yet thou shalt be brought down with the trees of Eden."

Here is Egypt on the southwest border of Palestine—Assyria on the east, or north-east—and Tyrus on the north-west, all said to be with, among, or near by, the trees of the garden of Eden, or garden of God. Such evidence seems clearly to indicate that Eden and Palestine are identical in their location. If so, we have found the truth of what we before suggested, viz., That in Palestine the kingdom of God was set up, in its embryotic state, at "the foundation of the world;" or from the creation of Adam. That was the seat of empire—the throne was there. Adam lost the throne and dominion, and was driven out from it, and refused any further access to it.

WHAT IS THE KINGDOM OF GOD?

After the flood God reconstructed the kingdom, in embryo, through Moses and Joshua, preparatory to the coming of the King of His own selection. That kingdom was erected on the old ground, or Eden. That this reconstruction was the kingdom of God we will now endeavor to show.

We will first look at Acts i. 6. The disciples asked our Saviour—"Lord wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" Let it be recollected that the preaching of Christ and his apostles, during all their ministry, had been The Kingdom of God; and after our Lord's resurrection the forty days that he remained on earth with his disciples he was speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God: see Acts i. 3. Immediately at the close of those forty days is the question—"Wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" Our Lord does not intimate that they were in error in fact; and therefore we conclude that the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Israel are identical. Jesus does not correct their view on this point—of the restoration of that kingdom—of that being the kingdom of God: but only informs them, it was not for them to know the times . . . which the Father hath put in his own power." We say then—the kingdom of Israel was, and is, the kingdom of God; first in its embryotic state, but at length to be fully developed; at which time the second Adam—Jesus Christ—will have the throne—the seat of empire and dominion.

In further proof on this subject let us now turn to the First Book of Chronicles. King David, at the close of his life, 1 Chron. xxix. 11, said—"Blessed be thou Lord God of Israel our father . . . Thine, O Lord, is the greatness and the power . . . thine is the kingdom," etc. What kingdom is this? In the previous chapter, verses 4 to 7, David speaks thus: "The Lord God of Israel chose me . . . to be king over Israel forever, . . . and of all my sons he hath chosen Solomon my son to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord over Israel. And he said unto me; . . . I will establish his kingdom forever," etc. In the next chapter, verse 23, it is said—"Then Solomon sat on the Throne of the Lord as king instead of David his father; and all Israel obeyed him."

Here is sufficient evidence to justify us in saying—That in Scripture language the kingdom of God—the kingdom of the Lord, and the kingdom of Israel, are identical. But we may compare this testimony in Chronicles with a prophecy by Micah, chap. iv. 6–8; speaking of the day when men shall beat their swords into ploughshares, etc., it is added—"In that day, saith the Lord, will I assemble her that halteth, and gather her that is driven out; and her that I have afflicted; and I will make her that halted a remnant, and her that was cast far off a strong nation; and the Lord shall reign over them in Mount Zion from henceforth even forever. And thou, O tower of the flock, the strong hold of the daughter of Zion, unto thee it shall come, even the first dominion; The Kingdom shall come to the daughter of Jerusalem."

Here is confirmatory evidence of the position we have previously established; but we will compare this again with 1 Chron. xvii. 9–14. The Lord here, in addressing David, said—"I will raise up of thy seed after thee . . . and I will establish his kingdom . . . and I will settle him in my house, and in My Kingdom forever; and his throne shall be established forevermore."

If it be said, the seed here spoken of is Solomon, it still confirms the fact that the kingdom of Israel is the kingdom of God, and so God here expressly calls it—"My kingdom." Though Solomon might be the mediate king spoken of, it is evident the Messiah is the ultimate one; and thus we find Gabriel announcing to Mary, concerning Jesus, "The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever: and of his kingdom there shall be no end."—Luke i. 32, 33. Thus we have fully confirmed that the kingdom of Israel and the kingdom of God, are one and the same.

WAS THIS KINGDOM EVER SUBVERTED?

We now inquire—Was this kingdom ever taken from Jacob's posterity? We need now to adduce but one text in proof on this point, and that is Ezek. xxi. 25–27: "Thou profane wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come, . . . thus saith the Lord God, Remove the diadem, and take off the crown; . . I will overturn, overturn, overturn IT: and it shall be no more, until He come whose right it is; and I will give it him."

Thus we see, that the kingdom of Israel, or the kingdom of God, was overturned, or "perverted;" but it was done with the certainty that it would be re-established. The re-establishment is the subject of many prophecies, in the Old Testament, and is what the New Testament calls the kingdom of God.

[To be concluded next week.]

Denying the Resurrection.

The following extracts from a sermon by H. W. Beecher, some two weeks since, are taken from a report of the same, published in the "N. Y. Tribune." The text was Matt. xxii. 30: "For in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God in heaven."

The philosophy of the Jews, said Mr. Beecher, consisted largely of puzzles and riddles, and enigmas and proverbs, and dark sayings. According to their land system by which property was to be kept in the several families, if a man died, his widow was taken to his next brother, and she became his wife. Here is a specimen of the way in which they thought. They propounded a case: There were seven brothers, and in turn they all conveniently died, for the purposes of the story, and she passed from one to another and became the wife of all. "Now," said they, "in the other life whose shall she be of the seven?" The answer of the Saviour was substantially this: "Substantially you are a set of ignorant fools." It was couched in other language than this, but that is what it amounted to. "Ye do err," he said, "not knowing the Scriptures nor the power of God. For in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God." How is that? He don't say. He likened them to the angels, and then did not tell us how the angels were. The reply of our Master to this question in respect to the future state is remarkable for what it says, and I think quite as remarkable for what it leaves unsaid. When you come to analyze it in the light of modern philosophies and modern knowledge, you will be struck with how little is actually taught us with respect to the future state in the Bible.

The question of continued existence is only recognized in the Old Testament. It is not taught.

Coming from a preacher of Mr. B.'s acknowledged ability; a man who has been supposed to read his Bible intelligently, these observations are somewhat remarkable. They are so, chiefly, as showing how unintelligently some men of acknowledged ability read the plainest declarations of Scripture. "'For in the resurrection they neither marry nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of God.' How is that? He don't say. He likened them to the angels, and then did not tell us how the angels were." The doctrine of a future life which Jesus preached was always taught by him to come by a resurrection from the dead. The Sadducees did not believe it. They denied it and opposed it, but they did so blindly, for they did not understand the doctrine. Like many in the present day, they could not conceive of a resurrection life that would not restore to the individual all the propensities of the present purely animal life, and surround him with like circumstances and the same family relations. With such views of the resurrection state, they deemed the question they propounded respecting the one woman and seven husbands, unanswerable. The reply of Jesus was: Ye are greatly mistaken, for "in the resurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage."—Matt. xxii. 30. "They which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage: neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels."—Luke xx. 35, 36. There is nothing in the language of Jesus to the Sadducees which indicates he meant that resurrected saints are just like angels, but they are like them in two respects: first, they do not marry nor give in marriage; second, they do not die any more. Thus it is seen that in the two particulars respecting which "he likened them to angels," Jesus does "tell us how the angels were."

Says Mr. B., "When you come to analyze it in the light of modern philosophies and modern knowledge, you will be struck with how little is actually taught us with respect to the future state in the Bible." Precisely so, good neighbor. On the question of existence beyond this present state, "modern philosophies" follow in the track of heathen philosophy, which first conceived the idea that man possesses life in himself; and modern theology follows in the track of both. The doctrine of inherent immortality is an invention of heathenism, and all who search the Scriptures for evidence of a future existence based on that principle will assuredly "be struck with how little is taught" therein on the subject. They will soon see, as many thousands have seen, who have gone to the Bible to learn of its teachings, that no such doctrine is anywhere taught in that blessed book. The Saviour said, "As the Father hath life in himself, so hath He given to the Son to have life in himself;" but nowhere in the inspired volume is it said or intimated that God hath given to all men to have life in themselves. It is said by the Son of God: "This is the will of Him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life." This is quite at variance with latter-day theology, which asserts that all men, whether they believe on Christ or not, "have everlasting life." When man-made theology antagonizes with the words of Jesus, sincere seekers after truth will not be slow to determine which to believe. How will this "everlasting life," which comes by believing on Jesus, be had? "I will raise him up at the last day." Can any thing be plainer?

"The question of continued existence," says Mr. B., "is only recognized in the Old Testament. It is not taught." If he will take the trouble to search the Old Testament thoroughly, he will not only find that continued conscious existence is not taught there, he "will be struck with how little" it is "recognized." It is neither taught nor recognized. If, however, Mr. B. uses the expression "continued existence" as a synonym for future life, we take the liberty of assuring him it is taught in the Old Testament. We might cite him to not a few texts that teach it; but he might say, they do not teach it, and so we will again go to the testimony of Jesus. It has been seen that the Sadducees, who denied the resurrection in toto, believed that as Jesus taught it it involved a resumption, in that life, of all the relations of the present life. Supposing, too, that the law of Moses held force in that state, they felt that the question they propounded presented an insuperable objection to the doctrine, inasmuch as it was thought to conflict with what "Moses taught." Jesus simply replied to them: "Ye do err, not knowing the Scriptures," the Hebrew Scriptures, of course, they had no others. What does this language of Jesus imply? It implies that had they known the Scriptures they would have known that the doctrine of a resurrection from the dead is therein taught. True, Jesus does not in so many words say the doctrine of future life by a resurrection from the dead is taught in "the Scriptures," but as he tells a class of individuals who do not believe the doctrine that they err in their unbelief for want of "knowing the Scriptures," the conclusion is irresistible that a future life is taught in the Old Testament, for the Saviour's language is equivalent to an affirmation of it.

Mr. Beecher says:

"There is no attempt in the New Testament to determine whether Heaven is a condition or a place. That is left for our modern speculation. There is nothing definite taught in respect to the relations of this condition or place to the universe. There is no account given of its materials, of its occupations, what changes will pass upon our nature. Are we to go into the heavenly state in bodies? Paul declares expressly no! Flesh and blood shall not inherit the kingdom of God. He declares that there shall be a form corresponding to these bodies. How any one can believe in the resurrection of the physical body, I cannot understand when the Apostle debars it. But what shape do our bodies assume? That is not taught.

Mr. B. is quite right in his remarks upon Scripture silence as to the nature of the theological heaven; for the Bible teaches plainly that the Kingdom of God is to be established on the earth, that it (the earth) is to be the inheritance of the saints. The popular belief about heaven is all "modern speculation." He disavows belief in "the resurrection of the physical body;" he "cannot understand" how any one can believe it "when the apostle (Paul) debars it." Well, he is not the only one who has denied the resurrection. Others, as we have had occasion to remark, have done the same thing, and were told by one who knew that they erred, "not knowing," etc. Having gone astray when a much stronger light shone upon his pathway than shone on theirs, his is far the greater error. What language of Paul debars a physical resurrection? Is it the following? "Now if Christ be preached that he rose from the dead, how say some among you that there is no resurrection of the dead?"—1 Cor. xv. 12.

The church at Corinth could not answer the question: can Plymouth church do any better? "If there be no resurrection of the dead, then is Christ not risen." "But now is Christ risen from the dead;" verses 13 and 20. Paul states the proposition that if the doctrine of the resurrection is not true, then Christ has not been made alive. The one follows inevitably upon the other. But, having cited many witnesses of unquestionable reliability to sustain him, Paul proceeds to show the absurdity of denying the doctrine by affirming that "now is Christ risen;" and Paul is himself a living witness to its truth. Be consistent, Mr. B., and like your Corinthian and Sadducaic sympathizers, deny the resurrection of Christ as well. "The Apostle debars" the one just as certainly and effectually as he does the other.

As to the order of the resurrection, the order in which subjects of it come forth to life, Paul says: "Christ the first-fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming," ver. 23. The gathering of the first-fruits, the pledge and sample of the glorious resurrection harvest, occurred in the raising up of Jesus from the dead. "Put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit." He went into the grave a being of flesh and blood, and he came out of it a spiritual being, though physical and corporeal, and no more subject to death. The next, after Christ, in Paul's order of the resurrection is, "they that are Christ's at his coming."

Again: "If after the manner of men, I have fought with beasts at Ephesus, what advantageth it me if the dead rise not? Let us eat and drink for tomorrow we die:" ver. 32. There is no misunderstanding this language of the Apostle. If it be accepted as meaning anything, that meaning is, if the dead rise not the Christian's hope of future life is utterly groundless, and that therefore we are justified in eating and drinking and making the most of this life, "for to-morrow we die," and beyond that there is nothing. The argument of this text is, indisputably, no resurrection, no future life. Paul certainly goes to work in a queer way to debar a physical resurrection.

But further: "In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we (who are alive at that time) shall be changed, (from mortality to immortality; from corruption to incorruption; from flesh and blood beings to spiritual beings). For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality:" verses 52, 53. Does our good brother now see how it is that "flesh and blood," a synonym for mortality and corruption, "cannot enter the kingdom of God," and yet there be a physical resurrection? "But what shape do our bodies assume? That is "not taught," says Mr. B. Is it so? Surely no one will have the rashness to affirm that we are left in doubt as to the form and shape which Jesus assumed at his resurrection. Did he not walk hither and thither? Was he not seen and felt and recognized as the Jesus that was crucified? Did he not eat and drink with the disciples? Was he not, then, a physical body, of human shape? As he is the "first-fruits," the pledge and sample of what is to follow, the question, "what shape do our bodies assume?" is plainly answered. But if more is needed, let it be remembered another apostle has said, "We know that when he (Christ) shall appear, we shall be like him." These are a few of the many texts wherein, it is said, "the apostle debars" a physical resurrection. Mr. B. has, we believe, many years been understood to hold and preach a bodily resurrection. Having changed his views on the subject, it is not enough that he now stand up before his people and deny the doctrine. He owes it to them and to his fellow Christians generally to produce the evidence which has weighed so heavily against it in his mind. Where is that evidence, and what is its nature?

Having thoroughly established the doctrine of a bodily resurrection, Paul exhorted his brethren at Corinth: "Therefore, (inasmuch as we thus have a living, tangible, unfading hope of a future life) my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." May all professed lovers of Jesus lay this exhortation to heart.

CONCERNING SOULS.

Eld. G. says that "a man is called 'a soul' in the Bible, because he has a soul: the whole is called by the name of a part. A vessel is called 'a sail' because it has a sail."

PROFOUND reasoning that! Many elders have made similar statements. These elders claim that the body is the tenement for their soul or immaterial spirit man to dwell in, so that, properly speaking, that immaterial ghost is the true soul or real tenant man. So the whole affair, tenement, and tenant, is called 'a soul' from that fact. (?) Now for the elder's illustration: "a vessel is called 'a sail' because it has a sail." According to G.'s logic the canvass sail must be the real vessel, and the hull a body to carry it. The hull is the tenement, and the canvass sail the tenant.

Again, if the elder's theory is sound, it is an indisputable fact that not only men, but beasts, cattle, creeping things, fowls ano fishes have souls, because, all are alike called "souls." This fact we determine from Gen. i. 20, 21, 30. "And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life. (Mar., soul.) . . . And God created great whales, and every living creature (Heb., living soul) that moveth which the waters brought forth abundantly . . . And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to everything that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life (Mar., a living soul), I have given every green herb for meat."

Thus Inspiration shows us that not only man, but beasts, cattle, fowls, creeping things, and fishes are souls, and by our learned elder's theory, they are so called, because all of them have souls. The conclusion is inevitable that everything from an elephant down to a grub, from an ostrich down to a mosquitoe, and from a whale down to the animalculæ have mortal bodies and immortal souls; or, in other words, all are ghosts, properly speaking, dwelling in tenements of clay. Henceforth we may expect to see the ghosts of whales, sharks, codfishes, lobsters, elephants, horses, camels, dogs, cats, eagles, pigeons, mosquitoes, grasshoppers, beetlebugs, worms, etc., etc.

Really, the theory of the elder carried out to its legitimate conclusions, looks wonderfully like the pantheology of ancient Egypt. No wonder that an entire community was thrown into a state of consternation, there, if a foreigner stoned a cat so that it quit her tenement and went to her paradise leaving the tenement body behind. Even the fishes had immaterial spirits. A crocodile might be worshipped, and an alligator considered a god. Even in the time of Moses the frogs, dear little gods dwelling in tenements of clay, could not be disturbed by the Egyptians. The Egyptians were not materialists. Not they! With them every living creature had a body and a soul, said soul being considered a part of God. That made their gods very numerous.

Our elder thinks that as we hold that man is made wholly of dust that we make him simply a beast. Wonderful conclusion to come to! Then, as an elephant is made of dust and a kitten is made of dust, an elephant must be a kitten. As a whale is a material creature, and a humming bird is a material creature, a humming bird must be a whale. As an ostrich is made of dust, and a beetle-bug is made of dust, and both live by breathing, then an ostrich is a beetle-bug. Because man is made of dust, and has body, soul, and spirit, and because beasts also are made of dust and have body, soul, and spirit, it does not follow that a man is an ox. As far as his composition is concerned he differs not from beasts. "All are of the dust, and all turn to dust again." "All have one breath," that is the "breath of lives." All alike have body, soul, and spirit. But in no instance, apart from the body is soul or spirit an intelligence.

We claim material creatures are called souls and spirits because all have soul and spirit in common. Hence a man is called "a soul" because he has soul. He is called "a life" because he has life. He is called "a spirit" because he has spirit. But he does not have an intelligent soul or a conscious spirit inside his body. The Bible shows in the clearest manner that beasts have spirit. Because God is "a spirit," it does not follow that the spirit of the beast is an intelligence independent of the body of the beast. Neither man nor beast are spirits in the sense in which God is a spirit. Men and beasts depend upon their physical organism for intelligence etc., etc. When each have "the breath of the spirit of life," then through their organism they can see, hear, smell, taste, feel, think, will, execute, love, hate, suffer and enjoy. When deprived of "the spirit of life," all these phenomena cease, and it is a fact that "the dead know not anything." Unless there is a resurrection of dead men, then they and their thoughts are forever perished.

What great cause we have for gratitude to Him in whom "we live, move, and have our being," for the gift of His dear Son, who, through the Gospel, has made the way of life and immortality plain. "He that believeth in (Christ,) though he were dead, yet shall he live: and he that liveth and believeth shall not die eternally." The question, "If a man die, shall he live again?" is answered by Jesus Christ who is "the Resurrection and the Life."

PHILADELPHIA Oct., 21, 1870.

TEN INCONTROVERTIBLE FACTS.

From the Bible we gather the following facts concerning the creatures of God:

1 A living soul, is a living material creature.

2. Living souls comprise men, cattle, beasts, creeping things, fowls, and fishes.

3. All living souls have "the breath of lives."

4. All living souls have body, soul, and spirit.

5. Soul, and spirit, apart from the body are not identical.

6. Neither soul nor spirit apart from the body are intelligent entities in any case.

7. All living souls depend wholly upon a physical organism in order to see, hear, smell, taste and smell; to think, remember, will, and execute; to love, hate, enjoy and suffer.

8. All living souls were originally made of "the dust of the ground."

9. In God all living souls live, and move, and have their being. "In whose hand is the soul of every living thing."

10. Hence we need not fear men who can kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul or the power of life, but we should fear him who is able to destroy both.

He that can refute the foregoing statements by the Bible, let him make himself known.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM STEWART CARLISLE.

BR. STORRS: Enclosed please find one dollar for six months subscription for the HERALD, to be sent to a young man of my acquaintance, whom I have known from infancy, and for whom I entertain the highest opinion. I have had considerable conversation with him in regard to the Life views, and he seems to be favorably impressed with them. He is by no means a bigot. It would have done you good to hear a prayer he offered up at a prayer meeting in the church of which he is a member. It did me more good than any thing I heard during a week's attendance of the meeting. May our dear Father in heaven make the HERALD the means of shedding the light of truth so clearly on his mind and heart, and so open the eyes of his understanding that he may rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

Oh the truth, the precious truth,
That Jesus died for me;
That through his death, and by his life,
From sin and death I'm free.

To fall asleep, is not to die;
Death has no sting to me.
From death I've passed, to hope of life
And immortality.

To die: to die: and not see life,
Nor Jesus when he comes;
To die, and "perish like the beasts,"
And lose our Eden home.

Ah who can bear this awful thought,
To die! and be no more?
While reason's left, and God invites,
Come to the open door.

"I am the door," the Saviour says;
Come; enter in by me;
Life, you shall have in pastures green,
Throughout eternity.

Yours, in hope of eternal life.

WILMINGTON, DEL., Oct. 20, 1870.

FROM H. M. BRYANT.

BR. STORRS: It is rather late to write about camp-meetings, but as I contemplated meeting you in Springfield, and so stated in a previous letter which appeared in the HERALD, and as I was not there, perhaps an explanation why I was not, may be in place even at this late day.

About that time our little son was taken sick with that terrible disease, cholera infantum, and after nearly six weeks of weary watching and anxious care, we were compelled to deliver him to the cold embrace of the enemy.

With hearts overflowing with sorrow, we laid him down to rest. But 'midst it all, with a feeling of inward joy that though the enemy had triumphed now, a morn of glory and victory was coming soon. O when will the LIFE-GIVER come? the monumental piles be thrown down? the graves opened, and eternal youth and beauty spring into life from the dust? The day is near; a joyful thought.

Dear brethren and sisters in the Lord, be strong; yea, be strong. We have nothing to fear. And if by the intervention of poverty, sickness, or death, or any of the countless ills incident to our natures, we are prevented from meeting as we would, let us not rebel against the Lord, and he will bring us into the land. Then there will be a meeting indeed, such as has never taken place since the world began; as no force of circumstances can prevent any heartily interested in the Zion movement from being present. My heart was with you at Springfield, and I feel well assured that the movement there was a movement in the right direction. Certain it is if we are lovers of the Lord, and are the called in his purpose, it will work blessed well, I know.

For the same reason that I could not be at Springfield, I was at Alton Bay only two days. But while there, was most agreeably surprised to find so many Life believers. We met together Friday evening, as many as we could notify by word of mouth, and I assure you that, under the circumstances, it was no mean company in regard to numbers. A blessed, refreshing spiritual season was the result, as all who were there can testify. I met there, also, a prominent business man from a neighboring city, who has been and still is a most efficient help in the cause of the Lord. He informed me that he had been investigating the question of man's condition in death, and had come to the conclusion that without a connection with Christ man must forever "remain in the congregation of the dead."

I hope we may hear more from him soon. Meanwhile we will praise God that light is on the increase, and that the pathway grows brighter.

I had a very pleasant interview with a preaching brother, whom I met for the first time. In the course of our conversation, he told me that while in Canada, he attempted to preach against the Life views, and was convicted of the discrepancies in the double death theory before he left the desk, and even while speaking. Truly, it is hard to kick against the pricks. He is now in that interesting condition of mourning over the coldness of former associates. May God bless them with the truth, and give him grace to let his light shine.

We had also the pleasure of meeting Br. and Sister Day, Stone, Cleaves, the brethren Brooks, and a score of others. May our acquaintance so pleasantly began at Alton Bay, culminate in the kingdom of God.

Your Br., in hope of life.

NORTHWOOD NARROWS, N. H., Oct. 18, 1870.

FROM SAMUEL MORGAN.

BR. STORRS: The truth has much opposition out here; yet there are a few who sympathize with me in some measure. A few weeks since I had a discussion with two men at the depot of the Kansas Pacific railroad. The people were waiting for the train. The immortality of the soul was the topic. I showed them, by Gen. ii. 7, that man received the breath of life, and not a part of God, at his creation: that man by disobedience brought sin and death into the world; which would not have entered had man been obedient to his Creator. I quoted Job iv. 17, "Shall mortal man be more just than God?" and asked them, what the term mortal signifies? Does it not mean that which is not immortal?

I next opened to Ezk. xviii., and asked, if the soul is immortal, why did God say, "The soul that sinneth it shall die?" Can an immortal soul die? Then we turned to the New Testament, Rom. ii. 7, showing that Paul taught that immortality was to be obtained by a patient continuance in well-doing; and that we were to seek for it.

Our discussion lasted an hour and a half. The people seemed astonished at my views; but I had the word of God to support me and felt strong. If I stand alone, my intention is to wield the sword of the Spirit, let it cost what it may. They have tried to get me to unite with their creeds, but they see it is in vain; and they fight me the harder. They say I don't belong to any church. Some call me every name but Christian. Thank the Lord, I am able to bear it all.

When I meditate on the promises of the Son of God, I feel to take courage: "Blessed is he that endureth to the end; for such shall be saved." I desire to express my feelings to the little flock of God's people scattered abroad. I read many of their communications in the HERALD OF LIFE; some of which deeply affect me, even to tears. I take much comfort in the words sent forth by the children of God. I hope they will pray for me, for I need their prayers much. May we all watch and pray, for we are living in a period of the world's history when we have all need to do so, if we expect to gain eternal life. Let us then watch unto prayer; for thus it becometh the children of God to do. May we be ever found steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of Lord, forasmuch as we know, if found faithful, our work will not be in vain in the Lord. May the blessing of God rest upon and abide with you all; and may He sanctify us through His truth; for His words are truth.

I am, dear brethren and sisters, yours, though a lonely pilgrim in the Lord.

NORTH LAWRENCE, KANSAS, Oct. 8, 1870.

FROM ELD. S. L. WALTER.

BR. STORRS: I rejoice and give thanks to our Father in heaven, that though the company of those believing that there is No Life out of our Life-giving Lord are few, yet they give unmistakable evidence of the transforming power of faith, in saying at the anniversary of the Life and Advent Union, that the HERALD OF LIFE must and shall go on its mission for another year, by the noble manner they have again contributed to its support. It takes men and women that love God and man, to come up year after year to the help of the Lord against the mighty. "God loves the cheerful giver." I pray the Lord to bless them. I am sure they never will lack any good thing as long as they are not in doubt of God's faithfulness. I pray that you, and God's dear children, may grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. I hope that David's desire shall be ours, viz., "Let my cry come near before thee, O Lord: give me understanding according to thy word." O for faith in God.

Faith, mighty faith the promise sees,
And looks to that alone;
Laughs at impossibilities,
And cries, It shall be done.

Let us thank God, and take courage. I am thankful for good health. My left hand is of very little use to me. I have not done any work since the 19th of July. I thank God I have not lacked any good thing. I see my Father's hand in the way he works. There seems to be a wheel within a wheel. Praise the Lord, all things work together for good to them that love Him.

I have been at Clyde and found the brethren, who still live there, strong in the faith that, without being in Christ man will perish. God's wrath will rest upon them. There is no going back, and they want the paper. I expect they will renew their subscription. Br. A. J. Dunkin has been sick for two or three years, and had not the means to pay for his paper.

BUNKER HILL, ILL., Oct. 13, 1870.

FROM ELD. J. LEWIS.

BR. STORRS: I yet live, and never felt more the importance of standing on the watch-tower, keeping my eyes fixed on the sure word of prophecy, which is now speaking in thunder tones that the coming of the Lord draweth nigh. Thrones are being cast down; the potentates of earth are trembling and their hearts failing them for fear and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth. The would-be-wise theologians are saying, the war in Europe is preparing the way for their millennium; thus crying, Peace and safety. Let us, a little flock, look up, for our redemption draweth nigh. Praise our God, for He will soon come, or has come out of His place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity, and to save His people. He is coming with a strong arm and will save those who love Him. Even so, come quickly.

Brethren and sisters, gird your armor a little closer; for we must fight if we would reign. The time of trouble has but just begun. Let us keep ourselves in the love of God, looking for the mercy of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ unto eternal life.

A word or two for our dear HERALD OF LIFE, whose weekly visits bring us so much good news, that gives joy and consolation to us. May it live to see the end of this age. May the Lord bless the conductors of it: may they be deeply embued with the spirit of love, the spirit of power and a sound mind; and let all of us be filled with the fulness of God, and have love without dissimulation. When it is well with you, fellow pilgrims, think on me. Yours in hope of Life, when the LIFE-GIVER comes.

GRAFTON, ILL., Oct. 10, 1870.

FROM E. A. POOLE.

BR. STORRS: I am glad to see the HERALD commencing so triumphantly its eighth volume. I prize it highly, and should be glad to do something for it, but cannot, now.

Circumstances have been much against us the past season. And yet, if we are enabled to say with the Psalmist, "Now I love and keep thy word," we can also say, "It is good for us that we have been afflicted." We have been under our Father's rod. Since last June typhoid fever has held dominion over us, seizing successfully my three children, and lastly my wife: but, thanks to our Father, whose nature is love, the first three are so far recovered as to be able to labor some; while the last, though now prostrate with a relapse, more severe than the first attack, seems to be slightly improving, and we rejoice in the prospect of full restoration to health again.

O that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men; and may the Lord grant that I may come out of the furnace purified and better fitted for the Master's use.

Yours, in affliction and hope.

LINCKLEAN, N. Y., Oct. 1870.

FROM GEO. W. ALLHOUSE.

BR. STORRS: I write a few lines to express my gratitude and thankfulness to you for still sending me the HERALD, which I so highly prize, though I cannot yet pay for it nor the last volume. This troubles me very much, and indeed words cannot describe the anguish and mortification I feel on account of it. I have trembled with fear that the paper would be stopped; and now, behold! volume viii. is still sent to me. O may the Lord bless you for this favor, also; and I am truly thankful to my heavenly Father for his mercy and goodness to me, though I have been for a long time, and am now, led under deep affliction and adversity, so that often I have been almost distracted and in despair; but thanks to God, I would recover a little again, and I hope the Lord will still be merciful and "keep me by his mighty power, through faith, unto salvation." I know that in my weakness of body and mind I need "strong consolation;" and may I become more humble and submissive to God, daily.

In my temporal affairs, also, everything seemed to have worked against me. May the Lord again let the light of his countenance shine upon me, and prosper me in the way of his providence; and may the Lord give me grace and strength to endure chastening as long as He seeth it needful for me. Remember me at the throne of grace.

The HERALD is a great help to me. I love to read the letters of the Lord's children, as well as the instructive pieces from you and from others. The Lord has also been mindful of you in giving you for aid and help, in your old age, that staunch friend, that true brother in the Lord, that child of God, L. C. THORNE. God bless him, and give him, with yourself, perfect peace, and all the blessings, temporal and spiritual, needed. I have loved him for a long time, though I have never seen him; and there are many others, also, of whom I cannot now speak. May the Lord be gracious and merciful to his sick servants, Br. Wolcott and Br. Campbell, and bless them, sustain them, make all their bed in their sickness, and in his own good time, if it be his will raise them up again; for all is of grace.

I shall send money just as soon as I can; but I know not when. God bless you with every needed blessing and sustain you.

Yours, in hope of eternal life, through our only LIFE-GIVER, Jesus Christ.

Note by Editor.

Do not be discouraged, Br. Allshouse; your paper is paid for to the end of volume viii., or till October 1871. So give yourself no uneasiness about that matter.

FROM MRS. L. F. TITCOMB.

"And in thy name done many wonderful works."—Matt. vii. 22.

BR. STORRS: How truly your words, in your last discourse on the Campground, in which you said, "The churches were counting up their works." We have a manifestation of it here in Springfield. At every meeting the counting goes on; and if the number runs high it is mentioned for several nights afterward; as though numbers was of greater importance than graces.

It is evident to any one, whose lamp has not gone out, that we are living in the time spoken of in the text, when people will be telling of the wonderful works they have done; and thus fulfil the word of God to their own condemnation. According to the word, it is the last thing to be done before the LIFE-GIVER comes to give Life and Immortality to his people.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., Oct. 1870.

FROM ELD. R. V. LYON.

BR. STORRS: It is with pleasure I look back to the pleasant, social and religious interviews which I enjoyed with the brethren and sisters of like precious faith, at the Springfield camp-meeting. Brethren that I was associated with in the '43 movement: brethren that had been brought into a knowledge of the truth, under God, through my feeble efforts.

It was hard to part with them. But if faithful in the service of the Lord, we shall soon meet in our Eden home, where parting will not be known.

I was glad to see the zeal manifested in supporting the HERALD and other works devoted to things concerning the kingdom of God and the name of Jesus, our LIFE-GIVER.

But sorry to find some Adventists who are only babes in the truth, more bigoted than many of their sisters. Hence I feel disposed to occupy a position that gives me this right to fellowship all, as my brethren and fellow-laborers in the Gospel, who give evidence of having formed a union with Jesus, and are trying to walk as heirs of LIFE.

Yours in love.

P. S. I wish to say to the brethren and sisters, that I have constantly on hand a large supply of my own works, which can be had at a low figure. To the poor free: but they must pay the postage.

SUSPENSION BRIDGE, N. Y. Oct. 17, 1870.

J. F. WHITNEY, Wolcottville, Conn., writes: I have been in this place one year, and have done, by the help of the Lord, what I could to spread the glorious truth of "No Life out of Christ." Two of the best brethren in this place have just confessed this truth and rejoice in it; others are investigating. I have rejoiced in this truth about two years; and truly it shows God to be a God of love. I am now looking for the Lord soon to come, and trust to meet him in peace. One of the brethren spoken of has been investigating some ten years, but did not have objections removed, satisfactorily, until this summer and fall, when he met brethren Whitehead, Barker and Pile, in private conversation, each one at different times. Now he rejoices in the truth, and loves God with his whole heart, mind, might and strength.

P. FLICKNER, Delton, Wis., writes: Times here are very close, and money about as tight as we ever see it. But we have the promise that, if we ask, we shall receive; if we knock, it shall be opened; and if we seek, we shall find. Blessed promises; and the Lord be praised for them; and having all confidence, we know we shall not be disappointed. The Lord be praised for his kind and Fatherly care over you and all the dear ones scattered abroad. May that care still be extended in giving you health of body and vigor of mind, that you may battle for the truth, and battle on till Jesus comes (which, from present appearances, cannot be long) is the prayer of one who has the cause of truth at heart. Pray for me. Ever yours, waiting for the returning One.

JOHN HAYS, Epping Corner, N. H., writes: Few here are loving the whole truth of Life only in Christ. Br. Bryant, from Northwood Narrows, has been here and preached the word to a few, mostly young men. I hope you will remember us in your prayers, and that some other servant of the Life-boat will come and help us in this time of need.

NATHAN CALL, East Durham, Canada, writes: I am 79 years old, and very infirm. I cannot think of doing without the HERALD OF LIFE. It is all the preaching I get. Bigotry and superstition reign triumphant. Your brother, waiting for the LIFE-GIVER to appear.

PRAYERS DESIRED.

BR. STORRS: Br. Samuel C. Smith, of Bradley, while at work in the Lumber Mills, slipped into the machinery and got badly injured. His leg is broken, and his foot crushed in a shocking manner. He wishes through the HERALD to request the prayers of the people of God. He believes God will hear the prayers of the saints in his behalf. He wishes Brn. Brown, Edgerley, and others, in this vicinity, to come and see him as soon as convenient.

C. A. S.

BRADLEY, ME., Oct. 2, 1870.

OBITUARY.

LEWIS.—Died at Martinsburg, Mo., Sept. 9, 1870, my nephew, WILLIAM LEWIS, aged 54 years. He fell asleep in Jesus, and we mourn, but not as those who have no hope. Soon the trumpet will sound, when all the saints that sleep in the dust of the earth will awake, clothed with immortality, to die no more. The following is the testimony of the daughter of my nephew:

"Father died conscious to all around him to the last, and held the Life views of No Life out of Christ. His daily conversation, mostly, and with all he met, had been to exhort them to come to Jesus. We heard him say, while tossing to and fro, that he did not see how any one could think there would be any suffering after death. He said he was ready; and we have no doubt he fell asleep to wait the coming of the Lord." May that day soon come. Amen.

"Be not Conformed to this World."

The ancient laws of chivalry declare,
In love and war, all strategems are fair.
Another step the Church of Rome has made,
And sanctified all means to give her aid.
All modern churches now have followed suit,
And coveted the world's forbidden fruit—
The livery of heaven, men would steal,
To serve the devil, in their ardent zeal.
Now satan's livery, good chieftains wear,
To serve their Master in his house of prayer.
Fairs, festivals, pic-nics, all sorts of fun,
The world ever witnessed under the sun.
With plays, tableaus, and all games of chance
Post Office, grab-bag; the fiddle and dance.
All these must now help our churches to fill,
And bring their grist straight to the gospel mill.
When Christ shall come to his temple again,
Pray what will he do with these merchant-men,
Who have turned his house to a den of thieves;
While his waiting Spouse as a widow grieves;
And longs the return of her absent King:
While they live in pleasure, and dance and sing!
To which of these twain will the Saviour say,
Now come sit with me on my throne to-day?
Through much tribulation and anxious care,
You have followed me in faith and prayer.
The world and the flesh you have overcome;
The battle is fought the victory won.
The victor's crown, now I give you to wear
My throne, my kingdom and glory to share.

The Parable of the Ten Virgins.

BY GEORGE BANGS.

The time when we are to look for the fulfilment of this parable in all its bearings, is in the consecutive order which the Lord has placed it in the catalogue of events mentioned by him in Matt. xxiv. 4–49, as signs of the coming of the Bridegroom to celebrate His marriage with his Bride the church. And according to this rule, it must be the next event following the one described in ch. xxiv. 45–49. All the other events named, above this, having their fulfilment before this would become due, except "the sign of the Son of man in heaven:" "Which we believe will be the glory in the atmospheric heavens, preceding His personal appearing. And to know if we have any good reason to expect the fulfilment of the parable of the virgins to take place about this time, let us for a moment inquire if the circumstances connected with the faithful, and evil servants have occurred, so as to answer to the mould of that prophecy? The first point in that parable to be settled is: Who are the fellow-servants there spoken of? We answer, All those who gave heed to the Saviour's command, vs. 33: "When ye shall see all these things, know that he is near, even at the doors:" and have jointly gone out to proclaim the Lord at hand. Those who have stood out in opposition to this message, closed their eyes to, and stubbornly rejected the evidences so abundantly furnished; we think must be the class spoken of by Peter as "scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of his coming?" etc.

Now if the mould of this prophecy has been fully met, so as to compare perfectly with the Lord's instruction as here given; concerning which it appears to me there can be no question. Then immediately following THOSE things, I think we are to look for the events answering to the things spoken of in the parable of the ten virgins: to which we will now give some attention, and explain as we understand the passage. Though we do not claim to be infallible, for we are mortal like other men, therefore liable to err as do others.

Matt. xxv. 1. Then shall the kingdom of heaven (then shall those desiring to be the subjects, or heirs of the kingdom of heaven) be likened unto ten virgins, which took their lamps, and went forth to meet the bridegroom. The lamps here, are the word of God. As saith David, Psa. cxix., cv., "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my pathway." The virgins here must represent that class of people who had become convinced by reading the Scriptures "that the kingdom of God is nigh at hand;" that the Bridegroom is near, even at the doors: and therefore took the inspired word of God and went forth, having a desire to meet the Bridegroom at the appointed time. But the parable informs us, that a part of these virgins fail to obtain admission into the marriage: because they took no oil with their lamps.

"And five of them were wise, and five were foolish. They that were foolish took their lamps, and took no oil with them: but the wise took oil in their vessels with their lamps."

The essentially important point of instruction, the Lord would give his disciples in this parable, is, concerning the oil: for without that which is symbolized by oil, here spoken of, when that deciding moment shall come, no man will be permitted to go with the Bridegroom into the marriage: though he may cry, Lord, Lord, open to me. But he will answer and say, Verily I say unto you, I know you not. We understand the oil, here symbolizes the Holy Spirit. The begetting and renewing influences of the Holy Spirit. That which Br. Storrs has termed "The Essential Baptism:" the baptism of the Holy Spirit. For as Paul says, Rom. viii. 9, "Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his." If any man have the Spirit of Christ, he will seek to follow Him in all his examples. He will try to live by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God. He will not fear to declare the whole counsel of God, if the Spirit of God shall help him to understand what the will of the Lord is. Neither will he cover up, and hide that which he knows to be wrong, either in himself or any other, to gain the praise of men; but his desire will be that the name of God may be magnified through the truth; the whole truth. As Paul says again, Rom. viii. 14, 16, 17, "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God. . . . The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirits, that we are the children of God: and if children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with him, that we may be also glorified together." Again, Eph. i. 13, 14, "Ye were sealed with that holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance."

Now if any have the spirit of Christ; let him bring forth the fruits of the Spirit; which are "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; against such there is no law. And they that are Christ's have crucified the flesh with the passions and lusts. If we live in the Spirit, let us also walk in the Spirit. Let us not be desirous of vain glory, provoking one another, envying one another."—Gal. v. 22–26. With how much jealousy over self should every man examine his own heart: for a man may be able to speak with the tongues of men and angels; he may have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries, and all knowledge; he may have all faith, so that he could remove mountains; and he may give all his goods to feed the poor, and give his body to be burned, yet if he have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his. If he is not led by the Spirit of God, he is not a child of God: and consequently he cannot go in to the marriage when the Bridegroom shall come. Let no one then rest satisfied with himself till he obtains a scriptural evidence that he is baptized with the Holy Spirit; and that he is led by the Spirit of God in all his ways. For your Father which is in heaven, is more willing to give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him, than an earthly parent is to give good gifts to his children.

But to return to the parable. Vs. 5., "While the Bridegroom tarried, they all slumbered and slept." That is, they go to sleep, or become indifferent to the question under consideration which is proposed ch. xxiv. 3, "What shall be the sign of thy coming, and of the end of the world?" In answer to which question, the Lord had given so many events, which were to serve as signs to the family of God, from generation to generation, as they should occur in their consecutive order from that time, till he has come to the parable of the virgins, the last of the signs as recorded by Matthew; when, because the Bridegroom would tarry a little beyond their expectation, the Lord said, they would all sleep on the question. I suppose the reason is, they cannot find another starting point. All those things are filled up. We are to wait the Lord's tarrying time. It may be but short. And is not this part of the parable being now emphatically fulfilled? And yet, as a people, we do not see it.

May the Lord open their eyes to see their dangerous position before it shall be too late to repent, and find mercy.

Vs. 6, And at midnight there was a cry made, Behold, the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him. It would seem that when the virgins became so sound asleep, as that it may be compared to midnight with them, then the cry is made; and according to the word of the Lord here, the Bridegroom will come at that time, and the Bride will have made herself ready; and will go with the Bridegroom into the marriage: and the door will be shut. That which will cause the midnight cry to be made, I think will be the sign of the Son of man in heaven, when he shall come in the glory of his Father, and in his own glory, and all the holy angels with him: the great glory being perceived, before His person is visible. "Then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory."

Vs. 7. "Then all those virgins arose, and trimmed their lamps." They search the Scriptures for the witness of the Spirit. "And the foolish said unto the wise, give us of your oil; for our lamps are going out:" (margin). They have not the Spirit of God witnessing with their spirits, that they are his: and they cry to their fellow-servants for help. But they direct them to God, who alone can give that Spirit in the name of Christ. But then it will be too late; and they are lost! How important that we give heed to the word of the Lord?

Vs. 13, "Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of man cometh." "And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other."—Ch. xxiv. 31. "And it shal lbe said in that day, Lo, this is our God; we have waited for him, and he will save us; this is the Lord. we have waited for him, we will be glad and rejoice in his salvation."—Psa. xxv. 9.

Brethren, let us all arise without delay, and trim our lamps: and make sure that we have the Spirit of truth; and he will guide us into all truth. Amen.

Union.

BY H. M. BRYANT.

There is blessedness in union when based upon right principles. And that in Union is strength, none will deny. We do not however mean by this, a corrupt confederation of political power; but rather that which is derived from keeping the unity of the Spirit in the bonds of peace. Political unions may be strong, but they are not always peaceable.

The power of union needs no new demonstration. A few years ago, a united North demonstrated the principle by subduing a gigantic rebellion. United Germany could, in a few days, blot out a mighty empire.

Thus we believe union to be a source of power. Union meetings are the order of the day; in fact fashionable. At Camp meetings Union Tracts are seen.

The whole theological world had, this present autumn, a union meeting in contemplation, and were only deterred from having it, in fact, by the intervention of the European war. In an adjoining town, a short time since, three different denominations united—had a union meeting; a spasmodic revival was the result. Presently the time came for the fish to be divided, strung, and carried home; and, alas for the union!

Now, we love union; we admire peace; but can there be Christian union without Christian fellowship? and can union, fraternity, and fellowship in Christ, be manufactured to order? Can two walk together except they be agreed? We seriously doubt a union's being salutary based upon principles other than those deduced from the word of God.

If such be the case, why should the colors come down? or the standard trail in the filth of hypocrisy? "Agreeing to disagree;" naming such a compact an agreement, or union in Christ, is compromising our convictions of right, and no better than trifling with sacred things. But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another.—1 John i. 3. In such union is strength; not only because we have fellowship one with another, but also with the Father and with his Son Jesus Christ.—1 John i. 7. Such fellowship we love; such union we desire. A union with the Father and his Son unites all that sustain such relationship. Such a union will be salutary and lasting; and peace, the spontaneous outgrowth of such union, will be permanent, not as an emanation of carnality, but as heaven born principles.

This union we can have; this peace is ours to enjoy; and what blessedness is contained in the combination. Justified by faith, at peace with God, a Union with Christ, fellowship one with another, and Life eternal in the kingdom of God.

So the Psalmist viewed it as he sung, Behold how good and how pleasant for brethren to dwell together in unity. It is like the precious ointment that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard. As the dew descendeth upon the mountains of Zion, for there the Lord commanded the blessing, even Life forevermore.—Psa. xxxxiii.

Thoughts in Solitude.

BY H. TAGERT, M. D.

As you are all gathered now, having an interchange of thought and striving to make progress in the Vineyard, I am closing a brief review of the Book of Revelation, and while contemplating the privilege of Christian association was led to consider the state of John on the barren isle of Patmos, and, before I was aware, the transporting scenes, the heaven illuminating influences of the Spirit carried me away from thinking on the present, and all its depressing influences, to that period when all in heaven and on earth shall join in ascribing "Blessing, and honor, and power, and Glory unto him that sitteth upon the throne, and unto the Lamb forever and ever."

Then, oh that influence known only to the Christian, that secret of the Lord which is with them that serve him, there is no desert Patmos or earthly cave or dungeon, or solitary state can hide the rays of glory from the heart of the humble followers of the Saviour, who are "rejoicing in hope of eternal Life." Sure testimony declares, that which is "perfect" will soon come; all science, all learning, all inventions, all signs in heaven and on earth declare the great crisis just at hand, while to all this testimony the world is blinded and their darkness is increasing. But, brethren and sisters, ye are not in darkness. Then let us all walk as children of the light, having fellowship with each other and feel the cleansing efficacy of the blood of Jesus Christ which cleanseth from all sin.

Shelburne, Vt., Sept. 1870.

Bishop Whately on the End of Evil.

Bishop Whately says: "When we are told that Christ is to "reign till He shall have put all things under his feet," and the last enemy that shall be destroyed is death;" this does afford some ground for expecting the ultimate extinction of evil and suffering, by the total destruction of such as are incapable of good and of happiness. If "eternal death" means final death—death without any revival—we can understand what is meant by "Death being the last enemy destroyed," viz., that none henceforth are to be subjected to it. But if "death" be understood to mean everlasting life in misery, then it would appear that death is never to be destroyed at all; since, although no one should be henceforth sentenced to it, it would still be going on as a continual infliction forever.

"On the whole, therefore, I think we are not warranted in concluding (as some have done) so positively concerning this question as to make it a point of Christian faith to interpret figuratively, and not literally, the 'death' and the 'destruction' spoken of in the Scripture as the doom of the condemned; and to insist on the belief that they are to be kept alive forever.

"'Life,' as applied to the condition of the righteous is usually understood to mean 'happy life.' And that theirs will be a happy life, we are indeed plainly taught; but I do not think we are anywhere taught that the word 'life' does of itself necessarily imply happiness. If so, indeed, it would be a mere tautology to speak of a 'happy life,' and a contradiction to speak of a 'miserable life;' which we know is not the case according to the usage of any language. In all ages and countries, 'life,' and the words answering to it in other languages, have always been applied, in ordinary discourse, to wretched life no less properly than to a happy one.

Life, therefore, in the received sense of the word, would apply equally to the condition of the blest and the condemned, supposing these last to be destined to continue forever living in a state of misery. And yet, to their condition the words 'life' and 'immortality' never are applied in Scripture. If, therefore, we suppose the hearers of Jesus and his apostles to have understood, as nearly as possible, in the ordinary sense, the words employed, they must naturally have conceived them to mean (if they were taught nothing to the contrary), that the condemned were really and literally to be destroyed, and cease to exist; not that they were to exist forever in a state of wretchedness. For they are never spoken of as being kept alive, but as forfeiting life; as for instance—'Ye will not come unto me that ye may have life;' 'He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God, hath not life.' And again, 'perdition,' 'death' 'destruction,' are employed in numerous passages to express the doom of the condemned. All which expression would, as I have said, be naturally taken in their usual and obvious sense, if nothing were taught to the contrary." —Future States.

To realize the importance of forgiving others, just think how pleasant it is to be forgiven.

What Became of the Little Birds?

In a pleasant valley of the Hartz mountains there lies a little village, so covered and penned in that the news of the world seldom gets there. The name of that village is Friedenrode. As it lies just in the midst of mountains, unless you knew the paths very well you could not find it at all. The people who live there seldom go out to the large cities. The schoolmaster and the doctor and the pastor are the only persons who have ever seen a large city. In the summer time the village village presents a beautiful appearance. Every house has its little garden and door-yard. Then in the orchard there are fruit trees of many different kinds.

At the farthest end of the village, where the mountains come close together, and only afford a narrow road by which the people can leave home, there is a very small and neat cottage. It is built of wood, and covered with straw. In this cottage Colestin Wagner lived. He was a wood-cutter, and had a wife and two sons. Colestin was a poor man, whose labor was constantly required to support his family. If he had not possessed a cow, and a few goats, that supported themselves by wandering through the forest and getting all they could eat there, Colestin could not have maintained himself. One of his sons was named Fried, and the other Hubert. One day the two boys were out in the woods with their father, when he was chopping wood. Hubert, who was the oldest, had climbed a tree and was swinging on one of its branches; but suddenly the limb broke and he fell to the ground. He was severely hurt. One of his legs was broken, and his father had to carry him home. It was a long time before he was able to walk about the house. When he could walk, his parents found, to their great sorrow, that he would be lame for life: for the physician did not know how to set his leg well.

It was a great denial to Hubert to be compelled to stay in the house or walk about in the little garden, for he loved the forest, and nothing delighted him more than to go with his father and enjoy himself in the woods. Colestin and his wife grieved a great deal over Hubert's fate; "for," said they, "he will never be able to support himself, and his lameness will always be an affliction to him. But never mind; we will do the best we can for his support."

By and by Hubert became strong enough to limp along with his father and go with him into the forest. He would spend a whole day in walking about and listening to the singing of the birds. He became so fond of their singing, and listened to them so attentively, that he finally learned how to imitate some of them. One day he set to work to make a bird cage; and he did it in such a way that, if a bird should hop down on top of it, it would be caught as if in a trap. Hubert practiced imitating the songs of birds carefully every day, and so successful was he in his undertaking, that he finally learned how to imitate all the nice singing birds in the woods. He would conceal himself in a little clump of bushes, near which his cage was set. Then he began to imitate some singing bird, until by and by the bird that he was imitating would answer him. Hubert would answer in return, just as if he were a bird, and then the bird would come closer and closer to the cage, thinking all the time that one of its mates was close at hand. Suddenly the trap would spring, and the bird would be caught. Then Herbert would take it out and put it in another cage that he had there, and at night carry it home and sell it for a few cents to old Hame, the bird-seller of Friedenrode.

By this means Hubert made a little money, occasionally, which he gave to his parents, and which aided in his support. He had no knowledge of the true value of the birds he caught, and therefore sold them for anything that old Hame had a mind to offer him.

One day Hubert was in the woods engaged in his usual occupation. He had no trouble that day in catching birds. Just as often as he would imitate one, and catch it he would immediately imitate another, and catch that too. When the sun was about an hour high he had twenty-five different kinds of birds safely confined, and was just going home. Suddenly he heard a rustling of the leaves and saw a strange man close by him. The man's name was Kisko, and and he was evidently from some other place than Friedenrode. He engaged in conversation with Hubert, and asked him all about the beautiful birds that he had caught.

"Will you sell them to me?" said Kisko.

"Yes, sir," said Hubert, "if you will give me enough for them."

"I'll tell you what I will do," said Kisko. "I will take them home with me to Russia, and sell them in the city of St. Petersburg. I will give you a handsome profit if they sell well enough. I will give you now five cents apiece for them. Next spring I will be in Friedenrode again to catch birds myself, for that is my business. If your birds sell well, I will settle in full with you at that time, and I think you will be satisfied with your success."

Now Hubert had never received more than three cents apiece for his birds from old Hame; so he thought he would make a very good bargain even if he never saw Kisko again, and never received any more money from him.

Autumn came. In November Colestin was taken very sick. A doctor came to see him, and told him it would be a long time before he would be well again, for his disease was of a serious nature. Week after week passed by, until the weeks grew into months. It was fully four months after Colestin was taken sick that he could sit on the bench in front of his cottage door. By this time his family were in great want, and it became almost certain that his wife would have to sell the cow in order that they might be supported. One morning, at the breakfast table, Colestin's wife said: "We must sell the cow this day. To live on nothing is impossible."

"Oh!" said Hubert, with tears in his eyes, "oh, mother! don't sell the cow. Can't I do something to keep us from parting with her?"

She replied: "My child, we are starving; and the cow can save us for a little while."

"Then won't you wait three days, mother, before you sell her? For I do believe that God will provide for us within that time."

She answered: "Possibly we might, but we would be very hungry in the mean time. Still," she added, "let us do it if it is a possible thing."

The first and second days came and went without relief. Now the afternoon of the third day had come. Hubert and his brother had wandered out in one of the mountain paths to gather a few sticks for firewood. They saw a gentleman coming along on horseback. It was none other than Kisko. Hubert's heart leaped for joy, for he remembered what Kisko had said to him about selling his birds in St. Petersburg.

"You are the boy," said Kisko, "whom I want to see. I want us to engage together in business; for the birds that you sold me were the finest I have taken to St. Petersburg. I was told on the way there that they were a very superior kind, and knowing that they sung so beautifully, and having learned that the Emperor was very fond of singing birds, I took twenty-one of them to his palace—for four had died on the way. It had so happened in my favor that the Emperor had told his porter always to admit anybody who had birds for sale, and no sooner did the porter see my little cages with birds in them, than he said, "Come in, the Emperor will be glad to see you." In half an hour I was brought into the presence of the Emperor himself. He was delighted with my birds, and asked me a great many questions about them. He wished to know whether I caught them or got somebody else to do it; and he was very anxious to know what part of the world they came from. Then I told him about you, Hubert, and how successfully you could imitate almost any bird; that you were a lame boy; and that your parents were poor. My story at once appealed to his sympathies. He bought the birds, and gave a good price for them. Then he drew from his pocket five pieces of money and told me to present them to you. Here they are? You will find that they are five large pieces of gold. I also received a good deal more for the birds than I expected; and I will now pay you for them."

Kisko then paid over to Hubert, in addition to the pieces of gold, thirty-nine dollars and eighty cents, as his part of the profit on the birds. Hubert was now almost wild with joy at such success. He felt that the little prayer which he and his brother had offered that afternoon in the woods was now answered. The cow would not be sold. They were richer than they had ever been before. Joy and gladness prevailed once more in that little thatched cottage. Deliverance came at the end of the third day, and the cow was not sold.

Hubert entered into partnership with Kisko, and every year he succeded in catching a great many valuable birds. The following year Kisko would return and pay him large sums of money as his portion of the profits.

Hubert's brother was very anxious to get an education, and one day Hubert said at the table: "Brother, you wish to be a lawyer; I have now enough money to send you to a school in Brunswick. You can leave home in two weeks time and I will support you."

Hubert was true to his word; and for six full years kept his brother at school studying law. At the same time Hubert's profits from his birds were sufficient to enable him to support his father and mother, and to provide them with every necessary comfort.

Thus God made that lame boy the instrument of saving all the family from starvation at a time of great need, and also of educating his brother for professional life. So does God sometimes use the most unpromising agents as instruments of blessing.—Selected.

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should allow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is of desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character; that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures." The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

"THE JUDGMENT."

A REVIEW BY MARK E. GREEN.

AN article appeared in the "World's Crisis" Oct. 5, under the above head, from J. W. Taylor, which is intended to show that the resurrection must take place before the judgment, and hence, the righteous and wicked must stand and be judged. He says:

> The old theory of punishing men before they are judged has long since been exploded; and now the theory of judging them before they are raised wants exploding also; and THEN THEOLOGY will be pretty straight. As this thing is easily done, we have a good reason to hope.

Let us examine a few of his texts that he quotes to blow up the "theory" which will make "theol gy pretty straight." The first text our attention is called to is in Acts xvii. 31, "Because he has appointed a day in the which he will judge the world in righteousness." Does this text prove that men are dead or alive when they are judged? Surely not. The n xt text quoted is 2 Tim. iv. 1, "I charge thee, therefore, before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the quick and the dead at his appearing and his kingdom." This text proves too much for the purpose he intended; for, some are dead and some are alive when they are judged; for the living must refer to those that are alive when he comes, and the dead to those that have died before he comes. If they were all made alive before they were judged, it would be judging living men only, and not dead men.

Text number three is quoted to make it sure that the dead are raised before they are judged. "And the sea gave up the dead which were in it, and death and the grave or hades gave up the dead which were in them, and they were judged every man according to their works."—Rev. xx. 13.

If we consult the previous text, we learn that the dead were judged while they were dead, which shows, conclusively, that this text quoted is the judging of death and hades. The Syriac reads, "And the sea gave up the dead in it; and death and the grave gave up the dead in them. And they were judged each one according to his deeds;" and death and the grave were judged and "cast into the lake of fire, which is called the second death." The question might be asked, Did death and the grave ever have a first death? I answer, Yes. Says Jesus, I am he that liveth and was dead; and behold I am alive forevermore, Amen; and have the keys of hades and of death."

Here we see there is one that has been under the power of death, and death is killed for the first time. Jesus not only destroyed death, but he has the keys of the grave and of death to let out his church, which are under their power, which Paul calls the last enemy; and when death is destroyed again it will be the second time, and therefore a second death. There is one thing certain, that death is not destroyed under which the wicked are held. Death is a state; it is not dying, as some will have it. Death is that which follows dying; it is a state in which the grave receives as its tenant. Let us examine the connection in the previous verse: "And I saw the dead small and great stand before God; and the books were opened; and another book was opened, which was the book of life; and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books according to their works." There are no living men here; they are all dead.

But you will say, How can a dead man stand? I would ask, Was there any books with the records of every man's life? Were they bonafida books, a life-book and a death-book? If not, why make the dead stand literally? Are the books not symbolic, used to convey to our finite minds that God takes an account of our deeds, as we are being tried, while on probation? and therefore when the great assize is finished, the trial is finished, a decision is rendered, and the righteous will be brought forth from the power of death. To suppose that God keeps a Secretary to keep his books is absurd. God, who notices the hairs of our heads which are numbered, so that one cannot fall without his notice, needs no books to see whose names are registered for life or death. The record is in the one who is on trial; for Paul says, "Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of his." "But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken, or make alive, your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."—Rom. viii. Everything in the judgment seen in the book of Rev. xx., is highly symbolic; and when men are driven to that book to prove the resurrection of all men, it is evident that the explosive material for "exploding the theory that men are judged before the resurrection" is very scarce: and their evidence that they must be "raised" or made alive before being judged is equally scarce.

Let us look at this subject through the new theology, and see if our brother is not, unawares, (for I believe he is too superstitious on this point, as I was once, but yet honest), advocating a figment of the "old theology which has been long since exploded." It will be equally absurd to judge a man after he is rewarded, as it would be to "punish men before they are judged." And if it can be shown that the resurrection from the dead is the reward of the righteous, then the view that men must be "raised," and then judged, is an offshoot of the "old theology."

We will do as our brother has done, appeal to Paul, 1 Cor., xv.: "So also the resurrection of the dead: It is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption. It is sown in dishonor, it is raised in glory. It is sown in weakness, it is raised in power. It is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body." "And the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." Here are four times Paul declares that the dead are rewarded by or in the resurrection from the dead. Paul had no idea that men had to be "raised" to be judged. Paul suffered the loss of all things that he might "know him (Christ) and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death; if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection out from among the dead." Jesus and Paul speak the same language. "And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day." "That every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day."—John vi. We might quote text after text, on this point, that proves conclusively that the resurrection constitutes the reward of the righteous, and therefore the judgment for the righteous and the wicked (for they are both judged at the same time), is in the past when the resurrection takes place.

We will now quote a few texts to prove that the wicked will not awake from their sleep. Jeremiah, in chapter li. 57, speaking of the Belshazzar feast, (see Dan. v. 1), says, "I will make drunk her princes and her wise men, her captains and her rulers and her mighty men, and they shall sleep a perpetual sleep and not awake, saith the King whose name is the LORD of hosts." Isaiah says the same thing, chap. xxvi. 14. Again Prov. xxi. 16, "The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding shall remain in the congregation of the dead."

But you will ask, Did not Jesus say, "All that are in the graves shall hear his voice, and shall come forth; they that have done good unto the resurrection of life; and they that have done evil to the resurrection of condemnation?"—John v. 28, 29. This text is made the corner-stone to silence all argument set forth against the non-reliving of those that are bitten with mortality, and refuse to look on Christ and be healed. Does not this text conflict with Jesus' himself? and with Paul and the prophets? as we have shown; and does it not, if understood to be a literal resurrection, contradict Daniel emphatically? Daniel says, "And at that time thy people shall be delivered every one that shall be found written in the book (of life). And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake; some to everlasting life and some to shame and everlasting contempt."—Dan. xii. Many of can never mean all; that is sure. Many may take in the whole. Learned men who understand the Hebrew, see that the translation in our common version makes the text obscure. Prof. Whiting says, "There is an obscurity in this passage produced by an improper rendering of the Hebrew word ailleth, wealleth. They are translated in this instance 'some and some.' Now the phrase composed of the pronoun ailleth with the conjunction waw, joined to ailleth is the proper expression for these and those." Prof. Bush renders it the same way, and says, "The awaking is evidently predicted of the many, and not of the whole. Consequently, the these, in the one case, must be understood of the class that awake; and those, in the other case, of them that remain asleep." The learned lexicographer Gesenius testifies that the Hebrew word thus rendered "designates a part taken out of the whole."

Shall we give an interpretation to any portion of Scripture that clashes with the prophets and Jesus himself, who says, nearly in the same connection, that, "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not on the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him?" Again, I would ask, Are there not objections to be urged against every doctrine? Suppose we take the doctrine that man is totally mortal, and when he is dead he is all dead, not conscious in death. O, says the objector, our Lord says, "Fear not them which kill the body, but are not able to kill the soul;" and does not that prove that a man is not dead when he is dead? How is this question to be answered? By comparing Scripture with Scripture; and we find that is the only text that positively teaches that man is dual. The text in John v. 28, 29, is the only text that speaks in what seems to be a positive manner in reference to the resurrection of the unjust; and shall we not adopt the same plan to settle the question on this point?

Again: the question might be asked, "For what purpose are the wicked raised? Who can it benefit? Certainly not the righteous. It would not increase their happiness. Can it be to appease the wrath of God, who is all love? Prof. Hudson, on the resurrection of the unjust, says, "It is hard to believe that they are raised up by a miracle that ends in their destruction, or that accomplishes nothing but a judgment, which in this view must appear simply vindictive. If they have no immortality why are their slumbers disturbed?"

This is the thought of every candid, thinking man who does not believe in the "old theory" that a man is alive when he is dead. Where is the man or woman, that has the Spirit of Christ, that would like to see the wicked punished because they refused to have life through the LIFE-GIVER, even if they had been very wicked?

There is one more text I wish to notice, which our brother quotes, Dan. vii. 10, in reference to the judgment being set. Daniel says, "A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him; thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him; the judgment was set and the books were opened."

This text somewhat corresponds with Rev. xx. 11, 12, and evidently is highly symbolical, for the next verse says, "I beheld then (while the judgment was set) because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake; I beheld even till the beast was slain, and his body was destroyed and given to the burning flame." Here we see the horn as defiant and more so just when the judgment is set. What greater words could be spoken than has just been spoken by the Pope, the representative of this horn? In consequence of these words, "MENE, Mene Tekel, Upharsin" has been written on the walls of the Vatican; for, the next day after the promulgation of the Pope's infallibility, all support was withdrawn from him. "Language could not be more explicit" that the judgment takes place before the resurrection. The doctrine of the resurrection, and then the judgment, is nothing more nor less than a figment of the "old theology;" for it makes the judgment take place after the reward is given.

BY JOEL A. SIMONDS.

THOU shalt surely die, is the penalty of the law under which Adam was to live forever, if he had continued loyal. Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return, is the first description of the punishment of the wicked under the gospel. The punishment of the wicked under the law, without any reference to the gospel, and the punishment under the gospel are exactly the same. Both seem to be alike complete and final. They were both made known at just the right time to affect the whole race. To secure the execution of this punishment, Adam was excluded from the tree of life, lest he should eat of it, and live forever. This punishment was executed upon the first sinner: All the days that Adam lived, were nine hundred and thirty years, and he died. The description of this punishment in the law, and under the gospel, and in its execution, is the same. It seems to be the whole of the punishment. Nothing more was demanded, and nothing more was executed. We know what this punishment is, just as well as we can know any thing from description. The language is just as simple, complete, and final, as can be used: "Thou shalt surely die." "Unto dust shalt thou return"—"and he died." The description cannot be more definite or complete than it is. We know, then, what it is. And Paul says, that this punishment is the punishment that hath passed upon all men. If this is so, the whole Bible should sustain this view. I will now call attention to

THE GENERAL TENOR OF THE BIBLE ON THIS QUESTION.

The Flood.

God saw that the wickedness of man was great; and he said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth: and again he said, I will destroy all flesh wherein is the breath of life; and everything that is in the earth shall die: and again, Every living substance that I have made will I destroy. These are the words by which God described the punishment he was about to bring upon the world. The flood came: and he said, All flesh died, of fowl, of cattle, of beast, and every creeping thing, and every man: all in whose nostrils was the breath of life, died; and every living substance was destroyed, and Noah only, and they that were with him in the ark, remained alive. Was this judgment right? Was it final? Was it in harmony with his law? Did they all die and return to dust? Will this judgment be reversed? What is the obvious sense of the language used in reference to this judgment? Does it not seem to be a complete description of the whole punishment as a final result? Must they be punished again?

Sodom and Gomorrah.

Their sin became very grievous. The Lord sent angels to destroy them, and fire came down from heaven and destroyed them. He did just what he said he would do. Was this enough? Did they die and return to dust? Has the law had its full demand of them? Was this judgment final, or will it be reversed?

Egypt.

God said to Abraham that, his seed should serve a strange people, and that he would judge the nation whom they should serve. When the children of Israel went out of the land of Egypt, Pharaoh followed them, and was overthrown in the Red Sea. Was this right? Was it enough? Was it according to law? Did they return to dust? Does it seem to be final? Why reverse this judgment?

The Judgment of Israel in the Wilderness.

The children of Israel sinned against the Lord. And the Lord said, that they should not go into the land of promise; that they should be wasted in the wilderness until they were consumed. They were thus wasted and consumed, and only Caleb and Joshua went into the land of promise. Was this a righteous judgment? Why, then, reverse it? Was this in harmony with the law? Did they return to dust? Why, then, is it not final? Why is it not enough?

These instances of judgment are sufficient to show the general tenor of the Old Testament on the subject. They are in complete harmony with the penalty of the law. They are examples to them that should afterward live ungodly. But they are not examples of the punishment of the resurrected wicked. Thus far, God has punished the wicked according to his own law. Death is that punishment, and no farther demand is made upon them.

How does the New Testament treat this Subject?

Four thousand years of the world's history are now past, and no mention is made of any additional punishment to that described in the law. Does the New Testament teach that the wicked will be made alive and punished again, after having been punished according to the law? The Saviour says, Wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction. Does this destruction mean any thing more than the destruction by the flood, or the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah? Is it not the same? The tower of Siloam fell on eighteen persons and slew them. The Saviour said, Suppose ye that they were sinners above all men that dwelt at Jerusalem? I tell you nay, but except ye repent ye shall all likewise perish. All who do not repent shall perish as really, and as finally, as those did upon whom the tower of Siloam fell. Does this passage teach any thing differently from the law, which says, Thou shalt surely die? Again: As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so, must the Son of man be lifted up; that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have everlasting life. All who do not believe on the Son, will perish, just as they would have done, if the Son of man had not been lifted up. Does this differ from the punishment in the law? He that believeth on the Son is not condemned; but he that believeth not on the Son is condemned already. Condemned to what? To perish. By what authority? The law, Thou shalt surely die.

Paul says, The wages of sin is death. The end of sin is death. That he that is dead, is freed from sin. Is death the punishment of all sin? Is it complete and final? Does it mean any more in this place than it does in the law? Again he says, That he that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption. All who sow to the flesh will reap corruption. Is this all? When will they reap corruption? Will they reap it when they turn to dust? Does not this meet the whole demand of the law? Again: Paul says, The word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression received a just recompense of reward. All, who lived before Paul, lived under the word spoken by angels. If they had already received a just recompense of reward, what more can be demanded of them? Would it be just to punish them any more?

James said, That when sin is finished it bringeth forth death; and, if we convert a man from the error of his way we save him from death. All who are not converted from the error of their ways, are lost in death. Is this punishment according to the law? Will those who suffer it return to dust? Then, the punishment is complete and final.

Peter and Jude say, That the destruction of the world by a flood, and the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah by fire, were examples of God's judgments to them that afterward should live ungodly. They were not examples of the manner of their destruction, but of the destruction itself.

The descriptions of punishment I have given, are sufficient to show the general tenor of the New Testament upon this subject. Its testimony is in complete harmony with itself, and with the judgments recorded in the Old Testament, and with the law which God gave to the world when he made it. The penalty of the law, and the punishment under the gospel are the same. All classes of wicked men receive the same punishment. There is but one punishment for sin. It is comprehended in the description given in the law, "Thou shalt surely die." It is the rule by which God must be governed in all his judgments. With this, the general tenor of the Bible agrees.

All who have transgressed the word spoken by angels have received a just recompense of reward. All who walk the broad road to the end, go to destruction. All who do not believe on the Son, and repent of their sins, will perish.

All who sow to the flesh, will reap corruption. The wages of all sin, is death. All who live ungodly will be destroyed, as the world in the time of the flood, and as Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed. All of these different descriptions of punishment mean the same thing. When it is once received it is never to be repeated. It is as complete and final as is the sentence to be hung. In all this testimony there is no intimation that it will be inflicted after death. What, then, is the general tenor of the whole Bible on this subject?

1. That the penalty described in the law, "Thou shalt surely die," is the punishment of the wicked, complete and final.

2. That the first description of the punishment of the wicked under the gospel, "Dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return," is their punishment, complete and final.

3. That the obvious sense of the language used in the Old and New Testaments, to describe the punishment of the wicked, is in perfect harmony with the penalty of the law. That it is one punishment, complete and final, whenever it occurs.

If there are a few passages that seem to teach otherwise, it must be conceded that the general and obvious sense of the Scriptures is as stated above.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., Oct., 1870.

THE JUDGMENTS.

BY HELEN ROBERTSON.

"COME, my people, enter thou into thy chambers, and shut thy doors about thee: hide thyself as it were for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast. For, behold, the Lord cometh out of his place to punish the inhabitants of the earth for their iniquity: the earth also shall disclose her blood, and shall no more cover her slain."

The Lord is out of his place now, executing the judgments written, and winding up this present dispensation. The question naturally comes up, Wilt thou slay the righteous with the wicked, and shall the righteous be as the wicked? To solve this question let us look at past judgments, and when past dispensations were wound up.

With regard to the antediluvian world it is written, "God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth. And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth. And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth. But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord." "The eyes of the Lord run to and fro throughout the whole earth, to show himself strong in the behalf of them whose heart is perfect toward him."

Here the Lord found one man whose heart was perfect toward him, and he could not destroy him with the wicked, but instructed him to build an ark for the salvation of himself and his household. Noah obeyed the Lord and escaped.

Again: when the Lord was about to destroy Sodom and Gomorrah, he said, "Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do?" When the Lord told Abraham, he began to plead for the righteous, and said, "That be far from thee to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked; and that the righteous should be as the wicked; that be far from thee: shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" Abraham began with fifty, but came down to ten, "and He said, I will not destroy it for ten's sake." But, alas, ten could not be found. Only Lot and his wife and two daughters. Did God then slay the righteous with the wicked? No, no. He sent his messengers and gathered out his elect, and showed them a place of safety. If they had disobeyed the righteous mandate, and stayed by their property, they would no doubt have perished with the workers of iniquity.

Let us at this present time "Remember Lot's wife." Jesus told his disciples, "When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then know that the desolation thereof is nigh. Then let them which are in Judea flee to the mountains; and let them which are in the midst of it, depart out. For these be the days of vengeance, that all things which are written may be fulfilled."

In obedience is safety. The disciples did as they were told; and history tells us that not so much as one of the Christians perished in the destruction of Jerusalem.

The same Jesus foretells another destruction, and gives plain signs whereby it may be known when it is coming. Most of those signs are in the past; some of them are right before us now. Wars, pestilences, hurricanes, and earthquakes in divers places. Is God going to destroy the righteous with the wicked? No, no. There is a place of safety. Where is it? In Christ. The Psalmist says, "He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." "Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night, nor for the arrow that flieth by day; nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday. Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked. Because thou hast made the Lord, which is my refuge, even the Most High thy habitation." Some say these promises are for Christ. True. If we are in him will we be hurt? We believe not.

"Watch ye, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of man." "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth."

Those promises are great; still, yea and amen in Christ Jesus. Let us stablish our hearts, for the coming of the Lord draws nigh. Let us be so in communion with God, that we shall understand when he says, "Come, my people, enter into thy chambers." That God who took care of Daniel in the den of lions; who shut their mouths that they could not hurt him; and who also preserved his three children, who trusted in him, in the midst of the burning fiery furnace; heated seven times: yes, we say, that same God is able to keep us now in the midst of earth's desolation and destruction, if we trust in him. "The rains descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house, and it fell not, for it was founded upon a rock."

HOW SHALL MINISTERS PREPARE THEIR SERMONS?

OH, sit down in your study, bar the door, and say to all callers, "You must not disturb me." Then take your authors: read, study, meditate. Be determined to make a grand sermon. When your mind is full of it, then seize a pen and make it do the bidding of the intellect. Garnish it here and there with a little poetry, so that it may not prove too dry; and when you have completed it, preach it over to the imaginary congregation, and see how in your opinion it will tell. This is the way some ministers—and popular ones, too—make their sermons. The people stare and wonder at the immense learning, and the rhetorical finish, and the eloquent diction. They retire, complimenting their minister, declaring they don't wish to hear any better preaching than that.

Another minister goes to work in a very different way. He says to himself: "I must watch for these souls as one who is to give an account." He, too, shuts his study door and bars it. He must not be interrupted. But why? Because he is on his knees asking God's Holy Spirit to direct his mind, and take out of his heart the selfish desires of human applause. "What subject shall I take?" he inquires, "which will be most likely to benefit spiritually my hearers?" But the answer must be found outside the study. So he goes among his people, and ascertains as far as possible what kind of soul feed they need. Having got the clue, he goes back to his study, and with much prayer he renews the work of preparation. He literally prays the sermon into pungency and power; or, if Christian experience be the theme, he is enabled to lead his flock into green pastures, and beside the still waters. His heart is in that sermon; and when he delivers it, the people say, "It was good for us to be there." He neither asks nor receives any compliments. His reward is, first, in having discharged his duty; and second, in hearing that soul has been convicted of sin; or some Christian heart been lifted out of the depths of despair.

To live nobly, we must be noble; and we become noble by resolutely banishing every unworthy thought and feeling.

Then and Now.

The spiritual degeneracy and worldliness of the Jews immediately prior to the first advent of the Redeemer, is a matter deserving some thought by the professed people of God at the present time. The Messiah had been promised of the seed of Abraham, and being Abraham's descendants, they looked forward to the fulfilment of the promise. On account of their transgression, we are told, the Law was given them as a "schoolmaster," to bring them on to the appointed time. Everything in the operations of the Law had a spiritual significance—pointing to the Messiah and his future reign. The Jews understood this, no doubt, to a greater extent the nearer they lived to God. But they gradually degenerated, growing selfish and self-righteous, worldly, proud and arrogant, heaping to themselves traditions, hard-hearted and cold toward God, and consequently blind as to the signs of the time toward which they were now looking—the advent of the Messiah. They were tenacious about the forms of the Law, but had lost all clue to the spiritual significance of those ceremonies. They looked for the Messiah only in theory, not in reality. Had they been looking in reality for him, they would surely have discerned the signs of his coming, and would have recognized in Jesus the fulfilment of the "promise made to the fathers (as, indeed, some of the more devout ones did);" but, on the contrary, they were asking, "Where is the sign of his coming?" The Messiah came upon them unawares, and they having trusted their forms and ceremonies, their traditions, their Doctors and Scribes, in fact everything but the more sure word of prophecy, were found altogether unprepared for him.

How is it with the professed people of God to-day? The similarity of their condition to that of the Jews is too striking to pass unnoticed. Jesus promised his disciples that he would come again; that he would bring his reward with him—give them a crown of life, when he came "the second time, unto salvation." He gave them certain signs of the approach of his coming, and commanded them to watch. He told them "when these things begin to come to pass, lift up your heads, your redemption draweth nigh." These promises were once the life of the church; but they have gradually given way to fables and theories of "vain philosophy"—the doctrines and teaching of men. Instead of being a separate and peculiar people, by their walk and conversation, the professed disciples mingle in all the follies and frivolities of the world, vieing with unbelievers in all the races for worldly honor and gain. Instead of giving the heart to God, they depend upon the forms and ceremonies of a cold church membership, denouncing all who presume to tell them of their true condition. Their expectations of the Redeemer's return is all in theory, and the signs of his coming are passing unheeded. They are virtually asking "where is the sign of his coming?" and in fact the time is thought of with feelings more of dread than of rejoicing. The service is more a matter of form and fashion than a desire to worship God. This very degeneracy is an indication of the approaching time. "In such an hour as ye think not," the Lord will be upon us, and we are in danger of not being ready to receive him.—The Nazarene.

Handle rough-sided men carefully. It pays to take a little time when you are opening chestnut-burs.

OBITUARY.

Johnson.—Fell asleep in Christ, in Plainville, Conn., Oct. 24, Caroline B. Johnson, wife of Dennis Johnson, aged 64 years.

Sister Johnson embraced Christ about forty years ago, and maintained her Christian integrity until she became irresponsible through the failure of her mental powers, about seven years ago, since which time she has suffered much. Reason seemed occasionally to flash its light across her mind when she would speak of "Jesus and his love." Nearly two years ago her only remaining son, Hiram L. Johnson, fell asleep in the blessed hope. This son had embraced the truth of Christ's speedy coming and kindred truths, and was instrumental in leading his father into the light in which he now rejoices, and which is his comfort and stay in his loneliness. He is awaiting the glorious moment when his companion and son shall come forth from the tomb clothed with immortality. May it speedily come! Words of comfort were spoken by the writer. Wm. N. Pile.

Cobb.—Fell asleep in Jesus, George Cobb, of Philadelphia, Pa., in the 71st year of his age.

It becomes our painful duty to record the death of another of our number. Br. Cobb and his wife have been numbered with us for many years. He was slow but sure in his advancement into truth; and at the time of his death was fully satisfied that his awakening out of sleep depended wholly upon being united to Christ.

At the request of his wife, we attended the funeral, in connection with Br. Burbank. The Life views were presented both at the house and at the grave. Br. Cobb was a member of the Baptist church, with us, some thirty-five years ago; and we have been acquainted during all that time, but more particularly since he embraced the Life views. Br. Cobb, we believe, was gathered to his fathers like a shock of corn fully ripe, ready to be gathered into the kingdom of God in the morning of the resurrection. May we all be ready for the kingdom of God.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 2, 1870.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Editor has been quite unwell for two weeks past, and to-day (Tuesday), as the Herald goes to press, he is unable to be at the office. He hopes to be better in a few days.

"The Age to Come."

We cheerfully give place to Br. Grim's article on the above subject. We have no wish to interpose any obstacle in the way of a kind and friendly interchange of views on that question. Let all the writers on the subject be as short as possible, and please avoid the assumption that some of the prophecies are conditional. We have no fears that Br. Grim will do that, for he put the subject in its true light in an article published in the Herald of Life several months since. He gave utterance, in a dialogue, to the following sound definition of prophecy:

G.—I understand a prophecy to be an event that takes place, or is to take place, in which there can be no change or condition. I will give you an illustration. Num. xxiv. 17. "I shall see it (the destruction of Moab), but not now. I shall behold it, but not nigh: there shall come a star out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall arise out of Israel, and shall smite the corners of Moab and destroy all the children of Seth." Also Dan. ii. 29. "As for thee, O, king, thy thoughts came into thy mind upon thy bed what shall come to pass hereafter: and he that revealeth secrets maketh known to thee what shall come to pass." Then follows the history of the world. Now God just takes Nebuchadnezzar and sets him down at the end of the age, and asks him to look at the map of the world. We make our maps of the world after the history had been completed. In prophecy God makes the history of the world as it will be; or, in other words, he takes the prophet and sets him down at the end of the age and shows him the world's history in advance. Now there are no ifs or ands in the matter, for the prophet sees the thing done. The prophet saw five universal kingdoms, and nothing can change the programme.

C.—Is there nothing that man can do to alter the condition of the world from what Daniel saw in vision?

G.—No: if there could be any change then Daniel would not have seen it. You might just as well ask me if there can be any change in history of the United States that is past. If God had given us a history it would have contained the rebellion, and all the outgrowths. Prophecy is merely writing history in advance.

Others, however, have sent us long articles, based on the assumption that many of the prophecies are conditional, that is, such as they cannot harmonize with their rejection of the age to come. Such a setting aside of prophecies unsettles all faith; for, once establish that principle, and there is no foundation on which to build with certainty. Who can tell which prophecy is unconditional till it is actually fulfilled? Then what becomes of the prophecy, that, "There was given to one like the Son of man dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve and obey him;" and that "the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High?" Yea, what becomes of all those prophecies which relate to Christ's return from heaven? Who can tell us, after all, but what all these prophetic utterances are conditional, and hence uncertain, or refer only to a spiritual manifestation? Then where do we stand? Launched forth into a sea of uncertainty. None of these events have yet occurred; and who can assure our faith they ever will? Surely no conditional interpreter of prophecy can do it.

We are willing to discuss the question of a future age, and trust we can do it with a Christian spirit, but we must decline any discussion with such as assume prophecies are conditional. Promises and threatenings may both be conditional; but not prophecies: they are historic records, penned by the infallible Spirit of God, and cannot fail of being fulfilled, however impossible it may seem to us. By not adhering to this rule, the Jews overlooked the suffering Messiah. By overlooking this truth, are we not equally liable to err as to Messiah's reign over "the kingdoms of this world?"

If Br. Grim can make it plain that there is no future age, or dispensation, in which some portion of the human family are still to have a trial for life, we shall cheerfully assent to his position. But let it be understood, we do not believe in fixing the period of that age to any specified time. There are to be an "endless succession of ages."—Macknight's translation of Ephesians iii. 21.

What will be the character of this "endless" chain of ages, we are not told, except that they will all bring "glory to God, by or for, Jesus Christ."—Eph. iii. 20, 21.

The Kingdom of God.

WHAT IS IT? AND WHERE IS IT?

[Concluded from last week.]

THE WORK OF MESSIAH AT HIS FIRST ADVENT.

Messiah did not come the first time to Restore the kingdom, but to prepare his followers to be Rulers in it when restored, and over all the earth. He first offered this honor to the Jews. It had originally been offered to the whole of Jacob's posterity, shortly after their advent from Egypt. Thus, Exodus xix. 5, 6, the Lord said—"If ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then shall ye be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people—for all the earth is mine—and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests," etc. But they did not fulfil the condition; and God first divorced the "ten tribes," or the kingdom of Israel, and cast them far off from the territory: see 2 Kings xvii. 18–23. Some time after that he punished the Jews, or kingdom of Judah, in Babylon; from which captivity they returned. Then, when the "threescore and two weeks" spoken of, Dan, ix. were fulfilled, "God spoke" to the Jews "by His Son;" see Heb. i. 1, 2. What did he speak to them? He offered them to be "heirs" of the kingdom of God, or Rulers in the kingdom restored to Israel, under the Reign of Messiah, "David's Son" on "David's Throne."

In order to their enjoying this high honor he called them to repentance for past and present wickedness. When they refused this, and put to death the King, the offer of the heirship of the kingdom of God was taken from them as a nation: see Matt. xxi. 38–43. Or, in the words of Jesus, as there recorded—"The kingdom of God shall be taken from you, and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." Jesus Christ being the true Heir of the throne, and having the right to select those who should share in the honor of the government, in the kingdom to be set up, or restored, next sent his ministers to those not under the law covenant, to "take out of them a people for his name"—even the "Royal Priesthood," etc., see Acts xv. 14; and 1 Peter ii. 9.

Such a Priesthood is a kingly one. From this honor we have said, Judah, as a nation, has been excluded for her wilful rejection of the Son of God—"the Heir." Since that rejection, the gospel—the glad tidings—has been sent to others who never were under the covenant made by Moses, or who had, previous to the first advent, been divorced from that covenant relation, and were not sharers in the rejection of Messiah. Such, Christ now invites to the honor and dignity of becoming "heirs of God and joint heirs with" himself in the throne and kingdom of Israel; called the kingdom of heaven, or kingdom of God; and so soon as the number of "joint heirs," or Rulers, are completed, that kingdom will be set up, or developed in its fulness and glory.

If we would attain to this high honor and glory, the first step is to "Repent and believe the Gospel," or the good news—the "glad tidings"—of God's love to us who were not under the law covenant, or who having been given a bill of divorce and sent away prior to the first advent are now mercifully called to be heirs under a new covenant. How great has been the love of God and his Christ towards us, in following us who were afar off, and inviting us to such honor and glory. To attain this high and exalted inheritance we must become holy, or Christ-like. We must repent of all our sins and turn away from all iniquity. Without doing this we cannot be heirs of the kingdom of God. It is by a "patient continuance in well doing," seeking "for honor and glory, and immortality," that this great blessing can be attained, and we be crowned with "eternal life." None other can reign with Christ in the kingdom of God.

The kingdom of God, when restored, or set up, will consist of a King—Associate Rulers—Citizens—Dependencies—Territory, and Laws.

1. A King; Jesus the Messiah.—God has demonstrated his pleasure in this matter by raising up Jesus from the dead. If the fact of Jesus' resurrection from the dead is established, the fact of his Messiahship is put beyond controversy, and his Kingship is undeniable.

2. Associate Rulers:—These consist of such as have suffered with Christ, made immortal; no more subject to death; but, like their King, endowed with endless life by virtue of their union with him; so that they will reign forever and ever.

3. The Citizens: These are restored Israel and Judah; constituted once more "one nation;" and will be the inhabitants of the territorial kingdom. In proof of this we have only space now for one or two out of many texts. Jeremiah thus records the Lord's will in this matter, Jer. xxiii. 5–8: "Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that I will raise unto David a Branch, and a king shall reign and prosper, and shall execute justice and judgment in the earth. In his days Judah shall be saved, and Israel shall dwell safely," etc. In the 3d verse the "Lord God of Israel" had said, "I will gather the remnant of my flock out of all countries whither I have driven them, and will bring them again to their folds; and they shall be fruitful and increase." After having said, verse 6, "In his days Judah shall be saved and Israel shall dwell safely," etc., he adds, verses 7 and 8, "Therefore, behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that they shall no more say, The Lord liveth which brought up the children of Israel out of Egypt; but the Lord liveth, which brought up and which led the seed of the house of Israel out of the north country, and from all countries whither I had driven them; and they shall dwell in their own land." Ezekiel is still more particular; and the Lord, after describing their restoration, and becoming "one nation," saith—"And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt, and they shall dwell therein, they and their children, and their children's children forever," etc. These, then, constitute the citizens, or inhabitants of the territorial kingdom of God.

4. Dependencies:—These are the "left of the nations." They are not citizens of the kingdom, but are under its Dominion and Government; and will be required to submit to that Government; or, if any refuse they will be destroyed. But we have not space now to enlarge on this topic; and pass to notice—

5. The Territory:—The kingdom of God has its territory, and is not the whole habitable globe, much less up "above the stars." It is that described to Abraham, Gen. xv. 18, "In the same day the Lord made a covenant with Abraham, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt, unto the great river, the river Euphrates." It is elsewhere also described, but this is sufficiently definite, as we have established the point that the kingdom of Israel and the kingdom of God are identical. Besides, it is clear from the words of our Lord, Matt. viii. 11, that all the territory of the earth is not embraced in the territory of the kingdom of God. He saith—"Many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham and Isaac and Jacob in the kingdom of heaven:" words which can hardly be reconciled to the idea that all the earth is the kingdom proper. The dominion is over the whole world, or habitable globe: "from sea to sea, and from the river [the great river Euphrates] to the ends of the earth." Thus Daniel saw given to one like the Son of man, "Dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."—Dan. vii. 13, 14.

Let it be understood, then, that while the dominion is universal, the kingdom proper, or, territorial kingdom, is between the river of Egypt and the river Euphrates. On this territory was the kingdom of God "prepared from the foundation of the world:" there was fixed the throne; first occupied by Adam, but forfeited by him; afterward occupied by the kings of the house of Jacob; finally lost by them, and now remains to be occupied by David's son—the second Adam—the Lord from heaven; when the throne, first established by God in Eden, will become permanently occupied—the kingdom be duly organized—the dominion be universal—the reign eternal. One thing more is to be noticed, viz.:

6. The Law:—This will go forth from Zion, the seat of empire and throne of the King. Thus the prophecy of Micah speaks: "But in the last days . . . the law shall go forth of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge [or rule] among the people, and rebuke strong nations afar off; and they shall beat their swords into plough-shares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up a sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more; but they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree; and none shall make them afraid: for the mouth of the Lord of hosts hath spoken it."

The laws are such as to secure peace, and will promote prosperity, universal contentment, and happiness. Such is the teaching of the Bible in relation to the kingdom of God, and the happiness consequent upon its re-establishment, and full development. Here is reality—not fancy—not a flying "above the stars," no one knows where; but an inheriting the earth, as Christ our Lord and king said the meek should do. Let us make haste to secure a part in the "Royal Priesthood." If we reject this offered mercy and honor, we have nothing to expect but ruin and death. Our guilt will be terribly aggravated; and our doom fearful and unalterable; even to "be punished with everlasting destruction."

Drunk with the Blood of the Saints.

"And I saw the woman drunken with the blood of the saints, and with the blood of the martyrs of Jesus:" Rev. xvii. 6. The closing events in the judgment of the "woman" which John saw, the "Mother of Harlots," are now transpiring. How deeply she has drunk of the blood of the saints, no man will know until we are enabled to look back upon her career with an all-seeing eye. According to the calculation of some, about two hundred thousand suffered death in seven years, under Pope Julian; not less than a hundred thousand were massacred by the French in the space of three months; the Waldenses who perished in various ways, amounted to about one million; the Jesuits destroyed nine hundred thousand within the space of thirty years; a hundred and fifty thousand perished in the inquisition; as many more by the Irish massacre, and under the Duke of Alva, thirty-six thousand were executed by the common hangman. If we add to these the vast multitude who were secretly burned, starved, buried alive, drowned, assassinated, or chained to the galleys for life, or immured within the dark walls of the Bastile, that will not seem an extravagant computation which makes the whole number of persons massacred since the rise of Papacy about fifty millions.

If her reward is doubled "unto her double, according to her works;" if "the cup which she hath filled" is filled "to her double;" if "how much she hath glorified herself, and lived deliciously, so much torment and sorrow" is given her, may we not now expect more terrible judgments to come upon her than anything yet known? Will there not speedily be such demonstration of Divine wrath as shall cause her lovers everywhere to lament for her and cry, "when they see the smoke of her burning, saying, What city is like unto this great city?" Will they not, in their anguish, "cast dust on their heads," and cry, "weeping and wailing, saying, alas, alas, that great city, for in one hour is she made desolate?" Thou Babylon, "that great city," shalt soon be overthrown, and shalt "be found no more at all. And the voice of harpers, and musicians, and of pipers, and trumpeters, shall be heard no more at all in thee . . . and the light of a candle shall shine no more at all in thee; and the voice of the bridegroom and of the bride shall be heard no more at all in thee: for thy merchants were the great men of the earth; for by thy sorceries were all nations deceived." In thee "was found the blood of prophets, and of saints, and of all that were slain upon the earth."

The Age to Come.

BY JACOB GRIM.

Br. Storrs: I have been silent on the above subject for many months, as our Assistant Editor will inform you, from a kind of compromise between us that it was not best to discuss the question too much. Now I find in vol. vii. No. 47, a few remarks as follows: "The Future Age." "This is a question on which there is an honest difference of opinion among Life Believers, and about which the friends of the Herald of Life may be nearly equally divided; but we really do not see why either class should wish the subject excluded from the paper." To all this we can give a hearty Amen.

But I find in vol. viii. No. 3, an article on the same subject, and the last paragraph closes thus:

> I make these remarks, because I have observed that those who are guided by the general tenor of the teaching of your paper know nothing of, and many oppose the great objects of the restitution of all things, as revealed in all the Scriptures, and the things that pertain to the kingdom of God. I do not overlook the fact that there are some worthy exceptions in favor of the gospel of the kingdom, but they are almost as the drop in the bucket.

You say, "you sympathize with the writer in the foregoing letter, for it has really seemed to us for a long time, that some of our friends, who are firm on the Life theme, are too unwilling, or are fearful as to the investigation of the subject of the employment we are to be engaged in when we have attained to the eternal life we seek."

I like the charity exhibited in the extract from vol. vii., No. 47, for we think there is an honest difference of opinion on the subject. It seems to me to lack that Christian charity that we should all possess, to say that "those who are guided by the general teachings of your paper, know nothing of, and many oppose the great objects of the restitution." Well, it has not been because the writer of said paragraph has not had ample opportunity to instruct us during the last volume. Now, I for one am neither opposed to, nor afraid of the discussion of the "Future Age," or any other question if it is only done in a Christian spirit of forbearance. I have learned one great truth, and that is, I never lose any thing by my brethren showing me from the Scriptures that I am in error. The only loss is my error, and, in the place thereof, I receive the truth in exchange. There are some things that seem as clear as the sun at noon-day to some people, which to me shine just like mud without any light in it at all. Now if I cannot see the light as it shines to some people, am I to be blamed for it, if in endeavoring to explain what to them seems clear they only confuse, and as one of our brethren used to say, "They stir it until it becomes as clear as muddy water."

In order to present the doctrine of the "Future Age," I should like to find some well defined system or theory. If it is revealed in all the Scriptures, as the brother says, then we ought by this time to have some defined plan about it.

I have received a few tracts, a few weeks back, one of which is called, "The Believer's Only Hope in the Future is an Israelitish Hope:" to which I can say, Amen to all of it; and then another, "Israel the Head and not the Tail in the Age to Come." To me it is an impossibility to reconcile them. Then we find an article in the Herald of Life, vol. viii., No. 2, from the same writer, from whom we have made the extracts, on these words: "Whom the heavens must receive until the of times restitution of all things."—Acts iii. 21. "Jesus the Messiah, whom the heavens must retain, until the completion of the times of those things, which God hath spoken by the mouth of his holy prophets of old."—Murdock. And this agrees with Psa. cx. 1, "The Lord said unto my Lord sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool."

And our Lord quotes the same language in Luke xx., "The Lord said to my Lord, seat thyself at my right hand until I shall place thy foes under thy feet."—Murdock. He says, "This restitution God has promised in the gospel. The things to be restored are those that have been affected by the curse, viz., the earth with its inhabitants." So says the writer. Paul says, "The Scriptures foreseeing that God would justify the heathen preached before the gospel to Abraham." Jesus says this gospel to Abraham contained a "resurrection of the dead."—Luke xx. 37. And Paul says, "I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers. Unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God, day and night, hope to come. Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?"—Acts xxvi. 6, 7.

> "The restitution," says the writer, "God has promised in the gospel. The things to be restored are those things that have been affected by the curse, viz., the earth with its inhabitants. Those that are his will become heavenly, like the angels. They are not the restored, they will not occupy a restored position, The things to be restored are one thing, and they will be restored to a former position. The object of restitution is not to change the earthy to the heavenly, but to restore the former earthy condition. The earthy condition to which the earthy things will be restored, is one in which the people will marry and be given in marriage; they will have dominion over the animals, etc. The probation given to Adam will be restored to them, so that all the blessings of their restored position and surroundings, with all the legitimate prosperity . . . may be secured forever by continued obedience. When the work of restitution is completed, then all nations, whom God has made shall come and worship before him . . . Then they shall not bring forth for trouble, and none of them shall be sick; for the leaves of the tree of life have healed them all" ("not Christ"). Then there will be no more pain, nor death; for they will have free access to the tree of Life that they may live forever. Then there shall be no more curse. This will be the condition of the world after it is restored, and this will be its condition forever."

Now if this is the doctrine of the future age, and taught in the whole Bible, then I confess I have studied my Bible for naught. I asked a good brother the other evening what he was going to do with the inhabitants? For if they are going on forever to marry and intermarry and beget children, and they shall be no more sick, and live forever, this earth will not contain them. He replied, they will be removed to some other planet, and there will be no more sea, and that will make room for them. Well, if my salvation depended on making or bringing harmony out of the discordant elements, that I have in books, and pamphlets, called the "Gospel of the Future Age," I am afraid it will be a hopeless condition.

Henry Ward Beecher.

> "We are not to suppose that there is a hell,—literally a place of fire and brimstone, I don't believe it, and you ought not to believe it any more than you believe that heaven is really paved with gold paving-stones."

In following the wild imaginations pervading many of Beecher's discourses one is perplexed to know what he really does believe. Following the channel of immaterialism, he appears to have become wonderfully befogged regarding the future state. As the legitimate result of immortal-soulism he discards the doctrine of a bodily resurrection, and declares that "there is no attempt in the New Testament to determine whether heaven is a condition or a place. That is left for our modern speculation." Indeed, Mr. Beecher, is not "modern speculation" about all there is of your theology regarding the nature of man and his destiny? But Mr. B. tells us that "virtue shall bring, in this life, its reward, and wickedness, in this life, shall bring its punishment." If this be true, that virtue shall be rewarded and wickedness punished "in this life, why talk of reward and punishment after death?

What do these utterances mean? Do they indicate that Mr. Beecher is drifting into Restorationism? Oh, how glorious "Life only in Christ" appears to us when we see how completely immaterialism has befogged its votaries. W. H. S.

THE CAMPMEETING OF 1871.

WHERE SHALL IT BE HELD?

An extract from a letter from BRO. JOS. LACIAR

"BR. GRIM: As you were selected to represent Pennsylvania in the Camp-Ground Committee, and as you stated you would like to hear from all on the subject of the most suitable place, I avail myself of the invitation.

"I consider the most available place that can be found is Bethlehem, Pa. Now my reasons for it.

"First, It is centrally located by having direct Railroad communication in every direction. Only thirty miles from Philadelphia, and ninety from New York, and where a good many of the brethren reside, it will afford every one an opportunity to come or return in a few hours time; it has direct communication through the central parts of the state of New York, even as far as Rochester, by way of L. V. & L. S. R.R.; has direct line from the west, by way of East Penn. R. R., or by way of L. Valley from the north-west; and as this is the case, it stands as a very suitable place for the easy access it affords to every one who wishes to attend.

"Second: In selecting a place, it is desirable to have one where the indications are that most good can be accomplished in the way of spreading the truth. If this is not an object worthy to be looked at, then it seems to me there are dozens of places that one has no preeminence over another; and then it would be an easy matter to make a choice; but as I believe our perishing fellow-men are near at heart with every one of us, it follows that the question where can the most good be done? should be one of the highest and most necessary considerations. Now, then, what are the advantages or prospects in this respect at the place mentioned? There are probably very few persons more capable of answering this question than the writer. I will therefore proceed to do so. First, Bethlehem, although containing only a population of six or seven thousand, exhibits more interest in religion, owing to the Moravian predominence, than any other town I know of, and is situated centrally in a thickly populated region; for Allentown City, which has a population of 14.000, is situated by railroad only five miles from it; and Easton, a city of about the same population, only twelve miles by railroad; Catasauqua, Lehighton, Slatington, Hellertown, Reading, Nazareth, Bath, Quakerstown, and Mauch Chunk, are all within from eight to thirty-five miles, or an hour's ride, and this making it really a most desirable place for all who wish to hear throughout the whole Lehigh valley. Thirdly, Here is where the tent would be crowded with interesting and intelligent hearers, to hear the preaching of the Life Doctrines, owing to the agitation which has been excited throughout the Moravian Church."

MAUCH CHUNK, PA.,

I hope Br. Laciar will write direct to the HERALD OF LIFE in his next communication, which he has promised to give. Speak out brethren, all of you. JACOB GRIM.

LOVING THE APPEARING OF JESUS.

"We love him because he first loved us."—John iv. 19.

Love is composed of choice and desire. The heart that has chosen Jesus as the supreme object of his affection, and desires to be with him, must, we think, be animated with love for his appearing; and the stronger that desire grows in the sanctified heart, the more intensely will such a one long for the passing away of these mortal scenes that they may be with the supreme object of their adoration. How often has such a one cried out in the language of the prophet—"Oh that thou wouldst rend the heavens, that thou wouldst come down; that the mountains might flow down at thy presence."—Isa. lxiv. 1.

Massillon says, "The first Christians deemed it a kind of apostacy not to sigh after the day of the Lord." "He comes quickly," says Doddrige, "and I trust you can answer with a glad Amen, that the warning is not troublesome or unpleasant to your ears, but rather that his coming, his certain his speedy coming is the object of your delightful hope, and of your longing expectation."

We never think of this subject without remembering the words of John Wesley: "Guilt is incurred by all those who lay hindrances in the way of the faithful, which shall prevent them from hearing their Lord's 'I come,' and answering, 'Come, Lord Jesus!'"

May you, dear reader, of whatever name or profession, be clear of such guilt in the day when the Lord comes to make up his jewels. W. H. S.

ELDER MATHEWSON'S ILLUSTRATION.

BY GEORGE U. LEWIS.

AT our recent camp-meeting in this place, Eld. Mathewson, in one of his sermons, made the following illustration:

"Some quote, 'God is not the God of the dead but of the living,' therefore Abraham, Isaac and Jacob are now alive. Let me illustrate. In the city of Cincinnati there are two companies, one manufactures gold, the other silver wares. The agent of the gold company goes into a store in Albany, and sells several thousand dollars worth of gold wares. The agent of the silver company also comes in and sells a lot of wares, and leaves. On looking over his purchase the merchant finds no manufacturer's mark on his silver ware. He turns to the agent of the gold company and says, I suppose you are responsible for these wares. The agent replies, 'As touching the gold I am responsible.'

"The merchant soon finds his silver wares are worthless, and sues the gold company for damages. But he cannot sustain his suit. Why? What did the agent of the gold company say? 'As touching the gold we are responsible.' What did Jesus say? 'As touching the resurrection of the dead . . . I am the God of Abraham and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob.' Therefore Abraham, Isaac and Jacob will be raised from the dead."

The worthless silver wares had no manufacturer's mark. Now if any man have not the spirit of Christ he is none of his. If all men are to have a resurrection, why is God the God of one more than the God of another, "As touching the resurrection?" Why?

THE SEAT OF THE AFFECTIONS.

BY D. J. ELLSWORTH.

SOMETHING more than a year ago, a short article appeared in the HERALD OF LIFE, from your pen, suggesting as an impropriety the representing the heart of man as being the seat of the affections. It arrested my attention at once, and I have thought much upon it since, and have had it in my mind for some time to write out a few thoughts and suggestions for the HERALD and its readers.

I am fully convinced that the expressions so commonly used among men, as also the wording of Scripture upon this point, is erroneous, and that the heart of man is no more the seat of the affections than is the sole of the foot.

If the heart, an organ located in the midst of the man, and the repository for the blood, and by which it is diffused thoughout the body, while the mind operates in connection with the brain, at the top of the head, how absurd to speak of these two organs interchangeably as the source and energizer of all thought, feeling and action.

To charge upon the heart as being the mainspring of all our evil propensities, is, so to speak, putting it too far off from us, like as in days past—yes, past—we made a big "Theological Devil" the scapegoat for all our evil thoughts and doings. On the contrary, it comes very near home, when we point to the head, and in close connection to that unruly member, the tongue.

Let us find the truth in this matter; and for this object I have written these few lines that our minds may be brought to bear upon the subject.

The heart is the seat of the affections, or it is not. If it is not, let us be done with speaking such an absurdity. We hear a person say, about something they heard or felt, "It did my heart good." How do you know that it did your heart good? How much more propper to say, It did me good.

We will present a few passages of Scripture, as we find them, and let the reader change the words, (mind and heart,) and note that which is according to truth and common sense.

Dan. ii. 29, "Thy thoughts came into thy mind." "A fool uttereth all his mind." "The carnal mind is enmity against God." "Then shall his mind change." "And be renewed in the spirit of your mind." "Oh, that there were such an heart in them." "A proud heart will I not suffer." "Serve him with all your heart." "Yea, thy law is within my heart."

That we may speak the same word, be of the same mind and judgment. I am, in love for the truth, Your brother in Christ.

WINDSOR, CONN., Oct. 1870.

"THE LORD KNOWETH THEM THAT ARE HIS."

JESUS says: "I am the good Shepherd; the good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep . . . My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me."—John x. 11, 27. Many "hear" his voice pleading with them, like he pleads with the Jewish people, to seek eternal shelter in his fold; flee to his arms of compassion and love, and no longer wander like sheep without a shpherd,—but they will not follow him, and therefore do not possess the marks by which "the Lord knoweth them that are his."

Following him in the outward duties of the Christian life furnish but little evidence of a genuine consecration. We are "justified by faith," and "being made free from sin," become "the servants of righteousness." There is, therefore, "no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus, who walk not after the flesh, but after the Spirit." "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God." But as the result of this acceptance with God, "if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." And "there shall be one fold and one shepherd." W. H. S.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Oct. 1870.

LIFE IN CHRIST.

"Christ is made unto us Redemption."

To redeem is to recover, or gain back again; and therefore the Scriptural term "redemption" comprehends the recovery of all that we have lost in the first Adam, holiness and everlasting life. It is, however, especially to be observed, that, the inspired writers uniformly pass over in comparative silence the condition of the separate spirits of the faithful, and dwell upon the resurrection as the true hope of the believer, the genuine and ultimate redemption of humanity. Whether the Apostles aim to comfort the afflicted Christian, or to stimulate the slothful, or to warn the unruly, or to strike terror into the ungodly, they derive their chief motives from the fact of our Lord's second coming in glory, and the resurrection which is so immediately connected with it. "Ye are dead," says Paul, "and your life (the life eternal) is hidden with Christ in God. When Christ who is our Life shall appear, then shall ye also appear with Him in glory."—Col. iii. 2-4.

Hence the resurrection of Christ was contemplated as the era of his public adoption as the Son of God. Psalm ii. 7; Acts xiii. 33.

Hence the Resurrection is denominated the Adoption, or manifestation of sonship; "waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of the body."—Rom. viii. 23.

Hence also the resurrection is called the regeneration, the completion of the new birth unto holy and everlasting life. "Ye which have followed me, in the regeneration, when the Son of Man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel."—Matt. xix. 28.

Such is the Apostle's hope:—"That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death, if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead." Such, too, his prayer for the Ephesians, that they might "know what was the hope of their calling, and what the exceeding greatness of his power to usward who believe, according to the working of his mighty power, which he wrought in Christ when he raised him from the dead, and set him at his own right hand in the heavenly places."—Phil. iii. 10. Eph. i. 18.

The irresistible force of Christ's resurrection to immortal life is represented as bursting the bands of death, and carrying along with him to the heavenly regions the ransomed victims of Satan's mortal tyranny. Then only will his work be completed, when the Lord himself shall be revealed from heaven, rending those heavens with his triumphant shout of "Death is swallowed up in victory."

That hour will surely come! The creation groans for its approach.—"Even So, Come, Lord Jesus!" is the Church's responsive prayer. For then will the gates of a fairer Paradise be opened than that which Adam lost, and a sublimer Eden unfold its brilliant landscapes to the enraptured gaze of God's rejoicing family. The ransomed of the Lord shall return and come to Zion with songs, and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.—Isa. xxxv. 10.

We shall then bear the "image of the heavenly," and a "spiritual body" shall minister to a spiritual mind. This vile tabernacle of earth shall be exchanged for "a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." Then shall an indestructible and boundless life intensely burn in every countenance and move in every limb! The eye shall be opened to a keener insight, and to a wider survey of the immeasurable universe, and lighten with the fires of an undying intelligence! The ear shall be attuned for loftier harmonies, and strengthened to endure the reverberations of the music of celestial song! Then shall the voice pour forth the powerful languages of angels, in tones that cannot weary, and with an eloquence that never fails! Then shall the feeble sufferer, whom Satan bound for years on earth, leap as an hart, spring forward or "fly swiftly" with resistless force, and with a spirit which no exertions can fatigue! Then shall the glory of the Lord our God be upon us in majestic lineaments, which retain their freshness through eternal ages, and in features of awful and immortal beauty, liable to no decay: "They shall drink of the River of thy Pleasures; for at thy right hand there is fulness of joy, and pleasure for evermore."—Selected.

INFIDELITY.

YET we are charged with infidelity, and that, too, by those who ought to know better, and it is no little strain on our charity to refrain from saying that they do know better. Although themselves professing to be Christians, they would fain annihilate us because we proclaim that eternal life can only be had through Christ; that he is "the resurrection and the life." The accusation is too absurd to receive attention on its own merits, and we refer to it as showing the insincerity of some of our opponents. They are unable to refute our position by the Scriptures, the only legitimate means, and consequently resort to misrepresentation, to keep their pet "traditions" from losing caste. We, as an individual, have been endeavoring to give Jesus the glory of which orthodoxy has so long robbed him by its "vain philosophy"—that of being the only source of eternal life. "He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life; he that believeth not the Son shall not see life." "The gift of God is eternal life, through our Lord Jesus Christ." Thank God we have been led to "believe, and therefore speak," that he is the "King of kings and Lord of lords, who only hath immortality;" and for thus believing we are accused of infidelity by those who are vain enough to suppose that they have immortality in themselves. So much for "denying Christianity;" and as to "denying the truth of the Scriptures," we would be much obliged to our accusers if they would point to a single ground of faith that we have not referred to the Bible, and to the Bible only, for support. We have staked everything in this life on the truth of the Scriptures respecting another and better life, willing to stand or fall by that test.

However, we opine that the difficulty with our accusers is that we stick too closely to the Word, instead of accepting their construction. They have adjudged us not fit for their "kingdom of heaven," because we would not believe their tradition "the soul cannot die," in the face of the Scripture testimony "the soul that sinneth it shall die;" because we would not believe that sinners would live forever in eternal torment, despite Scripture assertion that "the wages of sin is death"—"sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death;" and because we would not believe that the intellectuality of man was more than ever conscious after death, either praising or cursing God, rather than the Scripture affirmations that "the dead praise not the Lord"—"his breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth, in that very day his thoughts perish"—"the dead know not any thing."

Infidel, forsooth! Verily "it is a small thing to be judged by man; he that judgeth is the Lord."—The Nazarene.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM ELD. H. ROCKWELL.

BRN. STORRS AND THORNE: I have for a length of time entertained the opinion that all the professed followers of Christ, together with the great mass of humanity that make no claims to Christianity, are entitled to have a clear and distinct definition, not only of the hope we so dearly cherish, and the precious faith we advocate, but the whys and the wherefores, in our Christian union and fellowship with other branches of professed Christians; especially those that with us profess to believe that the Lord will soon come to earth to purify it, to set up his everlasting kingdom under the whole heavens, and to gather out of his kingdom all that worketh abomination or maketh a lie; to gather, in one, all his weeping saints, and to give reward to his servants the prophets, and to them that fear his name, small and great.

Nothwithstanding, that I be not further tedious unto thee, I pray thee that thou wouldst hear us of thy clemency a few words. My last report from our last convention at Camp Springfield. Through the great mercy and long forbearance of our covenant keeping God, in answer to the prayers of his people, I am still in the field; both able and willing to labor and suffer reproach for the precious gift of eternal life through Jesus Christ, our glorified and resurrected LIFE-GIVER, who was once dead, (not twice), but now, behold he liveth again, no more to die; death hath no more dominion over him. I am laboring all the time; and when I take up the great telescope of living truth, and look back into the field of ancient prophecy; and then turn and explore the vast regions of historic record, and consider with what velocity the one moves from one field to the other, minds as naturally weak, and mentally infirm as my own, are filled with astonishment, and are constrained to cry out, O my Lord, what shall be the end of these wonders?

I thank the good Lord, that every thing discernible in the moral, civil and ecclesiastical horizon indicates that the end of all things is at hand. Again we look back and review the history of the church, and our faith becomes, if possible, more and more confirmed; and as we approach nearer to our own times, we review the past with a strong desire to gain the pure truth; but alas, for the simplicity of truth, we are constrained to accept of human theology, or stand alone. This is a fearful position. But he that will have life, must do battle for truth and right.

I have been thinking of the days of the old Puritan faith; who, for the right of conscience left their country, their homes, their comfort, their wealth, and a large circle of kind friends, and braved the perils of the storm-clad ocean, and endured the hardship of the wilderness, the privation and want, with famine and pestilence that followed them in every step; and the red men with bow and arrow, scalping knife and tomahawk; ready at the slightest provocation to lay them low in death; but before the third generation was all passed away, they become famous for hanging and whipping the peaceable and honest friend quakers.

We leave this class, and come down to the days of Adventism. Here allow me to say, although it is a painful, unwelcome, and thankless task, yet the public demand it, that I firmly believe that at this late hour of our world's history, there is not a people professing godliness in the world that have a better, or sounder, or more truthful theology, or a more accurate knowledge of the correct interpretation of the Scriptures than the Advent people, as a whole; but yet they are not, as a whole, or as any individual, infallible.

I have labored since our convention in a number of places. I have preached in my simple manner in the highways and in the hedges, as far as I know, to the satisfaction of those that have heard me, and have listened to a number of very refreshing testimonies; but what the final result will be remains yet future. I find no cause of boasting, but much for thankfulness; but one thing I will glory in; and that is, that the Lord holds the reins of government; and the steady onward march of truth does and will triumph, any other law to the contrary, notwithstanding.

NEW BRITAIN, CT., Oct. 12, 1870.

FROM ELD. T. T. JENKS.

BR. STORRS: I cannot be sufficiently grateful to my heavenly Father for the light of truth that has beamed on my pathway for the few past years.

Every page of the Bible seems radiant with the glorious theme of Life future and Eternal only through Christ. Saith Jesus, "I am the resurrection and the life." The two are wedded together, and Jesus the embodiment of the two. Let no man attempt to put them asunder. Jesus saith again, "And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life: and I will raise him up at the last day." There seems to be an inseparable connection between the resurrection and eternal life, throughout all the teachings of Christ and the apostles. No resurrection, no everlasting life. No everlasting life, no resurrection. Is it a very strange thing, then, that Paul's great theme was, Christ and the resurrection? And so far as himself was concerned, was it very strange that he should express himself in this wise? "That I may know him, and the power of his resurrection, and the fellowship of his sufferings, being made conformable unto his death; if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead."—Phil. iii. 10, 11. No, no! Neither is it a wonder that the primitive Christians made the coming of Christ to raise the dead their theme, seeing a resurrection and eternal life were identical.

But it is a wonder to me how I could live thus long a student and professed teacher of God's word and not discern this great truth. But so it was; and when the light of truth began to dawn on my mind, I was still slow of heart to believe all that the prophets, Jesus and his apostles, had so clearly taught. Therefore, I do not feel like censuring others who do not as yet see this blessed truth. I will try to exercise patience toward them, and by a loving heart and consistent life prove the power of truth to sanctify and assimilate the mind to that of Christ, and in this way commend it to their attention.

Oh, let us all "speak the truth in love;" live a truthful and loving life: thus shall we scatter the good seed which will spring up and bear fruit unto eternal life.

WESTFIELD, MASS., Oct., 1870.

FROM EDWARD WARREN.

BR. STORRS: In reading the letter of Br. Simonds and also your remarks on the same, I was led to rejoice greatly, hoping that the questions you propounded might be dispassionately investigated. I have long believed in the restitution of all things spoken of by the mouth of all the Prophets since the world began; and that the heavens must retain Jesus until the time arrived for them to commence. I would, it were at hand, and the great Restorer of paths to walk in were already here. How would my heart rejoice and my tongue ring aloud the righteousness of God; for Paul says, He would send Jesus again, which had been preached unto us. I thank God that I ever heard the proclamation made of the coming of the Bridegroom; and although it has been a long tedious night since that proclamation was made, yet I think I may safely say, with Paul, the night is far spent, the day is at hand; therefore let us cast off all errors, or works of darkness, and put on the armor of light. We must walk as children of the day, so that we stumble not. Oh that we all might see clearly the important work at hand, the things which must shortly be done in order that Jesus may establish his kingdom and reign on earth when he comes. The question may be asked, Is it essential that we understand the work of the kingdom to come? I answer, Yes, or Jesus our Lord and Master would not have taught and performed the works which he did at his first advent among the Jews, with whom it was impossible for him to establish his reign, they having rejected his offer and declared by a message, sent after him, that they would not have this Man to reign over them; yet Jesus and the twelve continued their work of the kingdom, which is clearly set forth in Matt. iv. 23, and on to the 25th; also, chap. x. 7, 8, and in Luke x. is set forth the power given to the seventy whom Jesus appointed and sent forth into the harvest of the Jews; and as this took place in the end of their dispensation, so also, I look for the declaration of Jesus recorded in Matt. xxiv. 14, to have its commencement in the end of this dispensation or age, and go on till the end or reign of our Lord and Master, when he will deliver up the kingdom to the Father, that God may be all and in all. Yours, waiting for the Bridegroom.

BALTIMORE, MD, Oct. 23, 1870.

FROM HELEN ROBERTSON.

BR. STORRS: Numbers of the brethren and sisters at Springfield were making inquiries about our Pawling brethren and sisters. They have not been to campmeeting for a long time, neither have they reported themselves through "our paper" the HERALD OF LIFE.

I have been here staying at Sr. Dodge's and visiting all round now four weeks. The Lord willing, I intend to leave to-morrow morning.

The children here seem to be upon their watch-towers, marking every sign, and letting their lights shine. They have had meetings every Sunday during the summer. Br. Gardner comes almost every Sunday from Beekman, and he and Dr. Fox have preached the word to the people. The children seem to be growing in grace and in the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.

Some one may ask, does the preaching wake up the people? Do the judgments upon the earth, at present, make them think, and turn to the Lord? We would say in return, that it seems to be as it was in the days of Noah. He built the ark right before the people's eyes, but they only mocked, and hardened their hearts; and as it was at the destruction of Jerusalem. When the wicked saw it compassed with armies they did not take warning and escape. So it seems to be now, everywhere. The feeling of the world is, "We will not have this man to reign over us;" and the more the judgments are poured out, the more people harden their hearts. Many tremble, but somehow they don't seem to know about the secret place of the Most High.

The Lord help the watchmen to be all on their towers, and when they see the sword coming, to faithfully warn the people; otherwise the blood shall be required at the watchmen's hands.

O for wisdom to abide in him, that when he appears we may have confidence, and not be ashamed before him at his coming.

Desiring a place amongst the redeemed ones.

PAWLING, N. Y. Oct. 1870.

FROM JOHN C. DAY.

About the Campmeeting of 1870.

BR. STORRS: I fully concur in the remarks of Br. Barker in relation to the locality of our campmeeting. I think Springfield, Mass., is preferable to any place I can think of, at present. It being central, and easy of access to all, and this is what I think should be taken into consideration in establishing our anniversary meeting. And then, as to immediate action, I think much experience might be saved in having time to secure the materials we shall need to fit up the ground. Having had some experience in this kind of work, I have always found it best to have time enough, especially in fitting a camp-ground. As it draws near the time, lumber-men expect to take all the advantage they can. I hope the Brn. of the Committee will think best to take some action soon, or will express their views through the paper. Yours in hope of life when the LIFE-GIVER shall come,

One of the Committee.

JACOB HALLMAN, SMYRNA, DEL., writes: I am still alive, waiting for the sounding of the seventh trumpet, and striving to be ready that I may meet the Lord with joy and not with grief. I can safely say that we are in the days when they will not endure sound doctrine. I prize the HERALD OF LIFE as a great blessing to those who have an ear to hear of the goodness of God in the gift of his Son, the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and the revelation of His will, made known to His believing children.

How often we hear men reject Christ and his salvation because there are so many hypocrites among the professors. They admit the truthfulness and righteousness of Christ and his teaching, but they reject all on account of the many counterfeits. This seems to us strange logic. It would be just as reasonable to refuse all gold and silver coin, bank notes, etc., because of the many counterfeits in circulation.

THERE are cases in which a man would be ashamed not to have been imposed upon. There is a confidence necessary to human intercourse, and without which men are often more injured by their own suspicions than they could be by the perfidy of others.

"God made thee of choice his own, and of his own
To serve him: thy reward was of his grace;
Thy punishment then justly is at his will.
Be it so, for I submit; his doom is fair,
That dust I am, and shall to dust return:
Oh welcome hour whenever! Why delays
His hand to execute what his decree
Fixed on this day? Why do I overlive?
Why am I mock'd with death, and lengthen'd out
To deathless pain? How gladly would I meet
Mortality my sentence, and be earth
Insensible! How glad would lay me down
As in my mother's lap! There should I rest,
And sleep secure; his dreadful voice no more
Would thunder in my ears; no fear of worse
To me and to my offspring would torment me
With cruel expectation. Yet one doubt
Pursues me still, lest all I cannot die;
Lest that pure breath of life, the spirit of Man
Which God inspired, cannot together perish
With this corporeal clod; then, in the grave,
Or some other dismal place, who knows
But I shall die a living death! O thought
Horrid, if true! Yet why? It was but breath
Of life that sinned; what dies but what had life
And sin? The body properly had neither.
All of me then shall die: let this appease
The doubt, since human reach no further knows.
For though the Lord of all be infinite,
Is his wrath also? Be it; Man is not so,
But mortal doom'd. How can he exercise
Wrath without end on man, whom death must end?
Can he make deathless death? That were to make
Strange contradiction, which to God himself
Impossible is held; as argument
Of weakness, not of power. Will he draw out
For anger's sake, finite to infinite,
In punish'd man, to satisfy his rigor,
Satisfied never? That were to extend
His sentence beyond dust and Nature's law;
By which all causes else, according still
To the reception of their matter, act;
Not the extent of their own sphere. But say
That death be not one stroke, as I supposed,
Bereaving sense, but endless misery
From this day onward; which I feel begun
Both in me, and without me; and so at last
To perpetuity;—Ah me! that fear
Comes thundering back with dreadful revolution
On my defenceless head; both Death and I
Are found eternal, and incorporate both;
Nor I on my part single; in me all
Posterity stands accursed; . . .
. . . .
Thus Adam to himself lamented loud."

Call to the Ministry.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

Are men in the present age of the church called of God, especially, to preach the Gospel?

I am aware of the fact that in entering on a discussion of this question I am approaching a subject on which there is a difference of opinion. I enter on it in no spirit of controversy, but because I am satisfied that the good of the cause of truth demands that some one should speak out on this subject.

I start with the proposition that when once the present dispensation was fully introduced, it was established as a system of ecclesiastical, or religious economy never to be changed during all the years of its existence, till God shall have accomplished the work designed to be done through its divine instrumentality.

Whatever, therefore, was incorporated into the system at the beginning remains a part of that system until it shall have completed its mission.

The first enquiry then is, Did God ordain in the introduction of the Gospel age that individual members of the New Covenant church should be set apart, especially, to "preach the word?"

This new dispensation was never fully introduced as a completed, divinely organized arrangement till, on "the day of Pentecost," the entire church, who were then believers, were baptized by the Holy Spirit. We shall, therefore, call attention to the teachings, the inspired writings of the apostles of our Lord subsequent to that day, and event. None of these apostles have written so much, and, so definitely concerning ecclesiastical jurisprudence, and moral ethics, as him whose apostleship concerned alone the bringing to the knowledge of the truth those who among the Gentiles were "ordained to eternal life." This same Paul makes the entire work of organizing the Christian church to be under the direct supervision of the Holy Spirit.

He therefore terms it "a spiritual house." "But Christ as a son over his own house; which house are we."—Heb. iii. 6. "And are built upon the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone. In whom all the building fitly framed together groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord. In whom ye also are builded together for a habitation of God through the Spirit."—Eph. ii. 20–22. In this house, or church, "all members have not the same office."—Rom. xii. 4. "For to one is given by the Spirit the word of wisdom; to another the word of knowledge by the same Spirit; to another faith by the same Spirit; to another the gifts of healing by the same Spirit; to another the working of miracles; to another prophecy; to another discerning of spirits; to another divers kinds of tongues; to another the interpretation of tongues. But all these worketh that one and the self same Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will."—1 Cor. xii. 8–11.

Here the order of the church is given in plain and distinct language, and her prosperity, unity, and peace depend absolutely on its faithful recognition. In its organization, as here delineated, every form and species of human expediency, is divinely ignored. How this arrangement shall be brought into, and maintain its practical working is told us in the use of the following language: "Having then gifts differing according to the grace that is given to us, whether prophecy, let us prophesy according to the proportion of faith; or ministry let us wait on our ministering; or he that teacheth on teaching; or he that exhorteth, on exhortation: he that giveth, let him do it with simplicity; he that ruleth, with diligence; he that showeth mercy, with cheerfulness."—Rom. xii. 6–8.

In the above quotations we have a regularly organized christian church, together with the office work of that church in practically carrying out the design for which it was ordained. How much better would it subserve the interests of the cause of truth did we all but accept it in its divine simplicity, rather than attempt to load it down, and clog its beautiful spiritual mechanism by superadding to it artificial, and unatural excrescences in the shape of rude and uncomely inventions of human machinery.

In this God ordained institution we have clearly, and positively recognized the office of "minister." We find this office or gift in the church as clearly recognized elsewhere in the apostles' writings as in the above quotations. Paul felt its binding obligations upon himself. "For though I preach the gospel, I have nothing to glory of: necessity is laid upon me; yea, woe is unto me, if I preach not the gospel!"—1 Cor. ix. 16.

He fully recognizes this especial call to the ministry in the language written to the Romans. "For whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved. How then shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? And how shall they believe in him of whom they have not heard? And how shll they hear without a preacher? And how shall they preach except they be sent."—Rom. x. 13–15.

Nothing can be made plainer to my mind than that upon the very face of these texts, stands unmistakably asserted the important fact of truth that some are especially "sent" to preach, and that unless they are thus sent, they are not qualified to do the work that Paul calls, preaching. But how, and by whom are they sent?

"Now there were in the church which was at Antioch, certain prophets and teachers; as Barnabas, and Simeon that was called Niger, and Lucius of Cyrene, and Manaen, which had been brought up with Herod the tetrach, and Saul. And as they ministered to the Lord, and fasted, the Holy Spirit said, Separate me Barnabus and Saul for the work whereunto I have called them. And when they had fasted and prayed, and laid their hands on them, they sent them away. So they being sent forth by the Holy Ghost; departed unto Selucia."—Acts xiii. 1–4.

There is a question here. It is declared that the Holy Ghost said, etc. The Holy Spirit does not speak with an audible voice except, as in the case of the prophets of old, who "spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."—1 Peter i. 21. The Spirit, therefore, spake through these prophets. In harmony with this view is the language of Paul to Timothy: "Neglect not the gift that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with the laying on of the hands of the presbytery."—1 Tim. iv. 14.

The above Scriptures mark the only order or rules of ordination recognized in the gospel. So when Paul says, "Whereunto I am ordained a preacher," (1 Tim. ii. 7.) his ordination was according to the above named plan. Again, when Paul instructs Timothy in the following language, "And the things which thou hast heard of me among many witnesses, the same commit thou to faithful men, who shall be able to teach others also."—2 Tim. ii. 2. He enforces the same principle of divine policy.

Lastly, what are the duties devolving on the church with respect to those whom God has called to "preach the word?"

"Let the elders that rule well (by precept and example) be counted worthy of double honor, especially they who labor in the word and doctrine." "For the Scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox that treadeth out the corn. The laborer is worthy of his reward."—1 Tim. v. 17, 18.

Please read 1 Cor. ix. 3–12. We quote verses 13, 14, "Do ye not know that they which minister about holy things live of the things of the temple? And they which wait at the altar are partakers with the altar? Even so hath the Lord ordained that they which preach the gospel should live of the gospel." So it is established in the divine economy, and so may we consent to let it be. Remember, it is not merely a gratuitous act of charity to furnish the preacher, who ministers to you the holy word, the means to make a living for himself and family; this is just as much his due, as is the money which you earn in your counting room, behind your counter, on your farms, or in the following of any other legitimate business.

But suppose you do not do it? Suppose that God in answer to the prayers of the faithful preacher supplies his needs independent of your neglect of your duty, and your contempt of his ordained arrangement? Simply this, your faith dies, and that so entirely as to deprive you of all spiritual life here, and all hope of the "life that is to come." But this course of yours will not stop the preacher. No, no, if need be, he will, like Paul, "rob other churches to supply your lack" in meeting his needs. And he will go forth, it may be, more deeply burdened with cares, and weeping on account of your neglect and unfaithfulness, but he will go, for God has bidden him to this work, and he dare not confer with flesh and blood. And as he goes he will bear with him the precious seed, the incorruptible word of God, and when the Chief Shepherd shall appear he will return rejoicing in the consolations of the full fruition of an incorruptible crown, and "bringing his sheaves with him."

The Baptism of Fire.

BY F. H. BURBANK.

"I [John the Baptist] indeed baptize you with water unto repentance . . . he [Jesus Christ] shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire."—Matt. iii. 11.

My object in penning these lines, is, to show that those who hold that the baptism of fire referred to in this text applies to the burning up of the impenitent in a "lake of fire and brimstone" at the close of this age, are mistaken in their application.

It is generally conceded that the term "baptize" signifies: to overwhelm — to submerge. While some give the term other definitions also, they admit the ones we have recorded. The act of baptism, not only signifies the overwhelming of the candidate but also his deliverance from that condition. Thus with John's, Christ's, Peter's, Paul's, and Philip's water baptism; the candidates were submerged in the water, and afterward raised out of it. In Christ's baptism of the Jews on the day of Pentecost and of the Gentiles at the house of Cornelius, by the Holy Spirit, they were submerged in it, and afterwards came out of it. If they had always been enveloped by the Holy Spirit, we think that they would never have erred either in word or deed. The baptism of sufferings and of death which overwhelmed Christ did not retain him forever: he was raised from the dead, to suffer and die no more. Those who were baptized unto Moses did not perish in the sea: they came up out of it. We have referred to all these instances to show that the act of baptism includes two actions—being overwhelmed by; and coming out of, that by which we are baptized. Hence we believe that those who are baptized by fire will not be destroyed by it.

There are some who hold that this baptism has reference to the judgments upon Judea and the Jews. Even if that be the correct idea, it does not conflict with our position; for, Jerusalem is not to be trodden under foot of the Gentiles eternally. There is a limit—it "shall be trdden down . . . until," etc. In that case there is an overwhelming and a deliverance.

But, our friends who baptize in water do not expect that death by drowning will be the result to those thus baptized. Neither should they contend that death by burning will be the result with those who are baptized in fire. If we could baptize any one in a lake of fire as well as in a lake of water, we should not think of burning them up in the one, any more than we should think of causing their death by drowning in the other. As we cannot baptize any one in fire or in the Holy Spirit, we leave the matter in the hands of Christ whose prerogative only it is so to baptize.

We do not consider the baptism of fire to be a distinct baptism, but as forming a part of the baptism which was promised by John through Christ. "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." I conceive this a baptism of the two conjointly. An instance of a baptism where a cloud and the sea are used conjointly to effect it, is recorded in 1 Cor. x. 1, 2. "Moreover brethren, I would not that ye should be ignorant, how that all our fathers were under the cloud, and all passed through the sea; and were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud, and in the sea." All will admit that the cloud and sea were used conjointly in that baptism unto Moses. No one that I ever heard of has intimated that a portion of the fathers were baptized in the cloud, and the remainder in the sea.

We believe that the same parties who were promised the baptism of the Holy Spirit, were promised the other—of fire; and not that a portion of them were to have the one, and the remainder the other.

Finally, that there was a literal baptism of the Spirit and fire conjointly, we think the Scriptures show.—Acts ii. 7–14. "And when the day of Pentecost was fully come, they were all with one accord in one place. And suddenly there came a sound from heaven, as of a rushing mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting. And there appeared unto them cloven tongues, LIKE AS OF FIRE, and it sat upon each of them. And they were all filled with the Holy Ghost," etc. Thus we learn that when the baptism took place, the Holy Spirit and the cloven tongues like as of fire appeared together. Doubtless it was just such fire as Moses saw in the bush which consumed it not.

The children of Israel were under and not in the cloud. The disciples of Jesus were in the Holy Spirit, and the Holy Spirit filled them, but the cloven tongues of fire sat upon each of them. To my mind, this was an exact fulfilment of the prophecy of John: "I indeed baptize you with water . . . He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire." F. H. Burbank.

A Bottomless Doctrine.

BY L. H. ROWE.

I have read in the "Crisis," of October 19, an article which is credited to "Earnest Christian," with the following heading, "Our Saviour's Second Coming;" in which the writer speaks at length of the glory soon to be revealed, and in connection with this great event he says: "The doctrine of a general resurrection of the righteous and the wicked, at the last day, and of judgments when all must render up their final account with joy or grief, is most clearly taught in the Bible."

To sustain his theory of the resurrection to life of the wicked dead, he quotes John v. 28, and Eccl. xii. 14.

Now if this was all the Scripture we had upon this subject, we might concede the truthfulness of the proposition that the wicked dead "shall come forth," but inasmuch as there are many texts which clearly refute such arguments, I, for one, have come to the conclusion that the doctrine of "die twice" is a bottomless one: and if men will carefully examine and "search the Scriptures, without being "willingly ignorant" of those things, it seems to me that they can come to no other conclusion. To prove that the wicked shall rise, I often am referred to 1 Cor. xv. 22. "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive." They say that, the "even so," in this text means that as many as die in Adam must be made alive in Christ, to make the thing equal. Thus they assume, without proof, and contrary to evidence, that all men must be raised from the dead. I admit that this text, in and of itself, would convey such an idea at first sight; but in the context, Br. Paul gives us the order of the resurrection in very plain terms. He says; "For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive: but every man in his own order: Christ the first-fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming."

No doubt all will admit that Christ is the first-fruits of the general harvest, and if so, then it follows, as a matter of course, that the entire harvest will be the exact counterpart, or likeness of the first-fruits, And as Christ was raised to "die no more," being made "equal to the angels;" hence, all that are to be raised, come up with "incorruptible" bodies. So it is evident that if the wicked are raised, they cannot die any more; and so the whole matter stands as follows: The doctrine in question if true, proves one of two things; universal salvation, or endless misery. Which of these views will "die-twice" believers accept? Perhaps they will object to either. Very well; then there is but one other result in the case, and that is, the wicked will not be raised at all, but "shall remain in the congregation of the dead," and "be as though they had not been."

"Hitherto is the end of the matter." May the Lord stir up the people to examine for themselves, and see if these things are so. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear." God bless the truth, and seal instruction to those who are seeking for salvation, that we may all be gathered, an unbroken band in the everlasting kingdom of God, when Jesus "shall come to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired in all them that believe." Amen.

The Ends of Virtue and Vice.

Virtue and vice never differ so much, as in the end; at least their difference is never so much seen as then. And this is one reason why so many judgments are seduced in pursuit of ill. They imagine not, their last act will be tragical; because their former scenes have all been comedy. The end is so far off, that they see not those pains and shames that await them in ambush.

And the same thing that encourageth vice, discourageth virtue. For by her rugged way, and the resistance that she finds in her passage, she is oft persuaded to step into the path of vice, which, while she findeth smooth, she never perceiveth to be slippery.

Doubtless the world hath nothing so glorious as virtue: vice at best is but a diseased harlot; all whose commendation is, that she is painted.

Men's lives should be like the day, more beautiful in the evening; or, like the summer, aglow with promise; and like the autum, rich with the golden sheaves, where the good works and deeds have ripened on the field.

Every hour comes to us charged with duty, and the moment it is passed it is registered for or against us in the final account which all must give of their actions.

Real Christians are the resemblance of Christ; and if we love the original, we must also love the copy.

Children's Department.

The Words of the Song.

The child stood on the sandy beach,
And watched the waves at play,
And as they rose in mimic wrath,
Then kissed the smiling bay,
They struck the sweet and solemn chord,
"We praise our Maker and our Lord."

The child went o'er the rocky pool,
And saw, through coral bowers,
The fish dart out with silver sheen,
'Mid stars and living flowers:
Then join the sweet and solemn chord,
"We praise our Maker and our Lord."

And from the hoary mountain's top,
And from each spreading tree,
And from the daisy hid in grass,
And from the honey bee,
He heard the sweet and solemn chord,
"We praise our Maker and our Lord."

And from the glad things in the wood,
From squirrels leaping high,
And from the loving mother bird,
And from the starry sky,
Up rose the sweet and solemn chord,
"We praise our Maker and our Lord."

And from two childish human hearts
It came more clear and sweet,
As kneeling low, their spirits rose,
Their Father's smile to meet:
They sang, but struck a strange new chord,
"We praise our Saviour and our Lord."

Lake Osscoowanna.

"Uncle Billy," as I am familiarly called, lives now near the summer resort called, Osscoowanna Lake, near Peekskill, N. Y. It is a charming little lake, near two miles long; and I have been informed that it is about 1400 feet above the level of the Hudson river, and is in Putnam County, in the wildest, roughest part, perhaps, of the State of New York, yet one of the healthiest parts of the whole United States. But, children, it is not Osscoowanna lake that I shall write about; but a thought that came into my mind while dragging my feet slowly along over the rough, uneven, and rocky soil near this lovely lake.

When I was quite a young man, more than thirty years ago, I worked for a gentleman who for a very slight cause did not speak to his only brother. I have often been chatting along on the road with my employer and saw those two brothers meet, face to face, and not speak or notice each other. The act of these brothers was condemned by the whole community as well as myself. Yes, I thought this act very wrong, children; but I, at the same time refused to talk with a very dear friend, a Father; yes, a heavenly Father: yes, the kindest friend of all our race. Thoughtlessly, stubbornly, and ignorantly, I refused to ask one blessing from the King of kings; although urged, with kindness, to come unto him in the day of trouble. This act of not speaking with my Creator in the days of my youth, is one of the acts for which I feel very sorry. Now little children, if you in early life will speak with your Creator in prayer, you will never feel mean enough not to speak to your young companions; and when you get old, you will have the pleasure of speaking kindly to your fellow-men always, and the King of Glory will be your friend. Then, O let me say to you, talk to your Creator in the morning of Life. Ask of him life for ever more, and he will give it.

Christ's Golden Rule.

Who knows the Golden Rule? You all know it, I hope. You may repeat it:

"Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them."

Who made the rule?

Our Lord Jesus Christ.

Then we may be sure it is a right rule. Have you all got the rule? Have you all got it by heart?

Now, children, what is a rule made for?

To make things right by.

That is what Christ gave to us all the Golden Rule for. You have it in your heart, just as the young carpenter had his foot rule in his pocket. But I am afraid that a great many of you are so foolish that you don't use your Golden Rule. When some playmate, whom perhaps you do not like very well, asks you to do him a favor, and you say, "No I wont; you won't do anything to oblige me, and I won't oblige you," that's not going by the rule. Stop, little boy, little girl, take out your rule; here is something to measure. "Do as you would be done by." Go by the rule. That's what the rule is for. When some boy strikes you, or calls you names, and you clench your hand to strike him in return—stop. Where is your rule? You would be more foolish than the carpenter's apprentice if you were to strike back, while all the time you had Christ's Golden Rule in your mind, which tells you to do as you would be done by.

Bemember that Christ's Golden Rule is given to you to measure things by. That rule is always right. If you see a man, or a woman, or a child that is doing something contrary to that rule, you may be sure they are doing wrong. And remember how foolish and how wrong it is for us, who have the rule, to forget all about it, and to disobey it.

Thoughts for Parents.

1. Be what the children ought to be.
2. Do what the children ought to do.
3. Avoid what they should avoid.
4. Aim always, not only in the presence of the children, but also in their absence, that your conduct may serve them for an example.
5. Are you among them defective? Examine what you are yourself, what you avoid—in a word, your whole conduct.
6. Do you discover in yourself defects, sins, wanderings? Begin by improving yourself, and seek afterward to improve your children.
7. Think well that those by whom you are surrounded are often only the reflection of yourself.
8. If you lead a life of penitence, and seek daily to have grace in you, it will be imparted to you, and through you to your children.
9. If you always seek divine guidance, your children will more willingly be directed by you.
10. The more obedient you are to God, the more obedient will your children be to you. Thus in his childhood the wise Solomon asked of the Lord "an obedient heart" in order to be able to govern his people.
11. As soon as the master becomes lukewarm in communion with God, that lukewarmness will extend itself among his pupils.
12. That which forms a wall of separation between God and yourself will be a source of evil to your children.
13. An example in which love does not form a chief feature is but as the light of the moon —cold and feeble.
14. An example animated by ardent and sincere love shines like the sun—it warms and invigorates.—London Sunday School Magazine.

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should allow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is o desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

NATURE AND IMMORTALITY.

WHEN we endeavor to explore the future, or discover the character of those things that are unseen, by the light of nature, the first thing that demands our attention is to learn the means by which nature divulges the truths in her keeping. Having learned this, we are at once prepared to enter upon the investigation of any subject that may come under our observation.

How then do we learn of nature touching things future or unseen? Let this point be fixed and then we may advance with safety—with some hope of ultimately arriving at just conclusions.

I conceive the only means by which we can gain any light from nature, upon the unknown, is by fixing general principles by observation, and then following those principles where observation is precluded. When we see a train of cars enter a tunnel, we justly conclude that the track within the tunnel is the same as without it, because we have previously established the principle that cars always run upon certain rails beneath them. Just so when we reason from nature upon our future destiny, we must first settle a principle from observation, then follow that principle into the unknown future, and thus we may receive whatever knowledge nature can afford us. It is true that to all principles there may be exceptions, but in reasoning from nature these exceptions can never be allowed, unless there is first shown an evident necessity for them. This possibility of exception will always prevent a demonstration from nature, and such exceptions may even exist in the unknown, where we now see no reason to look for them, but it is still self-evident that to make possible exceptions the basis of an argument is to ignore reason and nature, and launch on the boundless ocean of conjecture. We must reason from what we know. Our premises must be positive truths established directly or indirectly by the evidences of the senses, not wild theories that have as little to do with observation as fancy has with fact; and thus reasoning it is possible, nature might give us many lessons.

Having laid down the principle by which I shall be guided, I now propose to enter upon a search for some of the truths made known by nature concerning the constitution of man, and his chances for a future existence. For the present I shall attempt no demonstration, but having found some facts, and settled some general truths concerning those facts, I shall deduce the conclusions.

In the first hasty survey we take of man, we discover, prominent in his character, the desire of life and of immortality; which is but the desire of life indefinitely extended into the future. To prove that the desire of life is universal, we have only to appeal to the disposition shown to preserve it, and to the united testimony of every sane mind. No man desires non-existence. The suicide may choose it, not because there is in nonentity any thing desirable, but because he thereby hopes to escape certain other and greater evils. If life without misery could be retained, or secured, by a simple volition, death would be unknown. So far as I know, the fact that all men desire immortality has never been questioned; and should any man proclaim himself an exception, the world would look upon him as one beside himself. Let this fact then be noted—All mankind desire immortality.

Following the plan I have marked out, I now proceed to fix certain general principles concerning human desire, and thus a path will be formed upon which we can enter the future.

I observe in myself and other beings of my nature, a multitude of desires, some operating only under certain circumstances, as hunger, thirst, desire of rest; others more general in their object and continual in their action, as the desire for wealth and knowledge; and still another class, more comprehensive than either of the foregoing, as the desire for happiness, and immortality. To the agency of these desires, operating singly, or in combination, we owe every voluntary action of our lives. From their stimulation arises all the marvellous energy and activity of the human character. A moment's consideration will make this apparent. Take from man the desire for food, and the race would soon be exterminated. Take from him the desire for wealth and knowledge, and all would sink into idleness, or be only active to supply their immediate wants. Commerce and manufacture would be at an end, and a universal lethargy would pervade the world. Let man lose the desire for future life, and who would seek immortality? In short, take from human nature the one ingredient of desire, and it is easy to see our existence would be impossible.

Here, then, I think, is fixed one general truth connected with desire—that it is the impelling power which nature uses to urge us to seek some real good.

Again, there is every reason to believe, that under certain circumstances, natnre has provided for the gratification of every desire she has given; for if nature's God is a being of goodness he would not tantalize his creatures with desires for the satisfaction of which he had made no provision. But aside from this, observation shows us that every desire points toward some object. In natural desire the object is real, and, under specified conditions, attainable; as the desire for food, drink, and knowledge. In perverted desire the object is sometimes real and attainable; as in avarice and ambition, and sometimes imaginary, as in the paradise of the Musselman, and the heaven of the spiritualist. Observation, then, teaches this fact, that all natural desires and many perverted ones may be gratified. This is a second general truth.

A third truth is, that desire always implies conditions; or, in other words, that nothing which we desire can be secured but by effort made by ourselves.

If true, this is a most important principle; and that it is true, a little reflection will convince the most skeptical. Hunger and thirst, imply the necessity of procuring something to eat or drink; and unless the soil is tilled, the seed sown, and harvest gathered, all our desires would not save us from famine and death. So of our desire for health; it can only be gratified by obeying the physical laws under which we live.

This is the case with all those desires which recur at regular intervals, or exist only under specified circumstances; they point directly to conditions, without compliance with which not one of them ever has been satisfied, or ever can be. Every desire connected with our animal organization comes to us as active beings, and we must forego its gratification or comply with its demands.

If we look at another class of desires, not necessarily universal, as the desire of wealth, civil or military distinction, we find the same thing true of them. How has it been with every man that has been distinguished for success in his favorite pursuit? Whether in oratory, war, science, or literature, the best years of long lives, or the mightiest efforts of surpassing genius, have been essential to perfect their various designs. Human greatness has always been bought at the price of severe and constant toil.

The desire of fame has always imposed upon its votaries labor as the only condition by which the end could be attained. That "there is nothing worth having that can be had without labor," depends on the truth that desire always implies conditions.

So far then, whether we look at man as an animal or an intellectual being, we find everywhere connected with desire, conditions. Let us approach still nearer the desire of immortality, to those of life and happiness. Except the desire of life, that of happiness, in its universality and comprehensiveness, absorbs all other desires that pertain to our present state. And who can doubt that happiness is conditional? Let us gaze for an instant around us. The whole world is in motion—ceaseless activity pervades every community—heartless despotism—the most cruel oppression, murder, robbery, and vice in all its forms, blight the fair face of the earth. The ocean is whitened with the commerce of all nations; manufactures of almost innumerable variety are to be met with in every quarter of the globe, and agriculture is pursued with an earnestness that shows an object of importance in view Nor does this busy world lack noble instances of philanthropy and self-sacrifice to the general good. All mankind, by means innumerable, are eagerly, often mostly in pursuit of some end, to attain which all their energies are put in requisition;—that end is happiness. All seek to comply with what they conceive to be the conditions by which the end can be gained. The practical opinion of all the race is, that happiness is conditional; and were there no other reason, the experience of every day would place the question beyond doubt. The desire of life is, perhaps, the strongest feeling of our nature; and it is most intimately connected with that of immortality, which is simply life indefinitely extended in the future. But, that life is conditional none will deny.

This examination might be pursued, but the result would be invariably the same. No sooner would desire develop itself, than conditions for its gratification would immediately follow. This is so obvious to every observing mind as to need no proof. Desire and conditions always go hand in hand, and there is no hazard in saying, that not one instance of the unconditional gratification of natural desire can be produced.

I think my third principle is established, and will add, as self-evident, that we never desire to obtain what we now possess, or to retain what we cannot lose.

Here are four principles:

1. That desire is the impelling power which nature uses to urge man to seek or retain some real good.

2. That nature has under certain circumstances provided for the gratification of every desire she has given.

3. That no desire can be gratified except the individual in whom it exists complies with certain conditions.

4. That we never desire to obtain what we now possess, or to retain what we can by no possibility lose.

The first position was—that all desire immortality; and an examination of natural desire shows the four propositions also to be universally true; thus the premises are complete, and the conclusions are apparent.

1. Desire is the impelling power which nature uses to urge men to seek or retain some real good. Therefore immortality is a real good, which nature, by desire, urges us to seek or retain. We cannot desire to retain it, because we do not know that we are immortal. True, men not seldom say they are conscious of indwelling immortality, when in truth they are conscious of exactly the reverse, but hope there is something within of which they are not conscious, that can never die: therefore nature does not urge us to retain immortality. But if this were not the case—(4)—we never desire to retain what we cannot lose; therefore, however durable our natures might be, there would be a possibility of death. But (4) we never desire to obtain what we now possess: yet we desire to obtain immortality, and consequently do not now possess it.

2. Nature—or rather nature's God—has made provision for the gratification of every desire he has given: he has given the desire of immortality; and hence has somewhere made provision for its gratification—man may be immortal.

3. The gratification of every natural desire depends on our compliance with conditions; and it follows that immortality is conditional. These conditions are not revealed in nature, and hence the necessity for some other revelation. But desire is a universal energizing force given to urge us to seek out those conditions, or comply with them when known; and without it we should care as little for the future as the day-fly, whose existence is bounded by the setting sun. But man is made capable of a nobler destiny: he grasps the unending future, and is filled with inexpressible longings for life—eternal life: and these aspirations are the voice of God urging him to seek and use the means by which he may be made immortal.

To reason then from the known to the unknown, so far as desire is concerned, the inevitable conclusion is, conditional immortality. There is no escape, no evasion. Nature never came nearer a mathematical demonstration.

Yet, who has not heard that the longing we feel for endless existence is the "voice of God proclaiming our immortal destiny!" That is, all men desire immortality, therefore all will be immortal! Let us apply the same logic to other subjects. All men desire happiness, therefore all will be happy! All desire food and clothing, therefore no one can be hungry or naked! All desire health, and hence sickness is unknown! What sane man believes such nonsense? Still, in the eye of reason, it is just as near truth as the position that all men desire immortality, and hence all will be immortal.

Suppose, however, my premises are wrong—that all men do not desire immortality, and that the four propositions drawn from the fact of desire are untrue. What then? Simply this: Non-existence. Universal immortality, and conditional immortality, would both fall together, unless one or the other could be proved true from other premises; for though it is true, that if immortality is inherent, we could no more desire it, than we could desire the light of the sun when it is shining upon us in mid-day brilliancy, yet the fact that we do not desire immortality would be far enough from proving that we possess it. If we deny the evidence of desire upon this subject, to me, it appears that the strongest, if not the only argument, against universal and eternal nonentity is broken down. Where does nature clearly indicate even the possibility of eternal life, if not by our desires? It is said, and with apparent plausibility, that the capabilities of our nature afford presumptive evidence that we shall have a future and eternal existence.

This argument will hardly bear the light; for however we look on the human organization, it must be granted that physically, intellectually, and morally, it is imperfect, or in that condition in which surrounding circumstances will inevitably lead to that imperfection. We cannot suppose the God of nature created man with this inherent imperfection, or incapacity to resist those expressive forces which produce that imperfection: hence man must have fallen from some position where his capabilities might have been harmoniously developed; and when this degeneracy occurred the elements of discord and evil were introduced, though many of his capabilities still remained. Now, when man thus became degenerate, the mystery is that he was not destroyed at once and forever—a mystery that nature cannot explain; but Revelation can—"For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish but have everlasting life."

Aside from this, however, if we can affirm with reason that the God of nature would not create such capacities with a view to their final destruction; with equal reason we can affirm, that he would not create them with a view to their remaining undeveloped, or in idleness. Yet in the immense majority of our race the development of their capacities has been in obedience to the same law that develops the capacities of the brute—that of necessity: and nearly all those powres which are said to give man right to expect immortality have lain dormant; and if thus they lie dormant a life time, it cannot be very unreasonable that they should remain so forever. Again, if it is unreasonable that those capacities should be destroyed, it is much more so that they should be perverted and used to blight the earth with crime and woe: but that they are thus used none will deny. Hence, I conclude that the destruction of these capacities is not near so unreasonable as their existence a lifetime in idleness, or their perversion to promote misery; and no more so than the simple fact of human existence in its present degenerate state: and therefore we are driven back to desire, as the foundation which nature gives for any hope of immortality. Thus if my premises are denied, the only result is to take away all hope of an endless existence, and to doom the race to nonentity!

I think I have shown that the utmost that can be proved by human desire is, conditional immortality; and that the strongest argument presented by nature for endless being is found in desire.

In looking at these conclusions one cannot help observing that the God of nature, who in the gift of desire indicated that he had prepared the means for its gratification, is the same God who has "brought life and immortality to light through the Gospel." Desire gives man reason to hope for future life as something that can be secured by complying with conditions which nature does not reveal. But here, where nature is silent, the God of nature reveals to man the means by which he may become immortal: here, where the wisdom of man and the voice of nature have been alike important to give assurance of life, the Creator, by direct irradiation, illuminates the distant boundless future. The "Light of Life" dispels the doubts which nature leaves, and meets us with the assurance that of all things, that are committed unto him, nothing shall be lost; but he will raise it up at the last day. He has severed the bands of death, and at his command the sepulchre shall vainly desire longer to retain its unconscious inmates.

Only by faith in him can that universal desire for being be gratified. He alone holds the keys of death and hell, and he only can unlock the grave, and give life to the sleeping dead: for he only can redeem the soul from the power of the grave.

BY JOEL A. SIMONDS.

The Punishment of the Wicked.

I HAVE already shown that in the law given to Adam for the government of the world forever, the punishment was simply, "Thou shalt surely die."

That in the first description of their punishment under the gospel, it is said, "In sorrow shalt thou eat bread all the days of thy life, till thou return to the ground, for out of it was thou taken, for dust thou art and unto dust shalt thou return." The punishment under the law, and under the gospel are the same, and alike final.

I have also shown that the general tenor of the whole Bible confirms the same punishment as complete and final. Thus far we have a complete and harmonious view of the subject. I will now call attention to the proposition

That the Wicked will not be made alive to be punished again.

1. Positive Testimony Fully Expressed.—Job ii. 4, 19: Drought and heat consume the snow waters, so doth the grave those which have sinned. He shall be no more remembered. This is not spoken of any particular class of sinners, but of sinners in general. Psa. xlix. 12, 20: Man that is in honor and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish. They shall never see light. Like sheep are they laid in the grave. All the wicked seem to be included in this description. Prov. xxi. 16: The man that wandereth out of the way of understanding (from whatever cause) shall remain in the congregation of the dead. Destruction shall be to them. Isai. xxvi. 14: They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise; thou hast visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish. This passage, probably, refers to the Egyptians, who had had dominion over the children of Israel, and who were destroyed in the Red Sea. If this is true of that class of wicked men, it must be true of all who are like them. If God is satisfied with one such punishment for the worst class of sinners, it seems reasonable that he should be satisfied with the punishment of ordinary death for all ordinary sinners. 2 Pet. ii. 12: But these shall utterly perish in their own corruption, as natural brute beasts perish and are destroyed. This is said of those who had apostatized from the faith, who had once known the way of righteousness, but had turned from the holy commandment. They perish as beasts perish. If beasts are not made alive again, but die once for all, these wicked men will not be made alive again, but their death will be as final as the death of beasts. 1 John v. 12: He that hath not the Son of God hath not life. John vi. 53: Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you. What is meant by having no life, is explained in John iii. 36: He that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him. What this wrath is, is shown in Rom. i. 18, 32: For the wrath of God is revealed from heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. Then follows a description of all sorts of wicked practices. What is revealed against such wickedness? The judgment of God is, that they which commit such things are worthy of death. Death, then, is the punishment revealed against all who practice such things. This is God's wrath under which the wicked will abide when they shall not see life.

These testimonies are simple affirmations that the wicked will perish like the beasts; that they will not see light or life, or have life, or live, but that they will be consumed in the grave, and remain in the congregation of the dead, under the wrath of God. They are in perfect agreement with the penalty of the law, and with the first description of punishment under the gospel, and with the general tenor of the Bible on the subject. The obvious sense of the language used to describe this punishment is that death is the complete and final punishment of wicked men. Thus far we may all be of one mind.

2. Testimony Expressed and Implied by Contrast.—Psa. xlix. 12, 20: Man that is in honor and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish, they shall never see light; like sheep, they are laid in the grave. But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave. The wicked will remain in the grave like sheep, but the righteous will be redeemed from the grave. Prov. xxi. 16: The wicked shall remain in the congregation of the dead, implying that the righteous will not remain among the dead. Isai. xxvi. 14, 19: They are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise, but thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise. The wicked dead shall not live, but the righteous dead will live. Luke xx. 35: But they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, they will attain unto the resurrection of the dead, implying that those who are not found worthy to attain unto it, will not attain unto it. John v. 40: Ye will not come to me that ye might have life, implying that no one will have life unless he come to Christ. John vi. 39: And this is the Father's will which hath sent me, that of all which he hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day, implying that all others will be lost because they are not raised up at the last day. Verse 40: And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one that seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day, implying that those who do not believe on him will not be raised up at the last day. Verses 44, 45: Every man, therefore, that hath heard, and hath learned of the Father, cometh to me, and I will raise him up at the last day, implying that those who do not hear the Father, and learn of him, will not come to Christ, and will not be raised up at the last day. Verse 54: Whoso eateth my flesh, and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day. Except a man do this he hath no life in him, and will not be raised up at the last day. Rom. i. 32: Who, knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, implying that none will have life but such as are worthy to live. Rom. viii. 11: But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you, implying that those who do not have the Spirit of God dwelling in them, will not have their mortal bodies quickened. Verse 23: Even we ourselves, which have the first fruits of the Spirit, groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, to wit, the redemption of our body, implying that those who do not have the first fruits of the Spirit, will not have their bodies redeemed. Phil. iii. 11: If by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead, implying that those who do not thus strive will not attain unto the resurrection of the dead. 1 Thess. iv. 14, 16: For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him (from the dead), implying that those who do not sleep in him, will not be brought from the dead again. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise, implying that those who are not dead in Christ will not rise. 1 Cor. xv.: For as all in Adam die, even so all in Christ shall be made alive, but every man in his own order, Christ the first-fruits, afterward they that are Christ's at his coming, implying that none but those who are in Christ at his coming will be made alive. For the trumpet shall sound, and the dead (in Christ) shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed, implying that none but those who are in Christ, and worthy to be raised incorruptible, will be raised from the dead.

This kind of testimony might be largely increased, but sufficient has been adduced to show the drift of the Scriptures on this subject. Although much of this testimony is implied, yet it is just as obviously the sense of the language used, as if that which is implied had been fully expressed. The implied sense is unavoidable. This testimony, also, is in perfect agreement with the penalty of the law, and with the first punishment under the gospel, and with the general tenor of the Bible on the subject, and with the positive testimony I have introduced. The harmony is complete. Not a jarring text has been adduced. In all this testimony we have a sure foundation for a unit faith. Upon the ground thus far examined we may all be of one mind and of one judgment. Not a dissenting voice has been heard, not a conflicting sentiment has been expressed. All with one accord agree, that the penalty of the law, "thou shalt surely die," is the whole, the complete, and the final punishment of all wicked men.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., Oct., 1870.

MARK IX. 39.

BY O. S. HALSTED.

I RECEIVED recently a letter from a gentleman at present residing in Indiana, informing me that he is "engaged in writing a work in which the subject of the Gospel miracles comes up, but that he has access to no Greek Testament (there), and is therefore ignorant of the Greek word, and its literal meaning and derivation, employed by Christ in Mark ix. 39, and in the E. V. rendered miracle, thus: There is no man which shall do a miracle in my name that can lightly speak evil of me:" and asking: "Will you kindly enlighten me in this matter?" The letter is from an accomplished scholar, whom I had met several times before he left New York for Indiana, and must be taken as kindly complimentary.

The answer I sent him is as follows: You call my attention to the word miracle, used in the English version in Mark ix. 39, thus: "There is no man which shall do a miracle in my name that can lightly speak evil of me." The Greek of Mark ix. 39 is: oudeis os poiesei dunamin epi to onomati mou kai dunesetai tachu kakologesai me. Dunamin is the Greek word for which the E. V. has miracle. It is the accusative singular of dunamis, which is defined in Donnegan's Greek Lexicon, "potency, power, bodily vigor—power, mental ability, aptitude—weight, influence, property; rank, office—forces, faculty, efficacy, value; met. intrinsic worth, merit—in Geometry, the area of a figure—meaning, import efficacy; a remedy." Thus far, the rendering I should give is: No one who will do a remedy, "Epi to onomati mon." Epi, says Donnegan, is "a preposition governing the genitive, dative, and accusative cases—primary sense, on, upon." He then gives instances of its use with the genitive of a noun, no one of which suits in the passage we are examining. He then says: "With the dative [the case here] epi expresses subordination, the being in the power of any one—and, a condition—on, dependent on; on, on the condition; also expressing the object, or aim, as 'in order to,' or 'for,' for the purpose of; for, in order to get—with the consequence of; hence 'by,' on account of, hence 'at,' as to laugh at, al as a definition of place, with, along with, after, immediately after—in addition to, besides, moreover—expressing occupations or employments, over." He then gives instances of its use with the accusative of a noun; no one of which suits in the passage. And after giving its use in composition with verbs, he gives other instances of its use with a dative, among which he gives "epi Patroklo—for, in honor of, Patroclus." Epi to onomati mon, therefore, in the passage, is to be rendered, I think, either "on," or "upon," or "in subordination to," or "dependent on," or "along with," or "with," or "in honor of," the name of me. Dunesetai, in the last clause of the passage, is the third person singular future of the verb dunamai, (whence dunamis), for which Donnegan gives, "to be able, primary sense I can." Kai dunesetai, in the passage, is to be rendered, "also will be able," or "also am" (we should say, "will also be able," or "can also," that is, can consistently) tachu kakologesai me, easily revile me, or, more literally, evil speak me. (The Greek me, in the passage, is the accusative).

You will put the clauses together, giving to epi the signification which strikes you as best. The 40th verse, E. V., "For he that is not against us is on our part," agrees well with the rendering above given of verse 39. For poiesei, in the future oppoieo, I have given will do, in preference to shall do, as better expressing the sense: no one who will do a remedy and will also, or, can also, revile me. Shall, in the future tense of a verb, is often used in the E. V., where will would better express the sense; and will is sometimes used where shall would better express the sense. Instances of the latter are found in John vi. 40 and 54, where the E. V. has "and I will raise him up at the last day." It should be, I shall raise him up, that is, through my death and resurrection. Verse 57 says, E. V., "So he that eateth me, even he shall live by [or, through] me." It should he, will live by, or, through, me.

How, and why, should the E. V. give miracle for the Greek word dunamin in the passage? It has no such meaning. But King James' ecclesiastics believed in orthodoxy's devils; and so, having given in v. 38, "one casting out devils," (which to do of orthodoxy's devils would be a miracle), they take license and put the word miracle in the answer of the master. They thus make it out that the one who did the remedy did a miracle. And this is accepted by the mass of readers of the E. V. as the true meaning of the two verses 38 and 39. But when we get the true signification of the word dunamin—a remedy, in v. 39, it shows us that the phrase "casting out devils," in v. 38, means just what it means wherever it occurs in Scripture, namely, performing cures, doing remedies, healing diseases.

THE WITHERED HAND.

BY WM. H. SPENCER.

ON one occasion during our Saviour's ministry a man came to him with a withered hand, expecting, doubtless that Christ would perform a miracle in restoring him, as the rich and the lame far and near had been brought to him and had been healed. "Then saith he to the man, Stretch forth thine hand. And he stretched it forth, and it was restored whole like unto the other."—Matt. xii. 10–13.

It is very certain that had he not obeyed the requirement of the Master, he would not have had his hand restored. It was the instant obedience and faith in Him who commanded, that like the lightning's flash, sent health and strength through his veins, and muscles, and gave him power to use his arm like unto the other. So it is with us from the day our feet first touched the stream of sin, our only safety lies in perfect obedience to the requirements of Him who alone can save us. The first weak dawn of faith that says, this is Jesus; he has come to save, I will trust him; the first faint cry of faith, "Lord, save me, or I perish," though we were on the foaming precipice, at the very instant of need, the mighty delivery power of God has been exercised, and we have been enabled to lay hold of Christ as "an anchor sure and steadfast," and we may be said to have passed from death unto life. Take the assurance of this from the word of God: "Verily I say unto you, he that heareth my word, and believeth on Him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life."—John v. 24. Dear reader, this is the word of Him that cannot lie; it was his mission to give you eternal life; he is waiting to be gracious to you, and to every sinner, to take you as it were, in the greatness of his love, into his arms and wash your sins away, and he will never leave nor forsake you. (Isa. x. i. 17.)

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 9, 1870.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

OUR EDITOR'S HEALTH.

A SHORT paragraph in last week's paper called attention to the illness of our venerable Editor. He had contracted a heavy cold, but, thinking he could resist it and throw it off without suspension of work, he continued his daily editorial labors until a week since, when, growing rapidly worse, he was compelled to yield and take to his bed. A severe inflammation, resulting from the cold, in conjunction with fever of somewhat typhoid tendency reduced him with great rapidity, and fears began to be entertained. Through several days and nights he was anxiously watched over and tenderly cared for by his family, assisted by sympathizing friends, and we now rejoice to be able to inform his many friends scattered abroad that he is somewhat better, though he is not yet entirely out of danger. We know not whether in his improvement, medicine, kind care, or prayer has been the most potent agent; but this we know, the first has been dealt with skilful hands, the second bestowed with diligence, and the last earnestly and faithfully made.

For nearly half a century a prominent soldier of the cross, much of which time has been spent in unyielding contention for the faith once delivered to the saints, nothing but an assurance that his work is all done, and that it is the will of the Master that his servant should lie down in peace to sleep, could assuage the grief into which the loss, at this hour of the struggle, of such a hero in the strife would plunge us all. Let us all, then, make his speedy and complete recovery a subject of earnest petition. L. C. T.

BAPTISM.

ALTHOUGH this subject has from time to time been discussed somewhat in these columns, we have heretofore been purposely silent on it. Not that we were ashamed or afraid to stand in defence of what we believe to be truth, but as numbers of our fellow-laborers, whom we love with a pure heart fervently, differ with us on the question, we have deemed it wise to forbear, and to so direct our efforts as not only avoid wounding the feelings of any but to be sure also of promoting harmony and brotherly love. When, however, Christian Editors make bold to openly charge with infidelity those who contend for the baptism of the Spirit, we judge it well, in rejecting the unkind fling, to set forth the ground of our faith. The "Christian Standard," a Baptist publication, of Cincinnati, contains an article professedly in review of certain arguments by Bro. Storrs in support of the essentiality of the baptism of the Spirit, in which the reviewer indulges a copious use of such terms as infidel, self-worshipper, infidelity, disgraceful, etc., and on the whole, executes a "criticism" of such truly "loose and sprawling style" as to be unaccountable on any hypothesis other than that he has signally failed to appreciate the force of the affirmative arguments, and that he has a dim conception of his inability to properly meet them. When one's understanding of a given text of Scripture does not correspond with our own, it is of course very easy to accuse that one of infidelity, but let none overlook the fact that it is quite unchristian as well.

Passing by the individual objections of our neighbor, for we really cannot think them worthy of more than general notice, let us proceed to a direct examination of the subject. The one text from which it is concluded by many that the practice of water baptism is by divine command is Matt. xxviii. 19. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them, etc. Cautioning all who differ with us in our explication of this or any text against so far forgetting the high and holy principles and requirements of the Christian religion as to charge us with "infidelity," we remark that, notwithstanding the other Evangelists do not quite support Matthew on this point, we accept the text just as it stands. We would not add to or take from it one iota. We understand that Jesus had reference to baptism of the Spirit and not to that of water. No advocate of water baptism, however zealous he may be, will undertake to say, we think, that the text, in itself considered, justifies him in deducing from it a command to water baptism one whit more than it justifies us in deducing from it a command to Spirit baptism. The difference of opinion on the text arises entirely from the manner of understanding it; hence the worse than folly of any one imputing to another, denial of God's word.

How, the question arises, are we to know what the Saviour meant? Why, says one, Peter must have understood the command perfectly, and if we find him baptizing with water after the Holy Ghost came upon him it settles the matter. Just here let us suggest the correction of a misapprehension. The idea obtains in some minds that the very moment the disciples received the Holy Ghost they possessed all truth. Jesus told them: "The Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you."—John xiv. 26. "Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth.—John xvi. 13. If any think this teaching, and guiding, and bringing to remembrance was all accomplished at once and instantaneously, that it was not a process, let them read closely for they may have occasion to think differently. No teacher makes a proficient of his pupil in an hour. If, therefore, we do find Peter baptizing with water we may not hastily conclude it was by command of Jesus, but only that he thought it was. "Oh horror!" I hear some exclaim, "Do you deny the infallibility of Peter?"

The peculiarity of John's ministration was water baptism. Pointing out the difference between his own baptism and that of Christ, he says, addressing the Jews, "I indeed baptize you with water, . . . but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, . . . he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost." Again: "I said, I am not the Christ; but that I am sent before him. He must increase, but I must decrease." With reference to the same, Jesus said: "For John truly baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost." These declarations clearly demonstrate that the baptism of John, and that of Christ are two distinct and quite different baptisms. The one was of water, outward and typical, to continue only until the end of the outward dispensation, which is superseded by the Messianic, its great antitype; the other inward and spiritual, operating to the purifying of the heart, and to continue not only during the apostolic age but to "increase" throughout the gospel dispensation. No one can read the Acts of the Apostles, and the epistles without being impressed with the fact that considerable time elapsed before the Apostles lost their attachment to Jewish rites. Although John's baptism, that of water, was to "decrease" and give place to the baptism of Christ, that of the Spirit, it is true that some of the apostles did practice it, as they did also other things enjoined under the law. But the apostles' practice of water baptism for a time, on their commanding it in some instances, was not by command of the Master. Let it be borne in mind Christ did not at once open to the apostles the fulness of his spiritual dispensation; that was to be the work of the Spirit. "Howbeit," said he, "when he, the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth." The apostles were from time to time enlightened by the Spirit of truth, and under that enlightenment they came more fully to understand the spiritual nature of the Christian dispensation; and as they learned, they were delivered from their attachment to the rituals of the law, which Peter, when he became more fully illuminated, called a "yoke" that neither they nor their fathers were able to bear.

It is, perhaps, undeniable that Peter understood the command of Jesus to baptize to relate to John's baptism, and it was natural he should for he, as yet, understood nothing of Christ's baptism; and it is equally undeniable that he failed to comprehend the command to "teach all nations" for it was not until eight years after that he learned he was to teach the Gentiles. All will admit that the Spirit finally led him out of the latter error; let us see whether it did not "guide" him out of the other also. When through certain supernatural agencies, he was brought into the company of some Gentiles at the house of Cornelius, he "began to speak" to them, and says he, "the Holy Ghost fell on them as on us at the beginning. Then remembered I the word of the Lord, how that he said, John indeed baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost." How very clear it is, from the fact of Peter's referring so immediately to it on this occasion, that he regarded the Holy Ghost's falling on them, through the medium of his ministry, as Christ's baptism of the Holy Ghost. Peter had little thought that the Lord commanded him to teach Gentiles, but he learned better at this time and was afterward censured by the brethren, until they became better informed, for acting according to his new light. He had no thought either, perhaps, that Christ referred to any other than John's baptism but when he saw the Gentiles, a people to whom John's ministration did not extend, baptized with the Holy Spirit, much light burst in upon him. The Spirit of truth brought to his remembrance what Jesus said about two distinct baptisms. "John indeed baptized with water, but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost." Some twelve years later, in the council, at Jerusalem, we find him defending the Gentiles against some who would impose upon them certain rituals of the law, saying "why tempt ye God, to put a yoke upon the neck of the disciples?"

But, says one, Peter commanded water baptism upon the occasion referred to, when the Gentiles had received the Holy Spirit. That is true; but what does it prove? It proves, simply, that Peter did not at once so fully comprehend the importance of what the Spirit brought to his "remembrance" as to realize the superfluousness of water baptism. We maintain he did afterward realize it, and from the fact that we do not hear of his subsequently administering the rite, and also from certain expressions found in his epistles, we are led to the conclusion that he abandoned the practice. Thus the facts in the case are, as we believe, first: the baptism of John and that of Christ, are different and distinct baptisms. Second: the command of Christ, Matt. xxviii. 19, had reference to his own baptism. Third: while the apostles believed, for a time, that John's baptism was an ordinance of the Christian dispensation, and practiced it accordingly, yet the Spirit of truth, which Jesus said should lead and guide into all truth, did so perfect its work as to bring them to a right understanding of Christ's baptism and dispensation. Then it was they understood the explicit testimony of John: "He that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining on him, the same is he which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost."

There is another apostle to be consulted in this matter. Where does Paul stand on the question? In the early part of his ministry he baptized some, but the Spirit soon led him to the truth on the subject. Speaking of the ordinance, he says: "I thank God that I baptized none of you but Crispus and Gaius . . . and I baptized also the household of Stephanas: beside, I know not whether I baptized any other. For Christ sent me not to baptize" (with water) 1 Cor. i. 14–17. Now mark: As Christ commanded the apostles to baptize all nations, Paul, who was second to none of the apostles, could have had no cause to discontinue water baptism and to "thank God" that he had practiced it so little, if he believed it to be the baptism of Christ. Knowing how efficient were the efforts of Paul; that he "labored more abundantly than they all," none will deny that he had as full a commission from Christ as any of the apostles, and was equally inspired. If that be granted, and it must be, and that the command in Matt. xxviii. did not authorize him to baptize with water, how can it any one after him? If, therefore, it be conceded, which is not necessary, that Christ's command to "the eleven disciples" related to water baptism, that they were commissioned to perform that rite, it cannot be reasonably maintained that the commission extended to any one after them, for had it done so it must have included Paul above all others. But he affirmed he received no such commission. Thus to them who insist that Christ commanded "the eleven" apostles to practice water baptism, both logic and consistency must suggest that the command was only to them, and hence neither gives authority for its later practice, nor furnishes justification for its continuance.

The question here occurs, What did Paul, when he discontinued water baptism, and reflected that "Christ sent" him "not to baptize" with water, come to regard as the one true and essential baptism? We reply, that of the Spirit. It is not wise to suppose there can be two saving baptisms under this dispensation. Of that which Paul regards as such he says: "For as many of you as have been baptized into Christ, have put on Christ."—Gal. iii. 27. Does Paul refer to water baptism? No: "For by one Spirit are we all baptized into one body . . . and have been all made to drink into one Spirit."—1 Cor. xii. 13. Paul had occasion to know that some were baptized with water without being "baptized into Christ;" without having "so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost." He asked these "unto what then were ye baptized? And they said unto John's baptism." When Paul told them the nature of John's baptism, "they were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus:" Paul performing the ceremony in this instance, as we think, by laying his hands on them and imparting to them the Holy Spirit. When these persons had received the baptism which Paul believed in, they were in the condition described by him as "baptized into Christ;" they had "put on Christ." What have we here? We have Paul asserting "Christ sent me not to baptize" with water; we have him, an instrument in the hands of Christ, baptizing with the Holy Spirit; and we have him declaring that by the baptism of this "one Spirit" do we become members of the body of Christ. Again we say, then, that admitting, for the moment, all that is claimed of Matt. xxviii. 19; that it is a command to "the eleven disciples" to baptize with water, still the command did not reach beyond them, else it would have extended to Paul, which was not the case.

It is asserted, "every attempt to subvert the ordinances, and establish a religion entirely spiritual and internal, will land in infidelity." This well meaning, doubtless, but misguided editor, here speaks whereof he knows not. Has he ever heard of a religious people called Friends? Attaching no importance to the ordinances, they have attempted not to "establish a religion entirely spiritual" but to re-establish the largely subverted spiritual religion introduced by our Lord Jesus Christ. The society has existed and grown now going on two centuries: has their religion ended in infidelity? Let him search Christendom throughout, and see if he can find a religious sect which, as a body, are farther removed from infidelity. And yet a case of water baptism has never been known in the society. An experience of a hundred and thirty years ought to be a fair test of the infidel tendencies of a given faith. We mention Friends because they have never practiced water baptism. Certain other religionists are fast discontinuing it and other ordinances, but we venture to say they are not in consequence sliding toward infidelity. This Cincinnati editor makes a weak and homely attempt at ridiculing the idea that to be baptized with the Holy Spirit is to receive the gift of it, become a subject of its indwelling. Why did he not include Peter, and make him a subject of ridicule also? The language respecting the Gentiles to whom Peter preached at the house of Cornelius is: "While Peter yet spake these words, the Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the word." In relating the circumstance, the apostle says: "Then remembered I the word of the Lord . . . ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost." Is any thing clearer than that Peter regarded their receiving the Holy Spirit as the baptism of it?

Before closing, we will quote briefly from Rev. Wm. Dell, an Episcopal clergyman, who wrote on the subject during the last century. After showing the distinction between the baptism of John, and that of Christ, he says: "By these things it is evident, that Christ's baptism and John's are distinct; and, therefore, as what God hath joined, no man ought to put asunder, so what God hath put asunder, no man ought to join; as if the baptism of Christ were insufficient and incomplete, except we should add to it the baptism of John; which is exceedingly to eclipse the brightness of the Son of God, and to draw a veil over the greatest glory of the New Testament, which is the baptism of the Spirit."

We have no controversy with them who feel it their duty to observe the ordinance of water baptism, but we must be permitted to counsel them against falling into the error of accepting the shadow in place of the substance. To be true members of the body of Christ, we must be by the "one Spirit" baptized into that body. May such be the experience of all who name the name of Christ.

TO THE FRIENDS OF THE HERALD OF LIFE.

I AM informed by the daughter of dear Br. STORRS, that he is quite sick, and in all probability will be unable to attend to the duties of Editor for some time. As this will throw considerable burden and labor upon Br. THORNE, our Assistant Editor, I hope the friends will do all they can to assist him. You that are able to write short and good articles for the paper I hope will do it, recollecting that long articles, and badly written, are no help, but a hindrance, for he or some one else must read them all through and make them presentable, a thing that requires much labor. I write these few lines not to find fault with any one's articles, but out of regard to the labors of Br. THORNE, who is not well himself. Therefore make your articles as short and as good as possible, for then you will assist, and not add to his labors.

JACOB GRIM.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 6, 1870.

THE EUROPEAN WAR.

SINCE our issue of last week, important events have transpired at the seat of war. The surrender of Metz, with its vast army, large quantities of munitions of war, and stores sufficient, it is said, to have carried both army and inhabitants through the winter, threw the Republic into an excitement most intense. Marshal Bazaine, the surrendering commander, is widely denounced as a traitor. His reasons for capitulating are not fully known, but while they will very likely satisfy unprejudiced persons they must be strong indeed to justify the act in the minds of his people. So disheartening was the fall of Metz, even Garabaldi, a few days since so confident of success, seems to have become painfully impressed with the hopelessness of the cause he has espoused. The more is he discouraged, doubtless, because the jealousy of many of the French officers is such that they would prefer, it is said, not to be saved at all rather than be saved by him.

Napoleon, from his seclusion at Wilhelmshoe, has issued a sort of defence of the Empire, and explanation of his failure, but such an attempt at justification must of necessity add to the ridiculousness in which he appears before the world. A victim to his own lustful folly and wicked ambition, he can gain nothing by blaming others rather than himself.

Deeply humiliating to France as is the loss of Metz, it was hoped by many the event would turn to her advantage by hastening an armistice. On Saturday last it was reported and believed that an armistice had been concluded. As a harbinger of peace, it carried balm to millions of anxious, aching hearts; but on Monday it was learned the treaty had not been consummated. It would seem that the French people are so frenzied with disappointment and humiliation, they are blind to their simplest interests. O how deeply has the nation drank of the cup of sorrow. When men have grown weary in telling the story of miseries brought upon a confiding people, words will have but half told the sufferings endured. From Westphalia, Rhenish Prussia, and Hanover, a protest against the prosecution of the war signed by nearly 36.000 widows, with over 78.000 children, has been sent to Berlin. The government is implored to save the miserable signers from starvation, now that their husbands and fathers are dead, the factories closed and means of livelihood cut off. The following appeal has been signed by the leading civil officers of those provinces of France which have been overrun by the Prussian armies:

"To all neutral nations, and to all those among the belligerents who have not suffered from a hostile invasion in 1870: We, inhabitants of those parts of France which are occupied by the German armies, particularly the departments of the Moselle, the Meuse, and the Ardennes, ask assistance from you—not that assistance which will involve the loss of more lives; we ask for aid to preserve our existence, not only at this moment, but after the establishment of peace. Most generous sympathy has been shown toward the sick and wounded by those whom we address; kindly hands have brought healing balm to the direct victims of the terrible weapons of war; strong hearts have interposed to arrest the scythe of the Angel of Destruction. But other misfortunes, more remote perhaps, but surely much greater, are still ignored.

"The people of France depend for their subsistence upon grain cultivated by themselves, and upon cattle which they raise. In the sections of country which have been traversed by the German armies, there now remain none of the provisions which had been gathered in times of peace. Our houses, our barns, our stables, are either burned down or pierced by cannon-balls. The fields have been trampled under the feet of numerous legions. We have no power to gather either the hay or the cereals of Autumn. All our draft animals, our beef cattle, our cows, our sheep, our swine, have been taken from us. All our farm-laborers are called to serve either as soldiers of France or as wagoners in the German armies. We are deprived of all means with which to prepare the soil for seed for the crop of next season. We have been robbed even of our agricultural implements and our seed-grain. In many places the earth itself cannot be turned by plow because a cursed and horrible seed has already been sown there—immense numbers of human corpses. We are at this moment face to face with the terrors of hunger; famine and pestilence, during the coming Winter and Spring, must certainly be the sad consequences of the war. The cries of children, asking their fathers for bread which they have not, already fill the air, while the tears of widows and orphans without shelter, falling upon the earth over which these misfortunes hover prevent the blood-stains from drying.

"You, our brothers of America, ought to know the desolation in the midst of which we are now living; you are rapidly rising from a similar misfortune. Your country is naturally rich; ours is naturally poor. Our resources sustain no comparison with yours. Our suffering, then, must be, though such a thing can hardly be expressed, more poignant than yours has been. You, our brothers of Great Britain, know the comfort and the safety of a country where "the home of every man is his castle." You have not, during many centuries, suffered the ravages of an invasion. Picture to yourselves the destruction of all your means of sustaining life, and then refuse, if that be possible, to assist without delay, your neighbors who are perishing!

You, our brothers of the entire human race —without excepting even the victorious Germans, who, now that we are conquered, cannot desire our annihilation—we beg you all to come to our rescue."

To all who are familiar with the prophetic word, and have confidence in its fulfilment, it is glorious indeed to contemplate the near approach of that glad time when, under the beneficent reign of the Prince of Peace, swords will be beaten into ploughshares, and spears into pruning-hooks: when nation shall no more lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. L. C. T.

A Wise Arrangement.

A NEW and peculiar feature of the Hebrew Orphan Asylum of this city, and one which ought to be adopted in every institution of the kind, is the establishment of a school of industry, in which boys who are willing to do so receive instruction in some trade, so that when they leave the asylum they are competent mechanics. The first experiment was in the boot and shoe manufacturing, at which there are a number of boys engaged, under a competent man as their teacher. Beside making all the boots and shoes needed in the asylum, they work for outside customers. The factory has been in operation something over a year, and the first twelve month's experience resulted in work done to the amount of about seventeen hundred dollars. A printing office has also been established, and other trades will be added. The boys receive a portion of the proceeds of their labor. The managers of the Asylum have certainly hit upon a wise plan, for it cannot fail to be of incalculable benefit to the little ones.

Resurrection and Translation.

BY E. WOLCOTT.

"Behold, I show you a mystery: We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed."—1 Cor. xv. 51, 52.

THE apostle Paul in the above plainly teaches us that the translation of the living and the resurrection of the dead saints are simultaneous; and the apostle affirms the same truth in writing his first letter to the Thessalonians. He says: "For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God: and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds to meet the Lord in the air: and so shall we ever be with the Lord."—1 Thess. iv. 16, 17. In addition to a clear statement of of the same facts found in 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52, here the Lord's descent from heaven is affirmed as taking place at the same time. This truth is corroborated by our Lord's own words that "when the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory." —Matt. xxv. 31. Again he said: "For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father, with his angels; and then shall he reward every man according to his works."—Matt. xvi. 27.

From these Scriptures we learn that all the angels of God will come with Christ from heaven, and that it is the time for him to mete out reward to every man according to his works. But what do the angels come for? Let our Lord answer: "And he shall send his angels with a great sound of a trumpet, and they shall gather together his elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to the other."—Matt. xxiv. 31. The angels are to gather the saints from the four corners of the earth wherever they may dwell in that day; and in the same connection he tells us how they will be found. "Then shall two be in the field; the one shall be taken, and the other left. Two women shall be grinding at the mill, (a custom peculiar to Eastern lands in the early morn;) the one shall be taken and the other left."—Matt. xxiv. 40, 41. In Luke xvii. the same scene is presented. Here we learn that according to the rotation of the earth there will be early morn in some parts of the earth when the morning meal is preparing, full day in other parts when men shall go into the field to labor, and night in other parts when men go to their beds; and these different positions will be occupied all at the same moment of time. In these different positions Jesus says his angels will find his elect, and that those who are not worthy of deliverance, will be left. All these things attend the resurrection and translation, and after these "the end."

Behold, the coming of Christ and the end of the world draweth nigh! "But," says one, "what reason have you for speaking thus?" We answer,

(1.) Because it is generally disbelieved and scoffed at. Peter said: "There shall come in the last days scoffers, walking after their own lusts, and saying, Where is the promise of his coming? for since the Fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of creation. For this they are willingly ignorant of, that by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water and in the water; whereby the world that then was, being overflowed with water, perished: but the heavens and the earth, which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men."—2 Pet. iii.

(2.) The world and the church generally cry "peace and safety." The apostle said: "When they shall say, peace and safety, then sudden destruction cometh upon them (those who say "peace and safety"), as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape."—1 Thess. v. 3. The belief pervades the masses now that the world is to be converted and Christ reign in the hearts of all people for a thousand years before the end of the world. This doctrine virtually says "peace and safety"—i. e., you need not give yourselves any concern about the end of the world, for at least it is a thousand years distant. All this is said in the face of the words of Christ: "As it was in the days of Noe, so shall it be also in the days of the Son of man. They did eat, they drank, they married wives, they were given in marriage, until the day that Noe entered into the ark, and the flood came, and destroyed them all. Likewise also as it was in the days of Lot; they did eat, they drank, they bought, they sold, they planted, they builded; but the same day that Lot went out of Sodom it rained fire and brimstone from heaven, and destroyed them all. Even thus shall it be in the day when the Son of man is revealed."—Luke xvii. 26–30. And Paul says: "This know also, that in the last days perilous times shall come. For men shall be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, depressers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high-minded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God; having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof."—2 Tim. iii. 1–5.

Dear reader, the final storm of God's wrath is at hand. If you continue careless and at ease you will find no refuge in that day, as the unbelieving multitude in the days of Noah. Soon the angels will come to gather the righteous from the wicked. If you but secure Christ as your refuge in the fearful day of God's wrath, the gathering darkness of the heavens above you will cause you no dismay, but with joy you will mount up as on eagle's wings to meet your descending King, with transports of joy, your vile body glorified, and your face shining as the sun in its strength.

NOTE.—The foregoing interesting thoughts were gathered from some miscellaneous manuscripts of Br. W., written at sundry times before the failure of his health, and we doubt not they will be read with profit by the many readers of the HERALD.

Distinct Entity.

BY H. J. SWEETLAND.

I HAD an opportunity quite lately to listen to a discourse delivered by an Immaterialist, who labored hard to prove that the righteous possess a distinct entity called the soul, or spirit, which does not come wholly under the power of death at the dissolution of the body, but survives with just life enough to secure the resurrection of the body.

The text was 1 Cor. ii. 11, "For what man knoweth the things of a man save the spirit of man which is in him: even so the things of God knoweth no man but the Spirit of God."

It was argued that because man is said to have a spirit, and that "it is in him," it must be something that lives after the body is dead. It was admitted that the spirit in the text is the mind. But it was argued that the mind was not dependent on bodily organism for its existence. Where is the evidence that mind can work apart from matter? Who ever witnessed the phenomenon of thought when no nervous matter was present? Give us a single instance. All we know of mind is in connection with a living brain. Give us an instance of a brainless mind, and we will acknowledge it. But the next verse, 1 Cor. ii. 12, seems to settle the matter. Now we have not received the spirit of the world, etc. The spirit of the world is in the world, and there is just the same evidence that it is a distinct entity from the world, if the world is destroyed, as there is of the mind being a distinct entity when the body is dissolved into dust. The meaning of the text is this: man is alone conscious of the operations of his own mind; no one knows it unless he reveals it. Just so with God. No one knoweth the things of God, but the mind of God, without a revelation. This is settled in verse 16, "For who hath known the mind of the Lord?"

It was argued that materialism denies the resurrection of the dead; a portion of man must survive death, and that the surviving part is a Spiritual, Immaterial Entity. The word immaterial, not material, not matter, does not appear to be applicable to any thing in the universe. But for the sake of argument, we will suppose there can be an immaterial thing in existence; how will you prove it? You cannot see it, for sight of it would prove the thing material. You cannot hear, taste, smell nor feel it. It is not tangible to any of the five senses. How, then, will you define it? The fact is that which is immaterial has a name, but cannot be found anywhere in the universe. Therefore the defender of Immaterialism has no more argument to prove his distinct entity to help the Lord raise the dead, than the materialist has, nor so much, for the materialist believes that all that pertains to a dead man is material, and he will be wholly material in the resurrection, although spiritual in his nature, while the immaterialist believes that the immaterial, spiritual entity is necessary to raise the dead, while, in fact, it does not exist. The soul, or spirit is an attribute and not an entity. Life and organism are necessarily connected to make a living man. The same argument was used that we have often heard Spiritualists use, viz., Man dies, and where is his body? It is diffused through earth, sea and air. If he does not exist, how can he be raised from the dead, etc.? We ask, If he does exist in a state of life, how can he be raised from the dead? When the Lord told Adam that he should return to the dust from whence he came, did he not give him to understand that he would deprive him of his conscious existence, and put him back as he was before his creation? And does not the whole human family follow their first progenitor? The Bible reveals the materials of which man is composed, so that materialists can understand it. The dust is material and the breath is material, and these are all that the Bible reveals respecting man's composition, and when we ask the question, "What is the composition of this immaterial entity?" the answer is, "We don't know." It is argued also that if there is not a distinct, living entity somewhere, it is impossible for Omnipotent power to raise the dead. When we ask, "Does this living entity in any way help the Lord to raise the dead man? the answer is, "No." Then, we ask, does it not require the same Omnipotent power to raise the dead, or revive the dust which composed the man, that it would require if this living something did not exist? And if the Father has power to raise up children unto Abraham out of stones that lie in the street, cannot he raise up a dead man without an immaterial, undefinable something that does not exist in fact? When we get so far as to deny the power of Omnipotence, let us turn either Sadducee or Spiritists, for when we take the start we are on the road to one or the other.

But let us see if this position does not deny plain statements of the Bible. Take, for instance, Job, in which he draws the wide contrast between the vegetable kingdom and the human family. "For there is hope of a tree if it be cut down that it will sprout again and that the tender branch thereof will not cease, etc. But man dieth and wasteth away; he giveth up his breath and where is he," etc. The contrast is here. There is a germ in a tree that is cut down, which will sprout again. But in man there is no germ. He is like a tree wholly dug up by the roots. This spirit entity denies the argument of Job, and says if there is not a germ left in man, as there is in the root of a tree, he can never have a resurrection from the dead. It is admitted, however, that only the righteous dead have this germ but this does not help the matter any, for it is the righteous dead only that Job refers to: he does not advocate the resurrection of the wicked at all.

There is another point in Paul's argument, 1 Cor. xv., on the condition of the righteous dead, if they are not raised. He says they are perished. Now if there is such a thing as a distinct entity in possession of life, how can they perish, if they are not raised from the dead.

Take Abel as an example. He has been dead almost 6.000 years. His entity must possess as much life to day as it did the day after it left the body. Now if it can live 6.000 years separate from the bodily organism, can it not upon the same principle, live eternally? How, then, can Abel perish if the body is not revived again? Perhaps some immaterialist can tell.

I would say that the discourse which I listened to abounded more in quotations from Prof. Hazen and Prof. Hudson than from the Bible. There was not one "Thus saith the Lord" presented. It was mostly composed of quotation from the philosophical argument of Prof. Hudson, and contained nothing new.

How are the Dead Raised Up?

BY I. H. JACOB.

"BUT some man will say, How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" All who believe that no one is dead —only the body of some one, want to have it read thus: How are the dead raised up? and with what body will the dead body come? We believe that man is mortal, and if he dies will perish if he has no resurrection. But the dead are to be raised up. Can Paul's answer to the question, "How are the dead raised up? and with what body do they come?" be answered correctly, or must it be guessed at? Let me try, through that inspired man's help, to answer it correctly. Paul says there is a natural body (now), and there is a spiritual body (now). Who has a spiritual body now? Is it not Christ? The apostle, Phil. iii. 21, speaks of the natural, or vile body being fashioned like unto his, Christ's, glorious body. Christ is the "firstfruits" of the resurrection. He is the sample, and they that follow after will be like him. The same Jesus which went into the grave came out of it immortal, incorruptible, spiritual. Here, then, is the spiritual body. "With what body will they," the dead come up? "It (the body) is sown in corruption: it (the body) is raised in incorruption."—1 Cor xv. 42. "It (the body) is sown in dishonor: it (the body) is raised in glory."—Ver. 43.

Verse 44 of this chapter answers the question, "With what body will they come?" "It (the mortal body) is raised a spiritual body." No mortal body in the sample, the resurrection that is past, consequently there can be none in the resurrection to come. The destiny of them that die out of Christ will be the same as it would have been had not Jesus risen from the dead. It is admitted out here that if Christ had not risen from the dead, all mankind would have perished, i. e., would not have a future life. Christ is the first in the order, or the first resurrection, so the next in order will be them "that are" his, "at his coming." One resurrection, that of Christ, is in the past: another resurrection, that of Christ's people, is to come. That resurrection will include only those whom Jesus has promised to "raise" "up at the last day." It seems to me that if there is to be a resurrection after the last day, it must be the third resurrection of the dead. The Bible plainly tells us with what body the dead will come up, but a mortal one is not found in the plan.

BLODGETT'S MILLS, Oct., 1870.

Man Ceasing to Honor God.

"I am the Lord thy God: that is my name; and my glory will I not give to another."—Isai. xliii. 8.

When man came first from his Creator's hand, and was pronounced "very good," what is written above was well understood, and while Adam's innocence remained was incorporated in his very being. That is, when God organized his mind, Adam was made capable of understanding who his maker was, who was to continue his existence, and what his punishment would be whenever he let go the great central idea that God was his all, his great rewarder if obedient, and just judge to condemnation and death if disobedient. If Adam had continued to believe and obey God, and had not accepted Satan's lie (thou shalt not surely die), who can estimate the glory of Adam and his race on the earth, so admirably fitted up for his dwelling before it was cursed for his sake? Who can rightly draw the picture of contrast between the bliss within Adam's reach and the awful condition of his posterity—the antedeluvian race? They entirely forgot their Creator and heavenly provider, and were utterly destroyed forever for their sin. In this sad history we find a terrible instance of God's just judment for the neglect of the injunction "I am the Lord thy God."

When Jehovah called his servant Moses to deliver his people from the hands of a wicked Egyptian king, who had entirely ignored God's supremacy, Moses was instructed to tell the children of Israel that the Lord their God, the God of their fathers, had sent him unto them. In trusting God, and in consequence of their full belief not only in his ability to deliver them, but that he was the almighty God (to believe in him was life—not to believe was death), Israel was brought out of Egypt with a high hand; while Pharaoh, for his entire rejection of Jehovah, was completely overthrown.

As a consequence of the rejection of this great truth, we behold at this time the war of Europe. Probably no people called Christian have so far as the French neglected to proclaim Jehovah the God of the nation. They have, more than any other nation equally enlightened, "put their trust in princes" and the art of war. God has destroyed once powerful nations and governments, now almost forgotten by men; and they, too, if they do not repent, must suffer like judgment. Who have so extensively worshipped monarchy and chivalry, surrounding them with all conceivable nonsense, as the French—so celebrated for inventions, science, art, and almost everything that goes to make up a great people? O, that this great nation would put away their infidelity, their obscenity, their trashy literature, and put no longer their trust in princes, but in the Lord God. God gave to Israel a king in his wrath. What a terrible illustration of that Scripture: "Our Lord is a consuming fire."

As it is with nations, so it is with what is erroneously called churches; full of man's inventions and amendments to Christ's one perfect and unalterable organization. Among the many things added to Christ's simple Gospel, may be mentioned a heaven for man above the sky, immortal-soulism, the punishment of the wicked in a place of literal fire and brimstone forever, rewards at death and not at the resurrection, men saved from a torturing hell instead of from everlasting destruction from the dead. As a nation that neglects to honor the Lord God Almighty must sooner or later be left without vitality, so will all churches that do not hold and preach the truth as it is in Jesus, be left without the power of God's Spirit. Sending abroad for an evangelist, when Jesus is ever near to help any or all that truly call upon him, is entirely contrary to God's word. The anxious seat, another of man's inventions, is simply abominable, and is a shameful innovation of Christ's way of saving sinners, which must and can only be done by making them fully understand that they are lost in Adam but may be redeemed through the atonement of Jesus Christ. This power to preach and power to believe comes from God, and not by entering an anxious seat or consenting to ordinances nailed to the cross.

But many are beginning to see the foolishness of titles, and theological promotions, and hold on to Jesus, believing that one is our Master, even Him, and proclaim him such in their hearts. They are finding out also that theological schools cannot make Gospel ministers, but they can and do ruin all who are not called of God, sending them forth cripples for life—blind leaders of the blind. We have faithful loving servants of the Lord Jesus now proclaiming with Paul: "The wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life through our Lord Jesus Christ;" that immortality is brought to light in the Gospel; that God saved Jesus, after he died on the cross, from death, letting him remain three days in the grave, and will save his saints in the same way, when Jesus comes again—a promise often made in the New Testament.

Let us trust in Jehovah as the God of nations: trust in Christ as the great Head and teacher of his church; remembering that God is not worshipped altogether in temples made with hands, but that our bodies are the temples of his Holy Spirit.—A. N. B.—The Nazarene.

Letters and Extracts.

From Eld. H. Rockwell.

BR. STORRS: Grace, mercy, and peace to all that love life in general: and to all the readers of our precious HERALD OF LIFE, together with our Editor and his staff in particular. On Tuesday, Sept. 17, being in Meriden, I called at the dwelling of Mrs. Nelson Ives, daughter of Bro. Campbell, where he laid four months or more, suffering so intensely, that the physicians said as the disease had appeared in his hand, he must either lose his arm to arrest the progress of the disease, or he must lose his life. He ran down so rapidly, in five days his life was despaired of. It was, therefore, thought not best to have an amputation. I found to my surprise, that he had been removed to his residence in New Britain, my adopted home. I went home on the 28th and called on Bro. Campbell. Found him in an emaciated condition, so worn and exhausted that it was difficult for me to recognize him. He was composed and hopeful, strong in faith of the healing power of Christ. Glory to the Lamb forever! All praise to his holy name! His word is truth. And whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son.—John xiv. 13. If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it. ver 14. All this is living truth. Oh, that it may burn so brightly on the altar of every believer's heart that every vestige of unbelief may be consumed.

Dear brethren and sisters in the hope of future life, do you want your faith strengthened? Go and humbly kneel at the bedside of the sick, and send forth strong cries and tears in their behalf, remembering that you must not ask in your own name but in the name of Jesus, the only name under the heavens given among men whereby we can be saved. Do not ask him to perform a miracle, that you may both see and believe, for you cannot believe understandingly unless you ask in his name. In short you must believe before you utter a sentence, or your prayer will prove abortive. "Open your mouth wide and I will fill it." He will give words of wisdom for you to speak: words adapted to the object of your prayer. I have learned by blessed experience that the best words, after making known our request to God, is not my will but thy will, O my Father, be done.

O how sweet is communion with God before the mercy seat. Seldom have I ever enjoyed sweeter peace than in that short prayer at Bro. Campbell's bedside. I left him, and on the 24th of October I called on him again, and astonishing to say, I found him at the table writing with the hand that the doctor would fain have cut off to arrest disease and save life. Thanks to the great God of the Church, he can save both limb and life. There is work for Br. C. yet to do. If any wish to learn, let them look on the face of sister Campbell, all radiant with life and love as she looks first on her crippled husband and then on his crutch. O receive their hearty thanks, poured forth to all that have lent a helping hand. May God's blessing rest on His little flock.

MIDDLE HADDAM, CONN., Nov. 1, 1870.

From Emeline Wood.

DEAR ones scattered abroad; I have recently received a letter from Bro. B. D. Wolcott saying that our dear Bro. E. Wolcott is failing. Now, my dear brethren and sisters, how can we part with him? Jesus said: "whatsoever ye ask in my name, that will I do." That his word cannot fail, I believe with my whole heart. I have found him faithful to his blessed word, and when two or three agree as touching any thing they shall ask, it shall be done for them. He will give us our precious Bro., if we ask, nothing doubting, even as He has spared others of our dear brethren. I feel that we ought to wrestle, like Jacob, to obtain this blessing. We need all such to help in the great work. Jesus always had pity on the sick; and he pities us and loves to do us good.

I go out with tracts on Sabbath days now, so I can go into more places and talk to the people. I offered some tracts to a man and he did not feel inclined to receive them. He told me that he read his Bible, and, said he, "You read the first chapter of Genesis and see if it does not say God made man out of the dust of the earth, and breathed in his nostrils the breath of life, and that when the breath leaves him he goes back to dust, not to heaven." I said: these tracts tell the same story. I had a good talk with him then. He took the tracts, and said you will come again, will you not? I called on Mrs. Hays. She said: "what a blessed paper. Let me be doing what I will, when it comes, I must stop and read it before I go on with my work." May it be the means of leading them all to Jesus. I am glad I belong to the blessed band of believers. We can sympathize with each other, praying and helping to bear each other's burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ. Jesus is always ready to help his children, and he imparts consolation at all times when we go trusting wholly in him. He will never, never forsake. I will send money for some more tracts soon.

From O. O. Rogers.

BR. STORRS: I am again here at Br. L. A. Merrill's, the brother that I wrote you to send the HERALD to. He has received it until lately. Although a member of the Methodist church, he has obtained light by way of the HERALD, and now wishes me to write you to send it to him, and he will remit the subscription price as soon as he can conveniently. He feels lost without the paper. He has given up the dogma of the immortal soul entity in man, and wishes for some of the campaign documents to scatter among the people, to see if we cannot get the views before them and shine away the darkness if possible, although it is very great.

Br. M. says he wishes some of our good, able ministers could come here and preach a few sermons to the people, and open up the Scriptures to them. Can and will some one or more of the preaching brethren come this way and call on the brother, and preach one or more sermons? The brother spoken of is the only one here known to hold any of our views, and he holds them by accident or by the Lord's sending me this way while on my journey, and stopping me here. I thank God that his ways are not man's ways. The seed sown here may be seed sown in good ground, and bring forth fruit to his glory. May God grant it and raise him up a people here that shall be zealous of good works, and hold the truth in love, and be heirs with our Lord Christ to the everlasting kingdom of God prepared from the foundation of the world.

I wish to say to the brethren scattered abroad, do not be discouraged because we are small. God works by small means to obtain his ends. I see and rejoice in it, blessed be his name forevermore. No man should be ashamed because he is small and weak, for God is able to make you stand; and what is more, he will make you of service to Him, which is the greatest honor ever conferred upon man.

NEW RUSSIA, Oct., 1870.

From V. R. David.

BR. STORRS: I have been without the HERALD OF LIFE for several weeks, and I cannot stand it any longer. You may perhaps remember me as an old subscriber to the "Bible Examiner," (some eighteen years since), which I thought as much of as I now do of the HERALD, but when you began to advocate the non-resurrection of the wicked, it seemed too big a pill for me to take, so I dropped the "Examiner." Many times, in reading the Scriptures, during the past few years, I have been astonished to find many things plainly teaching the great truth of "No life out of Christ;" and I am beginning to advocate, in my weak way, the doctrine. Only a few evenings since I had a discussion with our Methodist minister, and I have been pleased to hear from outsiders that I had the strength of the argument. Now he proposes to give us a sermon on the immortality of the soul next Sabbath evening. I await the results with some anxiety.

I will now send you five dollars, and want two copies of the HERALD sent to me regularly, one of which I wish to keep moving. Commence with the commencement of present volume.

SANDWICH, ILL., Oct. 27, 1870.

From Mrs. A. Waterson.

BR. STORRS: It seems as if my heart would leap for joy because my heavenly Father has provided a way for me to take the dear HERALD OF LIFE. I have been an Advent professor for a number of years, but for the past two years have been examining the foundation on which I stood, and, by the grace of God, have been digging away the rubbish to let the true light shine, and as soon as the great God and our blessed Father thought best he revealed His sacred truths to my trust through our dear HERALD OF LIFE. May God bless you, dear brother.

A Child's Hymn.

Who bled and died for me,
From sin to set me free,
That I might holy be?
'Twas Jesus.

And does my Saviour speak,
Bidding me early seek
Wisdom to guide the weak?
Yes, Jesus.

Where shall I look each day,
What map before me lay
To find the nearest way
To Jesus?

I have a volume rare,
The way of life is there;
I need not seek elsewhere
For Jesus.

Since I His mercy know,
Boldly to Him I'll go,
Praying for grace to grow
Like Jesus.

My heart is vile within,
But I'll at once begin
To lay my every sin
On Jesus.

Who hears me when I pray,
Teaches me what to say,
And will not answer, "Nay?"
'Tis Jesus.

If I in him abide,
Love Him o'er all beside,
I shall be satisfied
With Jesus.

Then, when this is o'er,
I shall fear sin no more,
Landed on Canaan's bright shore
By Jesus.

—Selected.

True Literalism.

"Then said he unto them, O fools and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken.—Luke xxiv. 25.

This text as translated has a harshness that does not appear in the original. The idea of fools in the sense now understood is not there. The Greek word anoeetoi signifies unwise, and is so translated Rom. i. 14. There seems, however, a providence in its being translated as it is in our text; for, we know of no folly that equals that of discrediting the words of God by the prophets; and they are discredited when not received according to their most obvious import. Those words may be accommodated to other events, but in doing so must not be withdrawn from their plain and obvious meaning.

The words of the text were spoken by our Lord Jesus Christ to two of his followers after his resurrection, and while on their way to Emmaus the evening after that event. They were walking and sad. Jesus drew near and went with them, but their eyes were holden that they did not know him. He enquired the cause of their sorrow, and they expressed astonishment that he should be ignorant of the events which so deeply afflicted themselves. They then state the fact of the crucifixion of Jesus of Nazareth, and add, "We trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel." In this expression there could have been no such idea of redeeming as is now usually attached to the term redeem, but it signifies to liberate, to deliver Israel. To understand then their words, we must place ourselves in their position. Israel was in bondage to the Gentile nations, or to the rulers of those nations. Israel's throne and kingdom had centuries previously been overturned, and Israel subjected to a foreign rule. But Israel had been promised a Deliverer—the Messiah. When Jesus appeared, the nation were in expectation of their Messiah; but overlooking certain prophecies which spoke plainly of his sufferings, death, and resurrection, they fixed only upon his reign and their deliverance from this bondage to foreign powers. This view was common to the disciples and the nation generally. Hence when Jesus was condemned by the Jews and put to death, the hope of his followers was laid in the grave, and sadness filled their hearts; and that sorrow was not dissipated by the report that he was risen from the dead, but their perplexity seemed to be increased.

All this arose from want of a clear understanding of and faith in the things which the prophets had spoken. That which seemed to them so exceedingly improbable, or impossible, arose from lack of faith, or an implicit belief in what the prophets had said, in its most literal sense. This unbelief was the result of an inveterate prejudice against the idea of a literal death of Messiah, as is evident from the fact that when our Lord announced to his disciples that he would "be killed and raised again the third day," Peter rebuked him, saying, "Be it far from thee, Lord: this shall not be unto thee."—Matt. xvi. 22. They could not credit it that he meant to be understood according to the literal import of the words. The disciples, in this respect, were no more unbelieving than many now are with respect to many of the prophecies still on record, and clearly unfulfilled, unless some spiritual interpretation of them can be given, or, they are set aside as "conditional," which, in our apprehension, is as wide of truth as reality is from fancy. Yet we do not condemn those who err in these matters: they may be as sincere and love Jesus as well as the sorrowful and stricken disciples did when Jesus rebuked them as in our text. They are unwise in their departure from the plain and obvious sense of the prophets, and slow of heart to believe that which shocks their prejudices or previous opinions.

Jesus goes on to say, "Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory? And beginning at Moses and all the prophets, he expounded unto them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself." That was a wonderful sermon, and it made the hearts of these sorrowful disciples burn within them. Jesus concludes that sermon, the same evening at Jerusalem in the midst of all his disciples, thus: "And he said unto them, These are the words which I spake unto you, while I was yet with you, that all things must be fulfilled which were written in the law of Moses, and in the prophets, and in the psalms, concerning me. Then opened he their understanding that they might understand the Scriptures. And said unto them, thus it is written, and thus it behoved Christ to suffer, and to rise from the dead the third day."—Luke xxiv. 44-46. Thus forever settling the principle that the prophets are to have that interpretation which their language most plainly and obviously imports. Not to adhere to this principle is to launch forth into the wide sea of speculation where thousands have already been wrecked, and wasted their strength in fruitless efforts to save their sinking vessel.

As there is no longer a controversy as to the fact that the things which the prophets spoke concerning Messiah at his first advent had a fulfilment agreeing with the principle we are contending for, i. e., the obvious literal one, we shall now proceed to inquire relative to other subjects of prophecy relating to Messiah and his reign. We may find men are as slow to believe the prophets now as at the first advent. The prophecies now to be considered are those which obviously have not yet had their full accomplishment relating to Messiah, as—

King—His Throne—The Place of that Throne—His Kingdom—His Dominion—His Associates—His Subjects, &c., though they may not all be considered in this article.

Psa. cxxxii. 11, "The Lord hath sworn in truth unto David—he will not turn from it, Of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne." It is David's seed, then, that is to possess that throne which David occupied; and that never was in heaven above: for there David never had a throne; and Peter tells us, Acts ii. 34, "David is not ascended into the heavens." The place is distinctly stated in the Psalm before us, for it is added, "The Lord hath chosen Zion—he hath desired it for his habitation. This is my rest forever—here will I dwell, for I have desired it." He then proceeds to say what he will do there. "I will abundantly bless her provision—I will satisfy her poor with bread. I will clothe her priests with salvation; and her saints shall shout aloud for joy"—instead of groaning in themselves as under the gospel economy. See Rom. viii. 23. It is then added—"There [in Zion] will I make the horn [power] of David to bud." [Heb. tsomakh to grow forth, to spring up.] "I have ordained [Heb. orakh—prepared a lamp [Heb. nair—a light] for mine anointed." Messiah was to be God's "prepared light." Accordingly, at his first advent, Simeon thus speaks of him: "A light to lighten the Gentiles and the glory of thy people Israel."—Luke ii. 32. Here is a clear New Testament testimony in which the distinction is kept up between those benefitted of the Gentiles and Israel: the latter are not a seed from among the Gentiles, but are those, many of whom were to fall and rise again; Luke ii. 34; so that here is no ground for seeking any other than the most obvious sense. Messiah then is yet to become "the glory" of that people. This will be done by setting up that throne which had been overturned and restoring the kingdom. That throne had been cast down as the prophets had said. In the 89th Psalm is a very peculiar prophecy relative to this matter. "I have found David my servant . . . I will set his hand in the sea, and his right hand in the rivers. He shall cry unto me, Thou art my Father, my God, and the Rock of my salvation," a prophecy of the Psalms "concerning" Christ, and which, so far as fulfilled, has been literal. "I ascend to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God."—John xx. 17. And his Father and God was the "Rock of his Salvation." When he poured out his soul unto death, death would have held its prey, but God his Father raised him up from the dead, and thus became the rock of his salvation.

The prophecy proceeds—"I will make him my first born, higher than the kings of the earth. . . . His seed [the children which God hath given me; see Heb. ii. 13,] will I make to endure forever, [and therefore, they shall be made immortal, as well as the first born] and his throne as the days of heaven. . . . His seed shall endure forever, [hence incorruptible and immortal] and his throne as the sun before me." But before it would be thus established it would be subverted and remain for a long time trodden under foot of Gentile governments; hence it is contained in the same Psalm, verse 44, "Thou hast made his glory to cease, and cast his throne down to the ground. The days of his youth hast thou shortened; thou hast covered him with shame." That throne was cast down several hundred years prior to the first advent, and in the days of its youth; the throne is left desolate for a long period, not yet ended; but nevertheless God had said, "Once have I sworn by my holiness that I will not lie unto David:" verse 35; therefore that throne must be re-established and Messiah must sit thereon.

In confirmation of this fact, let us examine the prophet Isaiah, chap. ix. 7. Speaking of the child born—the Prince of Peace—the prophet saith, "Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end," [where?] "upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom to order it." [Heb, koon, literally, to set firm, to establish it; Prof. Pick, "to re-establish it" Septuagint,] "and to establish it" [to support it—Sept.] "with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever." The zeal of the Lord of Hosts will perform this."

Here is a full confirmation of the fact that the throne of David is to be re-established, and be overturned no more: and that Jesus is the person who is to possess it, when it is again set up, Gabriel expressly affirms, Luke i. 32, 33, when he spake of the Child to be born of Mary. He said, "He shall be great and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his Father David. And he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end."—Luke i. 32, 33. Here the heir of the throne is designated; and that he shall reign not over "spiritual Israel" merely, but over the house of Jacob. No chance is given here for equivocation. As if God had foreseen the attempt to remove the throne to heaven, and make the people over whom the dominion was to be exercised merely a spiritual or immortal people, Gabriel varies the form of expression from Israel to Jacob; so that the most refined spiritualiser is totally excluded from transferring the promise to another than the literal posterity of Jacob: and such spiritualisers, to be consistent, should insist upon it, that David's throne means heaven on high: but as all the prophets forbid that, and they are compelled to admit that David's throne was on Mount Zion, in Jerusalem, in Palestine, and on the earth, why not also admit that Jacob's posterity in the flesh are to constitute the citizens of the territorial kingdom under Messiah when he shall sit on that throne? If they object that this reign over the house of Jacob is forever, and therefore they cannot be in the flesh, we answer, that is a mere assumption. In the first place, if the term forever is taken in its primary sense, no man can prove that the probation of some of Jacob's posterity will not be continued eternally, or without end. If mere assertion would prove that point, then it may be made out; for men, parrot-like, have talked about "the end of probation," just as they have talked about "the immortal soul" till they really think it is heresy to doubt the fable. That a period will arrive to each individual at which they will become confirmed in sin or holiness, so that a reverse change will be morally impossible, we do not doubt; but that a period will ever arrive when no more of the race of Adam will be in a state of trial is what has never been demonstrated from Scripture, nor do we think it ever can be; we do not affirm, however, that will not be the fact; we only say, it cannot be proved by the words of God or his prophets. But further, in reply to the objection under consideration. The term forever does not necessarily mean eternal. It is always to be interpreted by the nature of the subject. The whole of a dispensation is called everlasting.

The priesthood of Aaron was an everlasting priesthood; but it has passed away, or another dispensation has been opened which brought it to an end. So the reign over the house of Jacob in the flesh forever is and must be a truth, yet it may be a truth relating to a dispensation as distinct from the one which has preceded it or that may follow after it, as either of them are distinct from the Mosaic dispensation.

But that we do not mistake as to such a reign over the house of Jacob, the prophet Jeremiah shall now speak; and if we are not "slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken," we think the controversy must be ended. In Jer. iii. 12 and onward, after the ten tribes had been absent from the land more than a hundred years—carried away into the north—the Prophet is bid "go and proclaim these words towards the north, and say, Return, backsliding Israel, saith the Lord . . . acknowledge thine iniquity . . . for I am married unto you: and I will take you one of a city and two of a family, and I will bring you to Zion:" [where David's throne is to be, as it once was.] ". . . And it shall come to pass when ye be multiplied and increased in the land in those days, saith the Lord, . . . at that time shall they call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord; and all the nations shall be gathered unto it, to the name of the Lord; to Jerusalem, neither shall they walk any more after the imaginations of their evil heart:" [i. e., in idolatry, and backsliding from the Lord.] Now mark what follows: "In those days," [when they shall call Jerusalem the throne of the Lord,] "the house of Judah shall walk with the house of Israel," [the backsliding house that God said he was married to,] "and they shall come together out of the land of the north to the land that I have given for an inheritance unto your fathers."

This text is but one of a class which can no more be mistaken as to the fact of a future return of backsliding Israel and treacherous Judah [see verses 7 and 8] to the land of Jacob, at a time which has never yet come, than the texts can be mistaken which affirm immortality through Christ to them who believe. Any attempt to set aside such texts under the pretence that they had a fulfilment at the return of Judah and Benjamin from Babylon; or that they are only conditional, and may not come to pass, or that they are to have their fulfilment in the spiritual seed alone, only shows us how justly and pertinently the words of our Lord, "O unwise and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken"—may be applied to all such persons. Their unbelief in our view, is precisely of the character of that rebuked by our Lord. We sincerely hope it may prove true that such as merit this rebuke may as soon be convinced of their error as were the disciples: our love for them makes us desire that they may be. We feel not like reviling them: we have been in time past in the same unbelief.

We now pass to a brief consideration of Zech. xiv. That chapter opens with a statement that God would gather all nations against Jerusalem to battle, which results in the taking of the city, etc., "Then shall the Lord go forth against those nations as when he fought in the day of battle." This description cannot answer to any past taking of Jerusalem: certainly not at its destruction by the Romans, for God fought against the city and for its captors. That this is a correct view is further evident from what follows, and that it is the literal city of Jerusalem the prophet is careful to make certain, by introducing the Mount of Olives and giving its geographical situation to Jerusalem. It is "before Jerusalem on the East:" leaving no room for a doubt that his words are to be understood in their most obvious sense. "His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives, . . . and the Mount of Olives shall cleave in the midst, . . . and the Lord my God shall come, and all the saints [holy ones] with thee." The whole to be accomplished just as literally as the prophecies were which related to the place where Messiah should be born, or the manner of his birth, or his coming into Jerusalem riding upon a colt, the foal of an ass. How unlikely that those and kindred prophecies should have such a fulfilment as their obvious sense imports; yet strange as they were, they were fulfilled in that manner; and we are truly sorry for the slowness of heart that some good men manifest "to believe all the prophets have spoken."

Another fact in this chapter shows that the time is yet future and the events to be understood according to their most obvious sense. "The Lord shall be king over all the earth: in that day shall there be one Lord, and his name one;" verse 9. No such time has ever yet arrived: no such reign has ever yet taken place.

The prophet then describes the plagues with which the Lord will visit those who have fought against Jerusalem, which cannot be spiritualized, nor perverted from their obvious sense except by such as are "slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken." Then follows the fact that there will be "left of all the nations," who will be required to come "up to worship the King, the Lord of Hosts, and keep the feast of tabernacles;" and these left are threatened with plagues, if disobedient, showing they are persons still on trial, or in probation. To say these left are the immortal, is an unwarrantable assumption. What! God threaten the immortal ones with plagues! "O, unwise and slow of heart to believe all the prophets have spoken." To say, the left are the wicked, who are now to be destroyed, is to charge God foolishly. Such persons say, God calls them to come up to keep the feast of tabernacles, though he has determined to cut them all off. If they come, according to this view, they are nevertheless to be cut off, and if they refuse, it is the same! What mockery is this! We understand the words on the principle advocated in this article, according to their plain and obvious sense, and leave others, who are slow of heart to believe, to depart from it if they will. We hesitate not to say, as our conviction, it is only an apology for not believing what God hss said, because we cannot see how the thing can be done; and thus think of God as if he were like ourselves. Let us beware of such a spirit.

A Paris Miser's Breakfast.

A miser recently died in Paris, and his ways of living were certainly novel in the extreme. He boasted that his breakfast never cost him more than a half-penny, and that it always consisted of bread and butter or bread and fruit. This was his economic plan: Every morning he bonght a sou roll of bread. With this he went to one of the markets, and if it was winter he began by tasting of the countrywomen's butter. A bit of this was put in his mouth with a piece of bread previously deposited. Somehow the butter was always bad, or had some flavor he did not like. Not to be rude, he swallowed it, but made no purchase. In summer he fared more luxuriously, especially in the times of the cherries, the strawberries, the plums, and the grapes. "Have you good cherries to-day?" "Yes." "How do you sell them?" "Six sous a pound." "Can I taste them?" "Certainly." He takes two or three cherries, eats them with a mouthful of bread, and says: "Heu! heu! they're a little sour," and so he passes on to the next stall. Before he got half way down he used to breakfast perfectly. Of course, after a time the women who sold fruit and butter at the various markets began to know him, and, amused at his eccentricity, they seldom refused to let him taste their goods. He has recently died 75 years old—very rich, having never breakfasted on dry bread, or at a cost exceeding a half-penny.

The surest road to poverty is to hoard up treasures. The surest road to wealth is to bestow liberally where it is most needed. The miser is the poorest man on earth; the most liberal man is the most wealthy. If, therefore, you would be rich, do not aim at riches, but simply use what you already possess for the greatest possible number.

Horseradish.—If it is wanted for winter's use it should be secured and placed in the cellar, when it will be ready for use at any time.

Trees may be set any time during the fall or winter when the ground is not frozen. Set evergreens in spring.

Roots should be secured at once if this work has not already been done.

Children's Department.

Our Chat with the Little Folks.

We believe that children generally are fond of dogs, if they are not cross dogs. But whether they like dogs or not, we are sure that they are all fond of dog stories. These animals are very knowing; indeed, they seem sometimes to reason, and we have known some dogs which really appeared to know more than their masters. There are many very interesting stories about dogs, one of which, we give to our young readers. Dr. Beetle says he has one for us now. So let us hear what it is.

"HOW A DOG SAVED A SHIP."

"A Yankee sea captain, when in France, got a fine little rat-terrier, which he called Neptune. He took the little dog to sea with him, and he soon became quite a sailor. They were sailing at one time in the Gulf of Mexico in a dangerous neighborhood, and had to keep constant watch; for all along the coast near which they were there are long, low reefs and islands and bars, which have caused the destruction of many vessels.

"One evening when the captain went to bed he told the mate to be sure and call him by three o'clock in the morning, for by that time he expected to be within sight of a light-house which was near a dangerous reef of rocks called the 'Double-headed Shot-keys.' He wanted to look after the ship himself at that dangerous place. After the captain went to bed, the mate went into the cabin for something, and while sitting there, being very tired, he fell asleep. The men on deck having no one to watch them, also fell asleep one by one, and even the Spanish boy at the wheel, whose business it was to steer, was about half asleep.

"Meantime the wind changed, a stiff breeze sprung up, the sails were filled, and the good ship ploughed through the ocean briskly, straight toward the Double-headed Shot-keys. The little Spanish boy, half asleep at the helm, knew not of the danger, neither could he see ahead from where he stood, for the great sails concealed the view of the light-house; but Nep, good sailor that he was, discovered that land was near; he smelt it, and he saw the light. He rushed down to his master's state-room, and barked, and jumped up to him as he lay in his berth. 'Get down! be still, Nep!' said the sleepy captain. But Nep would not be still—he only barked the louder. 'Be still,' said the captain again, and he pushed the dog away. Again the faithful little fellow jumped up, pulled his master's sleeve, and took hold of his arm with his teeth. Then the captain thoroughly roused began to think something must be the matter. He sprang up, and Nep ran forward, barking to the companion-way. The captain's head no sooner came above the deck than he saw what was the matter. Right ahead was fearful rock and the light-house, and the ship plunging toward it at the rate of nine miles an hour! He seized the helm, the ship struggled, swung round, and when her course was shifted, she was so near the rock that in three minutes more she would have struck and been a wreck. The sleeping sailors were roused to their duty, and the astonished mate rose up from his nap on the chest, to learn that but for the faithful dog the waves might have already closed over them.

"Do you wonder that the captain thinks his dog is worth his weight in gold? He has been offered large sums of money for him, but money cannot buy him. He does not go to sea now. Nep went as long as his master went, and now he makes himself quietly useful at home by catching all the rats in the neighborhood."

That was certainly a faithful dog. He was more faithful than the sleepy mate. The only way for either men or dogs to succeed is by faithfulness. Hold on and hold out, and success is yours.

"That I know to be true," says Mr. Short. "I've watched folks a good deal in my time. I've seen some who are lazy, who sleep when they ought to work. They never get along. I've known some who get discouraged very easily. They are the ones to push their way through life. Then I have known others who kept on trying until they succeeded. I read the other day about a boy of this sort. Here's the story.

"THE PERSEVERING BOY."

"'Sir,' said a boy, addressing a man, 'do you want a boy to work for you?'

"'No,' answered the man, 'I have no such want.'

The boy looked disappointed; at least the man thought so, and he asked; 'Don't you succeed in getting a place?'

"'I have asked at a good many places,' said the boy. 'A woman told me you had been after a boy, but it is not so, I find.'

"'Don't be discouraged,' said the man, in a friendly tone.

"'Oh! no sir,' said the boy cheerfully, "because this is a very big world, and I feel certain God has something for me to do in it. I am only trying to find it.'

"'Just so, just so,' said a gentleman who overheard the talk. 'Come with me, my boy; I am in want of somebody like you.' He was a doctor; and the doctor thought any boy so anxious to find his work, would be likely to do it faithfully when he found it; so he took the boy into his employ and found him all that he desired."

Yes! God has something for everybody to do in this world. It's "a very big world," and there's room enough for all.—Selected.

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER.

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should allow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 364 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it: and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

HEAVEN AND HELL.

THE following is an extract from a sermon preached by Rev. H. W. Beecher, a few weeks since:

"That heaven which you think of and I think of is purely imaginary. Imagination is the pathway between the flesh and the spirit. It is that which gives to every man aspiration. Men despise it because it is not a measuring quantity. We are taught that it is not safe to build on, but I aver that in the economy of God's providence the human race has been instructed more through its imagination than through its reason. We are not to suppose that there is a hell—literally, a place of fire and brimstone. I don't believe it, and you don't believe it, and you ought not to believe it any more than you are to believe that heaven is really paved with golden paving stone. No one believes it; if they did there would be more misers anxious for their soul's salvation. [Amusement.] The great trouble of symbols is that they first represent, then hinder. It is possible for the Bible itself to stand in the way of understanding. I hold it is the duty of the Christian to interpret, not the letter, but the spirit of revelation, and many good people will no doubt be shocked to hear me say that you may take the theory on which the Scripture was employed to represent heaven, and then, instead of those figures you may take your own, and make your own figures of heaven. Now, Mary is not mentioned in the Apocalypse, but the Mary who left you heart-broken, and went up into heaven, you can never forget; and then, when your old father, who was prophet, priest, lover and friend to you, disappeared from your sight, and went to join other friends in another land, then you began to people heaven with familiar faces, and heaven begins to get full of people, and you have made of heaven a vast land inhabited by departed friends."

"That heaven which you think of" (speaking to his congregation) "and I think of is purely imaginary." So much from Mr. Beecher. His heaven and his congregation's heaven are purely imaginary. Then Mr. B. has no expectation of reaching the heaven he thinks of, for if it is all imaginary, there can be no such place.

"We are not to suppose there is a hell—literally, a place of fire and brimstone. I don't believe it, and you don't believe it, and you ought not to believe it any more than you are to believe that heaven is really paved with golden paving stones." Thank you, friend B., for your honest confession; you do not believe in a literal hell, and you say your congregation do not believe it, and you say they ought not to believe it. Well, we agree with you. They ought not to believe it for the reason that it is not found in the Scriptures. And they ought not to believe in your imaginary heaven, for the same reason. "The great trouble of symbols is that they first represent, then hinder. It is possible for the Bible itself to stand in the way of understanding. I hold it is the duty of the Christian to interpret, not the letter, but the spirit of revelation, and many good people will no doubt be shocked to hear me say that you may take the theory on which the Scripture was employed to represent heaven, and then instead of those figures you may take your own, and make your own figures of heaven." Now this is all in keeping with B.'s future man, and his denying the resurrection of the man. He makes a man according to his own imagination, and then he builds up an imaginary heaven to place his imaginary man in, and then recommends his congregation to do likewise. What could he do with such a place as Jesus speaks of when he says, blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth. This earth, purified, would be no suitable place for Mr. Beecher's imaginary men. It is all in keeping: he first denied the resurrection as Br. Thorne shows, and then, has nothing left but that which he imagines to be a man, and then he must imagine some imaginary heaven to suit his imagination—and then be finds it would be hard to punish this imaginary man, in a literal hell. Mr. B. comes out boldly and says he does not believe in such a literal hell. Then again, he finds the Bible stands in his way, and he is not quite bold enough to say we do not believe it, but does say it is possible for the Bible to stand in the way of understanding. "You may take the theory on which the Scripture was employed to represent heaven, and then instead of those figures, you may take your own, and make your own figures of heaven." If this is not giving license to set aside the teachings of the Scriptures, then I do not understand what the speaker means.

God has given us many figures of the inheritance of his children. First the Garden of Eden; then the promise to Abraham of the land which Paul describes as the inheritance of Christ and his seed; then the figure given to Daniel, of a kingdom under the whole heaven; and finally, the one given to us by Jesus of the meek inheriting the earth. But, says our learned divine, the Bible may stand in the way of understanding, therefore make your own figures of heaven, instead of taking those drawn by the sacred writers. That I may be preserved from the influence of such teaching is my prayer.

PULPIT BONDAGE.

THE following, taken from an article published in "Scribner's Monthly," is well worth careful perusal. The article is a forcible, candid and terse, yet refined exposure of a few of the frailties and abuses of the present system of pulpit ministry. There are difficulties from which those treated of are mere outgrowths. But treating of the primary ones is far more unpopular with the learned bondsmen, the leading minds, than any attack, however bold, upon the abuses of the ministerial system of the day can be to any class. The article comes to the point of considering the subject of rebuking evil doers.

In the first place, rebuke to the purpose presupposes moral courage in the person who gives it. Moral courage, as we have already said, is a rare gift among men. Ministers are men. Moral courage, therefore, is a rare gift among ministers. Ministers, as a class, are probably full peers with any class in moral courage. It would not be surprising if ministers as a class were superior in moral courage to any other class. Moral courage, wherever it exists, has a natural call to the ministry of the Gospel. We do not assert that the ministry of the Gospel has not its attractions, and even its special attractions, to slothful and cowardly souls. We think that it has. These attractions it is that recruit its ranks with the pastoral sluggards and the pulpit poltroons. But it is true, nevertheless, that wherever there is a man more nobly endowed than his fellows with the self-forgetful spirit of readiness to confront and to challenge sin, there is a man in whom nature has done all that nature can do to make him a minister. Such select spirits here and there redeem their calling from the unbelieving world's contempt. They accumulate for their office that fund of popular esteem, from which so many of their brethren embezzle to squander with profligate recklessness. They are few, however, and we must reckon moral abjectness—a poverty of spirit by no means evangelical and by no means blessed—as foremost among the causes which sell the average pulpit into bondage.

And this want of moral courage among ministers exists where there is vehement need that moral courage should be present in extraordinary power. The severest censors of the pulpit for its moral deficiency will be likely to be those who have least considered the peculiarly hard conditions of the case. To maintain the function of rebuke in integrity and in energy, makes an overwhelming demand upon even the most abundant moral resources. Let it once be fairly considered what transcendent moral height, and what resilient moral nerve it presupposes in the man who is to stand up before a respectable and self-respecting congregation of his own equals, and neighbors, and virtual patrons, and there, eye to eye, without faltering a syllable, lecture them on their vicious practices! Between man and man alone this sheer fidelity is almost never found, except under the incitement of anger or of a wish to humiliate. To be thus faithful in a public relation, is an unspeakably exhausting drain upon the rarest, and costliest, and most precious moral forces with which God ever feeds a human soul. Spiritual power of this degree must be bought with a price. It is an effort of heroism which is never maintained but at the cost of days and nights of purifying prayer, and a long strain of purified life—and then generally, we believe, at the eventual sacrifice of bodily health. All that is in a man, and all that is of him, is, as it were, taken up and transformed and refined into this "bright consummate flower" of his being.

In the second place, the bondage of the pulpit has an intellectual cause. It is not always primarily that ministers are not morally brave enough. It is often also first that they are not intellectually independent enough. These two points of personal infirmity are closer of kin than is commonly regarded. It requires moral courage to be intellectually independent, and it requires intellectual independence to be morally courageous. Evidently, if a man is to take a stand, it is important that he make up his mind where to take it. Uncertainty is weakness. Mistaken certainty is misapplied strength, but paltering uncertainty is helplessness itself. The question for settlement, be it remembered, is not usually one to which the answer is foregone. It is a question on which, though disinterested theoretical opinion, if it could be had, might be one, practice at least is divided. It is accordingly a question of apparent doubt. Here, for instance, is a social, or a business, or a political usage which seems clearly wrong to the pastor. His unsophisticated moral sense springs to its condemnatory conclusion without pause. But he is staggered by seeing the usage a usage. It is established, it is respectable, it is many-lived. His imagination summons his congregation before him. Those well-dressed, respectable religious people patronize it. Innumerable doctors of divinity wink at it. It may be the question of temperance in drink. If so, some clever magazinist has just undertaken to show how beer-guzzling by the gallon is justified by the occult climatic reason in the case. It may be the question of lascivious spectacles. A graceful rhetorical casuist has courted the popular breeze for his sail by virtually defending the indecencies of the modern taste in theatricals. Altogether there is an overpowering conspiracy of influences to overawe the intellectual judgment of the minister, and make it unnecessary to overawe his moral courage. An intellectual decision, perhaps, would insure the moral triumph. But the situation appals his mind. His moral sense—an apparent precept in the New Testament, for him—social prestige, custom, and at last a serviceable philosophy gendered of the two, in triple alliance against him. The poor man is hopelessly perplexed. His mental doubt cuts the sinews of his moral strength. He probably compromises. He preaches a sermon admitting the use, and deprecating the abuse! His hearers smile inwardly, and, intent on the use, risk the abuse. Half a leap is into the ditch, and in the ditch most of our ministers lie before the well-fortified sins of their churches and congregations. Let it however in charity be said of them, that they are generally, perhaps, intellectual bondmen before they are moral poltroons.

In the third place, among the causes which contribute to abridge the efficient freedom of the pulpit must be mentioned the pecuniary, the material, motive. In its gross, crude form, this, we believe, is far less operative than is vulgarly imagined. It requires no very extraordinary virtue to refuse a palpable bribe, or to spurn a directly threatened pecuniary penalty. But the sordidness of the motive is disguised before it addresses the minister. The principle of voluntaryism, as it has come to be technically called in application to the material support of religion, renders the preacher pretty immediately dependent, in most cases, for his living from month to month, on the good-will of his congregation. Perhaps if the principle in its first Gospel simplicity were more frankly adopted than it is, by the majority of churches and ministers, different and better results would come from its operation. Isolated experiments are not wanting that go to make it doubtful whether Christian trust may not walk better, leaning fully on the arm of its Beloved, without crutches of human contriving, than with them. But this is no place for discussion of Gospel rudiments. Whatever might be, a certain situation is. With this existing situation exclusively we have to do. It will be found on narrow scrutiny that the actual administration of the voluntary principle furnishes an unintended instrument of subjugation for the free spirit of the pulpit, of altogether exquisite adaptedness and cruelty.

If it were a question fairly proposed, whether you would tell your congregation some certain necessary unwelcome truths, at a known and definite pecuniary loss to yourself, you would not hesitate an instant. As much easier as it is in general, for rightly constituted natures, to say the things that please than it is to say the things that offend, still, if the choice were made a perfectly plain matter of material interest to yourself at the time, the very spirit of perverseness would come to your aid, and your congregation would be tolerably sure to hear the whole counsel of God—so far as you, the preacher, then had it in present available possession. But the effect of his fidelity on the worldly fortunes of the preacher, reports itself to him in a much more circuitous and much more imposing manner. The manner is such that few ministers can wholly resist its peculiarly penetrating influence. The most of them practically decide that the range of topics for preaching is so wide, without including those on which the sensibilities of their congregations are morbidly acute, that the offensive topics may be omitted without serious damage to the integrity of their gospel. One foolish sermon, a single indiscreet expression—there is no telling what harm it might do. It might, for instance, deter some intending pew-renter. If it did, the church treasurer would be sure to know it. The minister, not trained in a business college, will be conscious of cold water in the aspect and address of this financial brother in taking the pastoral receipt for the next quarter's instalment of his salary. The man of the temporalities will lugubriously speak of the tenantless pew, and regret that Mr. —— did not take it. If the young apostle—apostles that make these mistakes are generally yong—errs again, he hears something of the same sort again. By and by he learns that the church money-matters are running behind-hand. If he does not take this hint he is soon asked to read a carefully worded notice of a church-meeting to be held on business of importance, at which a full attendance of the entire society is urgently requested. At this meeting the pastor presides himself. He there hears a discussion of ways and means that makes him rub his eyes. If he gets his eyes open, well—if not, at the close of the fiscal year he is informed that, owing to the large number of pews not taken, the church revenue is too small to meet the present "running" expenses. There will have to be retrenchment somewhere. Almost any bright pastor's instinct will tell him where. Things go on another year, and grow either better or, worse for the worldly prospects of the church and the pastor. If the pastor's apostolic enthusiasm has all been spent, probably things grow better. If he is too young still, they grow worse, and the end hastens. He resigns. That minister becomes a marked man. The leading lay brethren of the different churches of his denomination constitute a kind of masonry among themselves. They meet at the great anniversaries, and they know each other. "Your pastor has resigned?"—"Yes."—"What seemed to be the matter?"—"Well, his health rather failed, and in fact he lacked experience. He wanted to make us all perfect right away, and some of us wanted more time. He'll be wiser before he's younger." It takes but a very short time for our young apostle to be generally known for a wrong-headed, impracticable man. The ranks of the ministry of nearly every religious denomination will furnish illustrations. Ministers of whom the church is not worthy go floating about, like light-ships, from congregation to congregation, to warn their brethren of their peril. No wonder if the majority of ministers learn at length that the wisdom of the serpent is better for them than the simplicity of the dove. It would be a marvel of constancy, or of obstinacy, if they did not acquire the pitiable skill of preaching through a muzzle. It is inconceivably disheartening to a faithful ministering soul to be left without an audience without a living. He must possess qualities of a very fine temper if he is not badgered by his fate into believing, with bewildered sincerity, that he must have mistaken his duty. He will almost inevitably submit to press the footsteps of his brethren.

PRAYER NECESSARY TO VITAL GODLINESS.

BY J. D. SHERIDAN.

THE electric telegraph, as a means of communication, is often and truly spoken of as a recent invention. By tracing the history of mankind back over four thousand years, we learn that men had knowledge of a means of communicating with a friend in a "far country," and of receiving instantaneous intelligence in reply. By this means Jacob received the promise of the blessing that God has kept in store for him and his posterity, since the foundation of the world.

This heavenly telegraph has in all ages past been and continues to be a medium of communication by which all God's people may have access to the Father of mercies.

All the worthies of old, who excelled in wisdom, and enjoyed much of the presence of God, were in frequent and earnest communication with Him who giveth liberally and upbraideth not. By means of prayer Solomon was wondrously blessed. In answer to communications which he sent over the wires, and by which he asked for wisdom, the Lord sent back a favorable message, in which He not only bestowed upon Solomon what he desired ("wisdom"), but also great riches and honor.

Daniel prayed long and earnestly, and God gave him wisdom to understand dark sentences, and interpret visions. Our Saviour prayed until he sweat, as it were, great drops of blood. He still continues to intercede with the Father by prayer for his scattered flock, and for sinners who are rapidly travelling down to the end of their probation, regardless of any danger.

How is it with the batteries of all who claim to be the "branches" of the true "Vine," or great head of the church? Are they all kept in constant working order? Alas for the answer. Would not the reproof that Job received from Eliphaz apply to very many at the present day? And would it not apply to some who profess to be looking for the Son of man from heaven? "Yea thou castest off fear, and restrainest prayer before God."

I understand there are men here in the west who claim prayer is entirely unnecessary, and that there is no necessity for setting apart any day to the Lord. Some are led away by this pernicious doctrine, the influences of which are very much against the introduction of the true light of the gospel of the kingdom.

Truly we live in perilous times. As Paul writes to Timothy: "Now the Spirit speaketh expressly, that in the latter times some should depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits, and doctrines of devils."—1 Tim. iv. 1. An apostacy of the early church is not only foretold, but also an apostacy of the last day pilgrims (or "virgins") who are anxiously waiting for the return of the "Bridegroom."

"And some of them of understanding shall fall."—Dan. xi. 35. Again: "The foolish said unto the wise, give us of your oil, for our lamps are gone out."—Matt. xxv. 8. Verily, it appears to me we are now at the tarrying time of our Lord, and very near the dawn of the day of our deliverance. Let us all watch and wait, and keep our batteries that connect with the celestial wires in constant working order, and by that means be enabled to obtain strength to prevent our falling.

TRUSTING IN GOD.

BY MARIA M. WEAVER.

How hard it is for the human heart to trust in God. And yet how tender and compassionate God is to usward. "Like as a father pitieth his children" so God looks with parental love upon those that love him. Are they in trial? He knoweth it. Are they beset on the right and left with cruel foes, false-hearted friends, entangled in their net of falsehood and misrepresentations? God knoweth it. Or are they in want of temporal blessings, of necessity praying, "Give us this day our daily bread?" Do they lack for many little comforts that would make life's labors less laborious? Ah! we know by blessed experience that our "Father in heaven" hears prayer, and withholds "no good thing from those that love him." Oftimes he tries the faith of his children, to see if indeed they do trust in his promises; but at last the blessings come, filling the believing heart with joy.

I have in mind a sister who once was highly esteemed among those who look for the Lord. All went smoothly with her till after being convinced that there is no future life out of Christ. Then, God knows why, though never lacking "daily bread," yet she was destitute of household comforts, and her condition in this respect grew worse and worse, although they toiled and labored to be more comfortable. Poor health and little ones to care for kept her weak in body, yet she thought of God's promises and claimed them. Her enemies (made so by the Gospel), cried out, "See! God has forsaken them. They do not prosper now because they have gone into error)." The sister made her wants known to God alone. After a trial of faith the blessing came, bountiful gifts from the hand of an indulgent God, more and better than heart had asked. O how like God is this. Should not the recipients of this love give praise and honor to his name? "Praise ye the Lord."

"What a Friend we have in Jesus,
All our griefs and woes to bear,
What a privilege to carry
Everything to God in prayer.
O what peace we often forfeit,
O what needless pain we bear,
All because we do not carry
Everything to God in prayer."

How true every line of this blessed hymn is. Let us trust more and more in God. He is a "Friend above all others." We may rely on him for help in every time of need. In the language of a brother in a letter to me, "None who put their trust in 'our God' will ever find him any thing but good." Amen.

ANALOGIZING THE RESURRECTION.

OUR orthodox teachers place the resurrection of man in a very low scale; that which was the grand theme of the apostles is now looked upon as a very common thing. Some argue the making alive of all men by an inherent life principle, because the caterpillar, when it apparently dies, springs up a butterfly; and because of some other insectile metamorphoses of like character. But particularly is the analogy spoiled, in the case of the caterpillar, by the very short life of the butterfly. If the soul, which this theory would fain create, is no longer lived than the butterfly, it might almost as well have died at once. But the resurrection or salvation of man, and consequent eternal life, is not to be thus analogized. It is a special act of God, for man only, and is only to be shown or proven by the word of God.

Some may say that Paul used the analogy of the grain in this connection; to which we answer that he only used that argument to illustrate certain points, some of which illustrations are now entirely ignored by a majority of professing Christians. Paul taught an actual death before a quickening, and not a partial death, as most modern teachers would have us believe—"That which thou sowest is not quickened except it die."—1 Cor. xv. 36.

Also in ordering, the name of the Post Office, County and State must be given, and written plainly, and if a change is called for, state the Office to which the paper has previously been sent. Unless attention is paid to all these matters, confusion and delay are inevitable.

Paul did not teach that the death and resurrection of man was in every particular analogous to the sowing and quickening of the grain. We all know that the grain produces a fruit, although not "that body," yet its "own body"—a body of the same nature. Not so with the dead man, "it is sown a natural body, it is raised a spiritual body"—a body of an entirely different nature; which would not be so if the quickening principle was in itself, as in the case of the grain. Mark the identity—"it is sown," "it is raised," etc.,—the same body, but a different nature.

But this grain illustration, although not proving all that inherent immortality theorists claim for it, may indicate something that they do not claim. We know that all the grain sown does not grow—only the good grain, or that which has the life principle in it when sown, ever appears again. This is just what we claim for man—his resurrection depends upon his having in him the life principle at death; and the question naturally arises, what is that principle, and does man naturally possess it? Jesus emphatically says, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, ye have no life in you." Per contra, "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood, hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day."—John vi. 53, 54. Paul tells us, Rom. viii. 11, "If the Spirit of him who raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he who raised up Christ from the dead will also quicken your mortal bodies, by his Spirit that dwelleth in you." John tells us in his first epistle, chap. v. 11, 12, "This is the record, that God hath given to us eternal life, and this life is in his Son. He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life." John the Baptist says, John iii. 36, "He that believeth not the Son shall not see life." Thus we have the positive testimony of four prominent witnesses that man has not the resurrection or life principle in himself, and can only obtain it by imbibing the "Spirit that raised up Jesus from the dead." If that Spirit dwell in you, "He will also quicken your mortal bodies," and "fashion them like unto his glorious body."

And the inherent life in the grain differs from the Spirit of life in the believer in this respect: The former being a natural life, can be and is frequently prevented from re-living by a variety of circumstances, notwithstanding it may be good seed; the drouth, lack of earth, too much moisture, excessive cold, etc., are preventive of the natural life that is in the grain. Not so the Spirit of life in the sleeping believer; no circumstance will be able to prevent it from springing into action at the proper time. It is the power of God—a power that has been tested and proven effectual in the raising of Jesus from the dead, the "first-fruits of them that slept"—"the first-born from the dead."

Again: The life that comes from the sown grain, being of the same nature of itself, is subject again to decay. Not so the resurrection life promised to the believer; that is an eternal life—"Neither shall they die any more."

No, this wonderful work of God—the resurrection of the dead—is not analagous, in every particular, to any thing under the sun. It is a special promise, and not a natural result; a special manifestation of the love of God toward all who believe his promises. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him might not perish, but have everlasting life."—The Nazarene.

MEN bow before talent, even if unassociated with goodness; but between these two we must make an everlasting distinction. When once the idolatry of talent enters, then farewell to spirituality: when men ask their teachers, not for that which will make them most humble and godlike, but for the excitement of an intellectual banquet, then farewell to Christian progress. Here also Paul stood firm. Not wisdom, but Christ crucified. St. Paul might have complied with these requirements of his converts, and then he would have gained admiration and love: he would have been the leader of a party, but he would have been false to the Master—he would have been preferring self to Christ.—Robertson.

THOSE individuals who think they have a commission to maintain their traditions and put down all who don't see as they do, by any means—honest or dishonest, Scriptural or unscriptural, reasonable or unreasonable—are hereby reminded that there is no argument in scurrility, that sarcasm proves nothing, and that misrepresentation and false intimations are poor props for false doctrine.

"BECAUSE I live, ye shall live also."—John xix. 18. There is a point in every word of that declaration, but note particularly that it is Jesus who speaks, that he addresses believers, that they have life only because of him, and that the Scriptures nowhere declare any such promise to unbelievers.

Say your Prayers in Fine Weather.

So spoke a sea captain to one of his sailors who was much affrighted in a storm. The poor sailor had never been at sea before; and, feeling himself and all the crew to be in eminent danger, he betook himself to prayer. The captain differed from the sailor in this, that at that particular juncture it was necessary for all hands to be at work. The saying of the captain, and circumstances surrounding him, made a deep and lasting impression upon the mind and heart of the sailor. The storm without, subsided, but that created within his breast still continued. "Say your prayers in fair weather," was never forgotten by him in his voyage through life. The hurried repetition of the Lord's Prayer was succeeded by repentance toward God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ; and from that time forth the sailor prayed in fair as well as foul weather. He became a soldier of the cross and a preacher of the gospel.

It happened that on one occasion, whilst he was preaching, the captain entered his church. Immediately the quondam sailor, looking toward him exclaimed, "Say your prayers in fair weather!" What a delightful and profitable train of thought was thus started, especially when the cause of the exclamation was explained by the preacher to the wondering audience! How suggestive of pious thoughts is that saying! The language of the disciples on the ship, in the Sea of Galilee, in the hinder part of which the Saviour seemed to sleep, was "Save Lord! we perish!" It has been and will be the language of thousands when exposed to dangers, by sea or on land, which threaten immediate death. If an epidemic prevails and hundreds or scores are carried off daily, the people are admonished to pray, and they heed the admonition. This is right, and yet it is proper also to say our prayers in fair weather. We are constantly in danger, and know not what a day or an hour may bring forth. The Saviour, therefore, directs his disciples to "pray always." When engaged in lawful business we may pray for success. The husband and wife may pray for each other always, and so may parents for children, and brothers and sisters for themselves, the household and the neighborhood.

The pastor should pray always for his flock, and his people should always pray for him. When we partake of God's bounties we should pray to him to feed our souls with the bread of life. When we clothe ourselves or our little ones, what prayer is so proper as this, that the Lord would clothe them and us with the robe of righteousness? When we go out, or when we come in, what should prevent our prayers to God, that he would go out and come in with us? We are commanded, in whatsoever we do, to do all to the glory of Him who created us and sustains us. We should be "diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord," then our prayers will be heard and our alms, like those of the good Cornelius, will be had in remembrance in the sight of God. Let us not pray only in the storm but in fair weather also. And so let us observe the Saviour's direction, "pray always," in the exercise of a living faith. —Christian Observer.

Love is the golden thread that runs through the Gospel: God's love to us, ours to him, and one to another.

OBITUARY.

Died in Bristol, Conn., Sept. 13, Sister Mary Losey, wife of Sumner Losey, aged 47 years.

Sister Losey has been a lover of the doctrine of the speedy coming of the Lord since 1843–4, and was a consistent Christian wife and mother.

Some ten years ago she, with her husband, became interested in that crowning truth of the Gospel, "Life only in Christ," and fully embraced it; and in that faith she died, leaving the blessed consolation to our bereaved brother that she "sleeps in Jesus," and will arise at the sounding of the "last trump."

During those ten years Sister Losey has been a great sufferer from disease, and she has in consequence been able to meet with "those of like precious faith" but little. She has, therefore, had little religious society beyond that of her affectionate and devoted husband. Yet our sister knew the truthfulness of the blessed promise made to such as her—"My grace shall be sufficient for thee."

May the blessing of God rest upon that lonely husband, and the Spirit of God lead those loving and dearly beloved sons who are mourning the loss of a Christian mother, to follow her example, and lay hold by faith upon our only Life-giver, while an opportunity is presented.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 16, 1870.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive..

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Editor's Health.

When we penned the remarks of last week, Br. Storrs had apparently improved. Perhaps our great desire in the matter had something to do with the opinion respecting a decided improvement, but it was thought that symptoms did encourage the hope of a reasonably speedy restoration to his usual health. Hardly had the paper gone to press when we learned he was worse. From that time to the present, Tuesday, A. M., he has much of the time stood upon the very verge of death, while his anxious, devoted family, and sympathizing friends have eagerly watched every change, fearful lest the enemy should be permitted to triumph.

The difficulty, aside from excessive weakness, being confined principally to the throat and chest, he has not suffered intense pain, though he has, at times, experienced great difficulty in breathing. With mind perfectly clear, he has been blessed most preciously with an unwavering confidence, an implicit trust in God, whom he has so long served, and known as a Being all love and goodness. He has had no will of his own, having the perfect assurance that God will do just right with him, and that which is best for his friends and for the truth. Every moment has he been able to say, "Thy will be done." Mighty as is the power of religion always, it seems greatest and most beautiful when death stares in the face. Precious and comforting in that hour is the consciousness that work, given of the Lord to do, has been done while the day lasteth.

The condition of the Editor has been so critical for some days past, few even of his most intimate friends have been permitted to see him. We trust that, through the blessing of God, all his friends will soon again see him in the field of labor. May the good Lord grant it.

Identity and Recognition.

The following questions are sent us with request to answer:

First: "What constitutes identity in the resurrection state?"
Second: "Shall we know each other there?"

D. J. E.

We do not deem it wise to make any special point of, or to speculate upon what God has not seen meet to reveal in His word. There are, however, some things relating to the future state which, though not directly revealed are yet as clearly so by inevitable consequence upon what is taught, as if they were special subjects of revelation. To the last question, then, we reply in the affirmative.

We are not particular as to whether the appearance of Moses on the mount of transfiguration be accepted as proof of the resurrection of that Prophet from the dead, or whether it be believed that the transfiguration scene was simply a vision. In either case it represented the then future glory of Jesus and the saints. Their glorified state was then and thus prefigured. This, we think, will not be questioned, since it is generally admitted the circumstance of transfiguration was a fulfilment of the words of Jesus: "there be some of them that stand here, which shall not taste of death, till they see the kingdom of God come with power." Moses was recognized, on the occasion; his appearance was known as that of Moses, and that, too, by men who had never seen him in the flesh. This is manifest from the observation of Peter: "let us make here three tabernacles: one for thee, and one for Moses, and one for Elias." If, then, Moses, in his resurrection state, is recognizable unto men in this mortal state, it surely will not be questioned that glorified saints will know one another.

Paul's declaration, "Now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept" (or sleep), settles the matter. As the resurrection of Christ is a pledge of the ingathering of a resurrection harvest, so his resurrection state is a sample of the resurrection state of his people—those whom he "will raise" "up at the last day." He was recognized as the Jesus who had lived, healed the sick, raised the dead to life and performed other and many mighty miracles. If he, the first-fruits, the sample was seen by mortal eyes, and known, surely all who are crowned with immortality and glory will know each other. Some instances there are recorded, it is true, of Jesus revealing himself to mortal vision in a glory beyond its capacity to behold, but we may properly regard these as exceptional cases, extraordinary manifestations of his glory. But whether this be so or not matters little to the point, since to immortal saints will be given the capacity to complacently behold the King in all his beauty. "We know that when he shall appear we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is."—John iii. 2. That was a good reply of the minister who, being asked by his wife whether he believed we shall know each other in the future state, replied: "To be sure. Do you think, my dear, we shall know less then than we do now?"

When it is established what constitutes, or rather preserves our identity through the radical physical changes that occur in our passage from one period of the present life to another, the question, "What constitutes our identity in the resurrection state?" will be answered. "O," says one, "that is just the point. It is the presence of a spiritual entity that preserves the identity in this life; and it is that which constitutes the identity in 'the life to come.'" If this proposition is found to involve, of necessity, gross absurdity, the proposition itself is shown to be without weight. The animal body, it is claimed, and we think properly, is subjected, by reason of unceasing waste and recuperation, to complete changes of component matter every few years. If the preservation of identity is due, in the case of man, to a self-existent something connected with him, then one of two conclusions must be adopted. Either the phenomena, when found to exist in connection with other animals, proves them to be possessed of similar entities; or identity of animal organization is in most cases preserved independent of any such agency. The former will certainly be regarded by all who are unprepared to accord deathlessness to the brute creation, as involving absolute absurdity; while the latter totally negatives the proposition. It is affirmed to be immaterial—this entity of which so much is said. Strange, indeed, that immateriality is more potent in controlling the action of matter than is the Creator.

The claim that the existence of a separate entity is necessary to preserve the identity through death is utterly valueless except in so far as it denies, by implication, the power of God to restore the identity, in the resurrection life, without the aid of such existence. If it be not equally easy for God to restore identity after it is lost to human view, as to preserve it, it nevertheless comes within the scope of Omnipotent power. To our mind, "sameness" would be a satisfactory reply to the question, "What constitutes our identity in the resurrection state." That kind of "sameness" which enables us to identify the old man as he whom we had known in youth, notwithstanding he had undergone many changes respecting component particles. That kind of "sameness" which enables us to recognize any animal body after it has undergone changes analagous to those observed in the human species. Sir Wm. Hamilton's remark concerning the nature of identity is worth remembering. He says: "Identity is a relation between our cognitions of a thing, not between things themselves."

The question is: Has God promised a future life, by a resurrection from the dead, to his people? We reply: He has. None, it is safe to presume, who understand and believe the word of God respecting a future life, will deny this. He will surely fulfil that promise; but He will not fulfil it in such questionable way that saints will be left in doubt as to whether they are themselves or somebody else, as would almost be the case if there should be no recognition in the future life. May we all diligently strive to "be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection from the dead." That glorious prize secured, immeasurably happy will we be not only in the companionship of those dear ones beside whom we have labored and suffered here, but in the companionship of our blessed Lord, and all the saints. Popular Theology—A Contrast.

We hear so much at the present time—especially from the pulpits and press of the popular churches—about preparing to die, and so little said about the second coming of Christ and the resurrection of the dead, that we are led to question whether this teaching is not a part of the same theology which makes "death the gate to endless joy," or "the entrance to endless woe."

If the great design of the gospel was only to prepare men for death, how can we account for the utter silence of the apostles regarding it? They always centered their hopes of a future life in the second appearing of Christ as the Life-giver; they looked for a bodily resurrection "at the last day," and not for a departure from this world at death as a spirit non-entity to some unknown region of which even our most enlivened imagination can form no conception, and regarding which a divine revelation is wholly silent.

The system of theology, of which this teaching regarding a preparation for death is a part, makes death our greatest friend, because we are taught that to the Christian it is the deliverance of the soul from this tenement of clay, and is the door to eternal bliss. Hence, this theology makes death a greater event than the coming of Christ, and therefore, consistent with their belief which virtually ignores the second coming of Christ, we are taught to prepare for death, instead of "looking for and hastening unto the coming of the day of the Lord," and like faithful virgins have our lamps trimmed and burning, and waiting for the Bridegroom's return, that when the cry is made, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh; go ye out to meet him," they may be ready to go "in with him to the marriage." Instead of shouting in the ears of a sleeping godless world, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh," and as with a trumpet voice commanding them to "fear God and give glory to Him, for the hour of His judgment is come," popular theology tries to soothe men's conscience with a peace and safety cry, and to frighten men into a formal service of God through the terrors of eternal misery. The doctrine of universal immortality is inseparable from that of endless misery. Its tendency is not to create a veneration and love for God, but to cherish the hope that if they are not very wicked they will not be subjected to such an awful punishment, and consequently they indulge in genteel churches and fashionable religion merely to escape the miseries of hell, being "lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God." These are facts too apparent to be denied.

We would not be understood as opposing efforts to have men become Christians, from whatever quarter they may be made, but we do object to "teaching for doctrines the commandments of men;" perverting the gospel, and leading men away from the Bible hope of a future life into the deep and awful darkness of tradition.

The Bible does not teach us that we need a preparation for death, for death has "passed upon all men;" but we need a preparation to live. The Bible does not tell us that we are all immortal, and therefore death is but a change in our existence; nay, but the Scriptures show us if we do not lay hold on Christ by faith and obedience, death is the end of our existence. The Bible sets before us life and death—"the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life;" but on the other hand popular theology sets before us eternal happiness in heaven or endless misery in hell. The gospel locates the time when the saints shall receive their reward, at the second coming of Christ by a resurrection from the dead, or a change to immortality of those who are alive; but popular theology tells us they receive their reward at death, thus virtually denying the resurrection of the dead or the second coming of Christ "at the last day." The Bible tells us "by patient continuance in well doing" to "seek for glory and honor and immortality, eternal life;" but popular theology tells us we already have immortality, and we can not "seek" for what is already in our possession, but to seek a preparation for death—not to be looking for the coming of Christ to receive us unto himself, as he promised, but to be looking for death to release us from our prison house of clay that we may depart and be with him.

May not this suffice to show that popular theology is a distinct system from and wholly subversive of the gospel as presented in the Bible?

Let me exhort you dear reader, to give heed unto the apostle's commandment to "fight the good fight of faith, lay hold on eternal life." "Keep this commandment without spot, unrebukeable, until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ."—1 Tim. vi. 12, 14. You want eternal life—an endless existence. Give thanks unto God that you can obtain it; yea, God, in his infinite love and compassion for you, desires to give it to you through Jesus Christ his only begotten Son. "For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life."—John iii. 16. You are perishing; with your frail constitution you are going down into the silent dust of death. God through his only begotten Son offers you life from the grave—to deliver you from perishing through the power of an endless life, and endow this frail body in the world to come with strength, and beauty, and immortality, unmixed with tears of sorrow.

"And this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son and believeth on him, may have everlasting life; and I will raise him up at the last day."—John vi. 40. To have a hope of this life, the witness of acceptance with God—you must "not be conformed to this world, but," says the apostle, "be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind, that ye may prove what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God."—Rom. xii. 2. The professed church is so completely engrossed with earthly things that this matter becomes one of the highest importance to those who are earnestly seeking for eternal life, that they may meet the approving smile of our soon coming King. He assures us that we cannot expect to secure eternal life if our hearts are set upon the things of this world. He says: "No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and mammon."—Matt. vi. 24.

Beloved reader, the awful day of God's wrath is at hand. The world seems rocking from centre to circumference, groaning under the fearful weight of iniquity which now rests so heavily upon it. The spirit of war, in all its fearful magnitude, has broken forth, and the land, once drenched with the blood of saints, is now the scene of awful carnage of antichristian forces. The great battle of God Almighty is at hand, we verily believe, and dear reader, we beseech you not to be deluded with the soothing words of popular theology, that death may be many years distant, and say in your heart that you have ample time to prepare for death, and thus join the latter day scoffers in saying, "Where is the promise of his coming?" I admonish you upon the word of God to prepare to meet your Lord that you may partake of the joy and felicity of the kingdom which he will soon set up. W. H. S.

Rochester N. Y. Nov. 1870.

The European War.

Nothing calculated to work any very important change in the condition of affairs in France has transpired during the past week. New Breisach, surrendered to the German forces on the 10th inst, very nearly completes the Prussian possession of the Rhine. The French forces under Gen. Paladine have obtained a decided victory at Orleans, having captured that city after a hard fight of two days. The first success of any note secured by the French since the beginning of the war, it is quite natural that the importance of the event should be magnified, and the fact of victory seized upon as evidence that fortune is about to smile again upon unhappy France. Driven out of Orleans by superior numbers, the Prussians retreated to Soury, where they have been reinforced by detachments from the army of Prince Frederick Charles.

Garibaldi is said to be busy with his little army, but that it is poorly equipped and discontented. It is claimed that Gen. Bourbaki in the North has a fine army, which may be increased to 400.000 men, and that he is preparing for a movement on Paris. The people and garrison of that stronghold are, in the meantime, being starved out, so no plan for relief can be effective unless promptly executed.

Great excitement prevailed in London on Saturday last in consequence of the rumor that Austria has joined France against Prussia. Such reports cannot be received with too much care, for, having refused to ally herself with Napoleon when that monarch was supposed to be eminently capable of maintaining his power and prestige, it must seem unreasonable that Austria should form such an alliance now that France has become a Republic, and is lying almost prostrate at the feet of the conqueror. Still such is the strait in which France finds herself, it is impossible to foresee what inducement she might offer to Austria or any other power that would dare undertake to help her out of her difficulties. We have been inclined to the opinion that the European war will become more general, and perhaps the time has come for extended complications to bring it about. The Lord reigns, and he will rule all things to the working out of his great designs preparatory to taking unto himself his kingdom and his crown.

Since the above was written, telegraphic information from Europe is to the effect that an alliance has been entered into between Russia and Prussia. It is understood that one of the advantages which Russia seeks through this alliance is the abrogation of the treaty forced upon her by England and France at the conclusion of the Crimean war. By that treaty she lost her control of the Black Sea, a loss calculated to virtually destroy her marine power. A New York City journal, of this, Monday, morning says:

"Russia has at last thrown off the mask. Her preparations, military and diplomatic, which have been making for several months are completed, and she has demanded at the Courts of the Great Powers the revision of the treaty of 1856, which neutralized the Black Sea and denied her armed steamers admission to the Dardanelles. The design has been long suspected: the demand has long been anticipated, yet, coming as it now does in official form, it may convulse Europe and agitate the rest of the world.

The articles of the treaty most obnoxious to Russia, and forced upon her by the alliance of France, England, and Turkey, are, of course, those which prevent her from fortifying her Southern coast or entering the Black Sea with her navy. These articles are as follows:

Art. 11. The Black Sea is neutralized. While open to the mercantile marines of all nations, its waters are formally and in perpetuity interdicted to vessels of war, whether belonging to nations having territory bordering on it or otherwise.

Art. 13. The Black Sea being neutralized by a foregoing provision, Russia and Turkey engage neither to construct or maintain any naval or military arsenal upon its coast.

The long-manifest desire of Russia to repossess the Black Sea, if not a natural one, is certainly consistent with her past policy. The Black Sea is not only her chief southern outlet for the immense trade of the regions traversed by her principal rivers, the Danube and the Dneiper, but it is also her best defense in war. The Russians, in justifying their policy, will perhaps lay greater stress than we can upon the fact that it also offers the best base for aggressive operations against their old enemy, the Turk. There is every reason, therefore, why Russia, finding her hopes of extension westward destroyed by the unification of Germany, should seek again the old channel for carrying out her schemes of aggrandizement. And it was to be expected that she would take the present opportunity, when the power of France is broken and England is unable to enforce the treaty, to demand its abrogation. While the former allies of Turkey have become weakened to helplessness, Russia, on the contrary, has greatly strengthened her power. It is intimated, and with such positiveness and minuteness that the statement will hardly be doubted for a moment, that Russia has formed a secret alliance with Prussia which secures the active aid of that Power in preventing any interference. Russia has watched Austria while Prussia destroyed France. Prussia is now to watch England while Russia seizes the Black Sea. That is the plain English of the treaty.

The task of repossessing the Black Sea will not be a more difficult one than that of Prussia invading France; nor will the campaign, if it comes to war, be as long. Turkey is powerless to resist unaided, and she can hope for the assistance this time of no English fleet and French army. Russia has upon the Black Sea a fleet of twenty or thirty merchant steamers, which can be readily converted into very formidable gunboats, while the merchant service of Turkey is comparatively weak. Russia has had a large fleet of armed vessels cruising in Greek waters since the first of last September, and is even prepared to demonstrate at once against Constantinople. A war, if it should unfortunately come to that, would be a most unequal one."

It is said to have been ascertained through certain memoranda found among the papers at the imperial mansion, that the Prince Imperial's baptism cost about $180,000. Pretty costly baptism that, but the family have had a more expensive one since. They have been baptized with fire. The element got beyond their control, and, spreading in directions which they thought not of, consumed the cords by which they held the kingdom.

Why is Truth Rejected?

by A. G. M.

"Because I tell you the truth ye believe not." Why do not men—we all—believe the truth?

(1.) Indolence: There are those who love their ease so well, that if the truth is brought before them, they are too indolent to open their eyes and look at it. They enquire why they may not do very well as they are. All their fathers lived as they live and passed away in hope. They look for tranquillity, for rest, never seeming to realize that he who believes an error and teaches it to men is charging the error not upon men but upon God; for he makes God to declare for truth what is not truth.

(2.) Fear of doing harm: Strange as it may seem, many conscientious but narrow-minded men reject truth lest they do harm. It is a terrible thing to break up the deep of a man's old opinions, to leave him for a time in a kind of chaos of opinion, not knowing whom or what he shall believe. And more, it is often said "If this doctrine be true, it must do great harm." As if the great laws of God must be covered up and hidden away lest a knowledge of these laws should destroy the works that God has made: as if blindness were better than sight, or darkness than light, as if the dangers of our way were less because we walk in the dark, or disease less fatal because plastered over by our ignorance. Let the truth be spoken, and it may tear away our fine theories, it may display the grossness of our ignorance, but it shall save from falling, it shall reveal to us life.

Fear not the truth. If it cause pain it is the pain that leads to a cure; if it make our acts or opinions appear more wrong or hateful, it is not the fault of the light. Were these acts or opinions veiled in the deepest darkness they would be none the better.

(3.) Reverence for the past. We are so formed that the teachings of the past have a powerful influence upon us. Especially is this true when the prejudices of early education are on the side of the past. Our opinions have grown as our bodies have grown. Looking at those whom we have esteemed wise and good, at age, respected for learning and piety, at books written by good men of the past, at the wise sayings of august bodies of reverend men, we feel that these could not have been wrong. Yet so reasoned the Jews of the Scribes and Pharisees; so reason the Mahomedans of their prophet, and so reason the Pagans of those who proclaim their gods. But truth is above all teachers except Him who established all things.

(4.) Self conceit. Men have such high opinions of their own discernment that they often refuse to look at the truth at all. Shallow conceit has so puffed them up that they believe there is no truth they have not learned. With loud voice and dogmatic arrogance, they would crush all opposition. So thick is their shell of conceit that even when compelled to hear, like the tortoise, they withdraw themselves from the world, and let ignorance, stupidity, folly and sin be carved upon their backs, without exhibiting even the semblance of a sensation. Such men deserve only contempt, and yet great multitudes follow them.

(5.) Others shun the truth because it condemns them. It may be hard for a man to own that he has been in error; harder still is it to have it forced upon him, that his acts from day to day are wrong. Let this truth be as plain as it may, it is hard to say I am doing wrong, I am teaching error for truth. Many a man is forever confessing his sins of the past who will never for a moment admit that he is wrong in the present; yet if saved from present sins, past ones would need no confessing. There is no crime for which he who does the crime is not able to find at the time some justification; all truths that stand in his way must be rejected even though he confess his sin the next hour.

(6.) The truth is rejected because it cannot be demonstrated. A class of thoughtful men demand sensible proof of all things. They cannot believe in Christ because they have not seen him, forgetting that much of all we believe rests upon the evidence of others. This Christ is to them a myth, and eternal life, with all its glory and joy a fable.

Thus, from every motive men reject the truth, yet the truth is not lost, nor so far removed that it may not be found. With the few it prevails. The solitary Shepherds, the despised Publican, the weary fishermen receive the truth, act upon it and are saved. Truth goes not like an army with flying banners and martial array. It is alike heedless of palace and cottage; but he who with humble heart, and intelligent mind seeks truth, shall not seek in vain. And we believe it shall prevail, but not now. He whose right it is shall reign. Then, because he tells them the truth, all shall believe. Who shall so live and act as to obtain part in that new earth?

THE "INCORRUPTIBLE SEED."

BY JACOB GRIM.

"Being born again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever."—1 Peter i. 23.

THAT there is such a seed the Bible clearly declares, a seed which when fully developed liveth and abideth forever. That this seed is entirely different from the natural man, begotten by the flesh, is also clearly shown in the word of God. Peter makes this distinction: "For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man, as the flower of grass. The grass withereth and the flower thereof falleth away." O what a description to give of this noble creature, "man!" And to compare him to the grass of the field which withereth and falleth away, and is no more! This incorruptible seed, says Peter, "is the word of the Lord," and it "endureth forever."

John says: All who are of this seed are the sons of God; and they are "born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. And the word was made flesh and dwelt among us."—John i. 12, 13. Paul says: "We have known" him (Christ) "after the flesh," (as the seed of David) "yet now henceforth know we him no more." Yea, "henceforth know we no man after the flesh. Though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now henceforth (from this time) know we him no more (after the flesh). "Therefore (for this reason) if any man be in Christ, he is a new creation: old things are passed away; behold all things are become new." Does Paul say Christ is to be known no more as the Son of David? He so expresses himself. He says: We have known him after the flesh; that he was born of the seed of David according to the flesh, and that as such we know him no more. In what character, then, are we to know him? As the author of the new creation. For if any man be in Christ, he is of the new creation. "For we are his workmanship, created in Christ Jesus."—Eph. ii. 10. "And that ye put on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness."—Eph. iv. 24. "And that ye put on the new man which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him."—Col. iii. 10. Paul affirms "of the gospel of God," (which he had promised before by his prophets in the Holy Scriptures) "concerning that Son of his, Jesus Christ, our Lord, which was made of the seed of David according to the flesh, and declared the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead."—Rom. i. 2, 3, 4. Now Paul further affirms of these two natures. Of the first he says: 2 Cor. v. 16, "Yea, though we have known him after" (his first nature) "the flesh, yet now from henceforth" (as such) "know we him no more." Well, then, Paul, how do you know him now? After the new creation, born of the incorruptible seed, of the word of God; as the author of the new creation; as David's Lord. He was the stem or shoot of David, but now he becomes David's root; the Son of God; the author of the age to come; the new creation, for if any man be in Christ Jesus he is a new creation. May we all be born of that incorruptible seed

WATCHING.

BY R. J. TURNER.

IN an age when the spirit of republicanism pervades all nations, and is fast unsettling thrones, and demolishing sceptres and crowns; when people look forward expectantly, to see emerge from this political strife a future in the world of republican principle and institutions, there are a few who look for a kingdom and a king. The nations across the water are wheeling into battle line, and we hail it as the signal of an approaching monarchy. Kingdoms reel and fall to make room for one that will never, like them, be numbered and finished.

We are watching events. So fast they come we can scarce realize their solemn import. A few short months ago the sunny land of France was unlittered by dead, her waters unmixed with blood, her air untainted with the hot breath of war, but the cup of her iniquity was full, and the fiat of Jehovah went forth. The earthquake of revolution is rocking and engulphing her in certain destruction. The tidal wave of war is desolating her fairest cities, and like Jerusalem of old her inhabitants "pine away, stricken through for want of the fruits of the field." France goeth to perdition, and her downfall is surely to be followed by the destruction of all nations. We are watching for the grand crash that shall tumble into ruin all the governments of earth. We are watching for the booming war notes to die away and give place to the voice like "many waters, and mighty thunderings, saying: Alleluia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth." We see Christ's coming in every event, but the world is blind. They are rocked to sleep in a cradle of earthquakes, with the alarm bell of war ringing their lullaby, and they dream of future greatness and glory to this old world, of an age of enlightenment such as never was, but their dream will be broken, and their sleep is but the fatal coma that ends in death.

The world is near its end. Why shut our eyes to the fact so patent? The very machinery of nature is out of gear. The story of six thousand years is almost told, and such a story of sin and misery, of carnage and blood, of groans and tears and wretchedness. It is a picture all shadows. We are watching to see it go out in the glory of eternity; watching for the end of this life and the beginning of immortality; watching for a kingdom and a throne; watching for the King, our Life-giver.

HARTFORD, CONN., 1870.

THOUGHTS AND APOTHEGMS.

THE question, "What is true?" ought to stand on the threshold of every religious inquiry.

If the question, "What is true," be asked only in the second place, it is likely to receive a very different answer from what it would, if it had been asked in the first place.

That which is true and right loses, incalculably, its beneficial influence on the mind, when received on any ground than because it is true and right.

Truth is, in such an especial manner, the characteristic of the religion of Christ, that, in our Lord's reply to Pilate, He points it out as defining the very nature of His kingdom, of His objects, and His claims: "For this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth." And when, on other occasions, asserting his claims, He says, "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed, and ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." "When the Spirit of Truth is come, He will guide you into all truth." "Sanctify them through thy truth; thy word is truth." Thus, too, the apostles repeatedly use the words "truth" and "faith" to designate the Christian religion. It is truth resting on evidence, requiring faith in it, on the ground of its truth.

The Christian religion made its appearance as the common disturber of the peace of the world, because it put an end to the tranquil influence of custom, authority, credulity, sentiment and imagination; forced men upon the disagreeable task of examining evidence, searching records, and proving all things; and arrayed in opposite opinions, children against their parents, subjects against their princes, and the people against the priest.

Christianity, contrasted with the Jewish system of emblems, is truth in the sense of reality, as substance is opposed to shadows; and, contrasted with the heathen mythology, is truth as opposed to falsehood. "The truth as it is in Jesus" was to supersede the heathen idolatry, by destroying it; and "the law and the prophets," not by destroying indeed, but by fulfilling them.

The heathen mythology not only was not true, but was not even supported as true; it not only deserved no faith, but it demanded none. The very pretensions to truth—the very demand of faith—were characteristic distinctions of Christianity.

To believe in Christianity, without knowing why we believe it, is not Christian faith but blind credulity.

The word knowledge, strictly employed, implies three things; viz., Truth, Proof, and Conviction.

To say that there is no more virtue in Christian faith, unless it is founded on evidence, is to forget that the Lord Jesus himself—He who "taught as one having authority and not as the Scribes"—He who said not, as the prophets of old, men sent from God, "Thus saith the Lord"—but, as Immanuel, God dwelling with the people, "I say unto you"—appealed to his works as bearing witness of him; and claimed the Divine "power to forgive sins," on the ground that He had no less Divine power to bid the palsied cripple "take up his bed and walk."

The apostles came forward rather in the character of witnesses, than as authoritative guides; and they work miracles and appeal to Scripture, not so much for the purpose of establishing their own right to deliver doctrines, as to prove the doctrines which they teach. And as with their first teaching, so also is it with the subsequent propagation of their religion. Though the authors of the Gospels wrote, under the extraordinary superintendence of the Holy Spirit, those four distinct statements of evidence of matters of fact, yet it is not as the organs of inspiration they come forward. Their language is not, "Thus saith the Lord;" but, "He that saw it bare record." These things were "delivered unto us by those who, from the beginning, were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word." They have so shaped their writings as to avoid what the method of authority would require, and force forward what the method of examination would demand; and have thus shown pretty clearly their intention, that the religion which they preached upon the ground of evidence, should be maintained and propagated also upon the same ground. "These things"—says the Evangelist John, speaking of Christ's miracles, wrought in the presence of his disciples—"were written that ye might believe . . . and . . . believing ye might have life through his name."

It has been said by a modern writer, that "the poor ignorant uninstructed peasant who says, 'I believe my religion because I have been told so by those who are wiser and better than myself; my parents told me so, and the clergyman of the parish told me so,' comes nearest the answer of the Gospel"—to that answer which the apostle Peter directs us to be ready to give "to every one that asketh a reason for the hope that is in us." And yet it is manifest this answer could have been given when the Gospel was first preached, by no Christian; but might be, and was, given by every one of his Pagan neighbors.

This is to represent the Apostles of Christ as saying to those of whom they would make converts, "Let every succeeding generation receive quietly the religion handed down by its fathers, but let this generation act otherwise. Take up novelty for this once to oblige us, and ever after adhere to antiquity."

He who professes adherence to the national religion of England, on the ground that "it is the religion of his fathers," forgets, as do the hearers who applaud the sentiment, that, on this principle, the worship of Thor and Woden would claim precedence.

In these our days, there are an immense number of persons, who, professing faith in the Gospel, and zeal for its support, yet assure us that inquiries into its evidences, are likely to lead to infidelity. What would such a person say of some professed friend coming forward as his advocate, and saying, "My friend here, is a veracious and worthy man, and there is no foundation for any of the charges brought against him; and his integrity is fully believed in by persons who thoroughly trust him, and who have never thought of reasoning or inquiring about his character at all; but, of all things, do not make any investigation, for the more you inquire and examine, the less likely most people will be to believe in his integrity!" Surely a man so defended would exclaim, "Deliver me from my friends, and I fear not my enemies."

Those who boldly stand out and court inquiry, and bring forward cogent reasons for their conviction, are reproached, by a certain modern writer, with infirm faith and timidity. Timidity of all things! One is reminded of the story of some Indian savages serving as allies to the British in America, who, when the allied force was attacked by the enemy, ran and took shelter in the woods, while the British troops stood firm under a heavy fire, and repulsed the assailants. It was expected that their Indian friends would have been full of admiration at this display of superior value; but, on the contrary, their interpretation of it was, that the British soldiers were such cowards that they were too much frightened to run away. Almost every chapter of the New Testament convicts the Lord Jesus and his followers of that "timidity," in appealing to the evidence of miracles and prophecies, which is censured and derided.

The danger of decrying all appeal to evidence is not confined to a mere want of adequate evidence for the truth of the Christian religion, but something distinct from, and beyond, this; the danger, namely, of a contrary presumption arising. It is not merely, that men, to whom sufficient evidence has not been furnished, will be likely, themselves, to reject what has not been proved to them; but that men of all classes—the learned as well as the unlearned—will be likely to regard it as a positive evidence against the religion, that it professes to be calculated for mankind in general, and designed to claim their rational belief, while its defenders themselves confess that the object cannot be accomplished.

To labor to prove a truth, is to imply the possibility of doubt, and to challenge inquiry; therefore an appeal to truth, as resting on evidence, is the characteristic of a true religion, which alone can satisfy doubts, or stand the test of inquiry.

The kingdom of truth the Lord came to establish, is a kingdom whose subjects should have been admitted as such, in consequence of their being "of the truth;" that is, not mere adherents of truth by accident, but votaries of truth. "Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice."

He only is "of the truth" who, with reverential love, is seeking, in candor and simplicity, to learn God's truth, and, in earnest self-devotion, to obey it at all seeming hazards; after the example of Him who "came into the world to bear witness unto the truth."

PERILS OF THE DAY.

LET us get a definite idea of the perils of the day.

By these perils we do not mean those dangers which are common to mankind in all ages and under all similar conditions of civilized life. Certain vices are rooted deeply in our nature, and society, in all its varying forms, tends to favor their growth. The past and the present, in these respects, are very much alike. Moses, in his early administration of government, had some of the perplexities that embarrass modern legislators. Cicero and Lucretius were agitated by problems that defy our solution; while Augustus was doubtless quite as sorely puzzled on such subjects as marriage, industry, and taxes as some of the ruling potentates of Europe. What is common to humanity ought not to be charged to the special account of our day. No doubt some of these evils have been increased. Others however, have been diminished; so that the old fighting-ground of the race is practically about the same.

The true point of inquiry touches the perils peculiar, more or less, to the circumstances by which we are surrounded. Now, in this light, we can have no difficulty in ascertaining what dangers threaten the conservative energies of society, and what progress they are making in the work of secret or open destruction. One who enters into this investigation must remember what are the main features of the age, and must trace their presence in its virtues and vices, marking the amount of force in each, so as to see which is likely to gain the ascendency.

The world is alive with energy. To mention its gigantic enterprises is simply to repeat stale truisms. But how happens it that this energy is so general and so intense? The reason is, that wealth is a greater power than ever before. It buys more pleasures, secures a larger freedom from current ills, puts its possessor in a higher relative position, assures him of a wider range of consideration, and gratifies certain sentiments of character, more than it ever did in any stage of the world's existence. Suppose now that this prodigious activity were merely directed toward gaining the material resources of nature, and converting them to the uses of civilized society. Even in this most legitimate field of exertion evils would spring up, men would abuse their opportunities, and gross wrongs would be perpetrated. But evils multiply much more rapidly when wealth becomes, as it has now become, a fierce battle between man and man, and between nation and nation. Competitions are doubtless good things. Producers and consumers are the better for the spur they give. The sad fact, is however, that competitions, as once known, are almost out of date, and destructive antagonisms have meanly taken their place. The modern Exchange is a Flavian Amphitheatre, where the arena is covered with blood. The brawny gladiators meet to strike down each other's life; and many a newspaper, aping the sensational novel, rehearses the brutal fray with undissembled zest. One can hardly help concluding, therefore, that the recent stimulus given to money-making is showing a fearful tendency to disintegrate society. It is a diabolical enemy to all human brotherhood. It aims the dagger at the very heart of that fraternity which, in some form or other, must cement the interests of business into a firm and honorable fellowship.

One of the strongest feelings of the day is the disposition of men to protect themselves as far as far as possible against the uncertainties which make so large an element in human affaias. In itself this is a true feeling. Without forethought—calm, deliberate, earnest forethought—man is less than man. Without it much of his intellectual and moral nature lies dormant. Of late years this feeling has greatly increased. Unquestionably it has done a vast amount of good to society. But it now threatens us with a maniacal sort of excitement that is feeding the money-fury of the times. Under cover of providing against accidents, the spirit of gambling is working its way though all classes of society. Risks are pitted against risks. The bread of to-day is hazarded against the bread of to-morrow; a most morbid sense of uneasiness as to the future is seizing every one's mind; and gradually but fatally all deep sense of the moral laws of the world is yielding to the wretchedness of doubt and apprehension. Thousands discard the doctrine of Providence. Other thousands scorn the idea and mock at the sentiment. Money is the only Providence. Holding such a creed in every-day matters—a creed that banishes God from the marts of trade and the enterprises of commerce, a creed that glorifies success as the product of energy only, and builds man's throne as the ordering and disposing sovereign of nature—living by such a creed, what else can result but that worst of profanity, that basest of blasphemy, which wipes out the image of God from human society, and stamps in its stead the bloated likeness of self!—Harper's.

LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM ABBY A. PERRY.

BELOVED EDITORS AND ALL WHO LOVE THE TRUTH: Sad and lonely I take up my pen to converse awhile with you, who can understand and sympathize with one who is "persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed." How comforting the last words of our "Life-giver" before he was betrayed—"If the world hate you ye know that it hated me before it hated you: if ye were of the world, the world would love his own; but because I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you." "Remember the word that I said unto you: the servant is not greater than his lord: if they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you: if they have kept my sayings, they will keep yours also; but all these things will they do unto you for my name's sake, because they know not him that sent me."

O, then, how necessary that we obey his command to "Love one another." O, brethren and sisters, may love and liberty increase and abound among us, despised as we are by the world, so that others shall be constrained to say: "Behold, how these Christians love one another!" Dear ones in Christ, I love you all; not only those who think just as I do about things to come, but all who love my Master sincerely, and strive to do his will.

When I parted with those who were at Springfield, I did not think so many weeks would pass before you heard from me, but sickness in the family, and a multitude of cares have hindered. I have not forgotten any of you, but pray for you all, that you may have all needed grace given you, and that your Faith and patience may increase daily. And, like Paul, I pray that your love may abound yet more and more in Knowledge (of the Scripture), and in all judgment, that ye may approve things that are excellent, that ye may be sincere and without offence till the day of the Messiah's appearing; "being filled with the fruits of righteousness which are by Christ, unto the glory and praise of God." Amen. Do not let us be deceived and think we love one another when one cannot speak a word on any subject we do not understand, or have not looked into without our finding fault with him for presenting such views, notwithstanding he gives much plain Scripture testimony to prove his position. I believe the literal seed of Abraham will be restored to the land promised to Abraham in the future, and that God will then make a new covenant with them. Until Jeremiah's words are fulfilled, that the Almighty told him to write in a book, I must be what is called "Age to come."

Now, children, ye who do not believe this prophecy will be fulfilled in the future age, tell us when it has been fulfilled in the past. When has the new covenant been made with Israel and Judah? When has been the time that they have not had occasion to teach their neighbor and brother, saying, "know the Lord?" Has the time been when God has forgiven their iniquity, so that he will remember their sins no more? Is that city spoken of by the prophet Jeremiah xxxi. 38–40, now standing? for it was to be built, and the measuring line was to measure the building spot, and it was not to be plucked up or thrown down any more forever. Zech. tells the same story, by the Spirit of God, chapters viii. and xiv., especially. And then Ezekiel touches the same string, and O how it harmonizes. He begins in chap. xxxvi., with the mountains of Israel, and he does not stop until he has the two nations gathered from all nations of the earth, and brought back to the land promised to their fathers, and God's sanctuary and tabernacle planted in their midst, to remain with them forevermore. Then he goes on to describe the temple most minutely, and winds up by saying: "And the name of the city from that day shall be, 'The Lord is there.'"

The first inquiry that was made after our Life-giver was born was, "Where is he that is born King of the Jews?" And on the cross, where, in his dying agony, he exclaimed, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do:" it was written in this language, "Jesus of Nazareth, the King of the Jews." Now do you suppose that prayer was answered, or were they idle words? The Jews wanted Pilate to alter the superscription, but he only answered, "What I have written, I have written." Often I have told the people that it could not have been altered, for God had promised by all the prophets that it should be so. What did the angel tell Mary about this matter? Did he not tell her that the Lord God would give unto him the throne of his "father David, and he should reign over the house of Jacob forever?" So you see Christ meant something when he told Peter what he should have for leaving all to follow him. "In the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit on (David's throne), the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit on twelve thrones, judging (or ruling), the twelve tribes of Israel."

Truth is what I desire; so if I am wrong, I want to be set right. Signs are thickening fast, and heralding the approach of the coming kingdom in all its glory. That we may be found ready to welcome the King is my prayer.

SCOTLAND, Oct., 1870.

FROM MRS L. W. BRAGG.

DEARLY BELOVED PILGRIMS IN THE LORD: May grace, mercy and peace be and abide with you forever in Jesus' worthy name. May we all hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end, which now seems just upon us. Then we shall rejoice with exceeding joy if we, by faith in Christ are partakers of his nature in this state of probation. The fulfillment of the prophetic word tells us that Jesus is soon to perfect his saints. We shall see him as he is and be made like him, and die no more. O praise the good Lord for salvation full and free through Jesus. He alone is our righteousness and salvation by faith in his atoning blood, spilled for us. Just such poor unworthy worms of the dust as we, are commanded to come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need. If we will draw near to him, he will draw near to us. Here we experience adoption into the family of the living God, where we truly have life more abundantly, and joy in the Holy Ghost. He regards us as the apple of his eye, and gives us abundant grace if we but humble ourselves to receive it as a free gift of his love alone. Our hearts should be filled with love and gratitude to Him for the wonderful plan of salvation through the death and resurrection of Christ our only life-giver. O how blessed is the heavenly foretaste of a life "where is fulness of joy and pleasure forevermore."

O thank His dear name forever and evermore, is the language of my heart. Salvation present by faith and eternal through grace is truly of the Lord. O glory, glory, hallelujah, to God and the Lamb forever and ever. We soon shall reach the harbor and the shore. The month past has been in Providence, a time "of refreshing from the presence of the Lord." The prayer meetings have truly been comforting and strengthening to a Child of faith, and some wanderers have come home to the Father's house again, and are now rejoicing with his people in hope of speedy redemption. My longing heart cries out at times, Come Lord Jesus, come quickly. To-day we have had a sweet, heavenly feast from the word of life dispenced to us by Br. Stewart. This evening our heart longs for that state where we shall have an eternal meeting, and union with all our Father's family.

FROM D. J. ELLSWORTH.

BR. STORRS: I would render my acknowledgement of the joy and comfort I receive in reading the dear HERALD as it comes from week to week, laden with its rich and varied articles, and letters from the dear saints scattered abroad. I love to read them. The spirit of Love which stamps itself upon the true follower of Jesus, is breathed out in a manner not to be mistaken. Although we do not yet see eye to eye, brethren in Christ can dwell together in unity. But how few do it. If we have the truth, we have nothing to fear. "For we can do nothing against the truth, but for the truth." When we meet with one (alas! how often) who is unwilling to hear or have a particular doctrine preached, and who will prevent it if he has the power, it shows conclusively, to my mind, that he does not enjoy full confidence in that which he holds. Do we not find this the case, with those in the churches, who are rolling in an ocean of error with scarcely a vestige of sacred truth upon their banners? But how shall we get hold of truth or know of a doctrine, whether it be true or false?

We get the assurance from the word of God. If we will do His will, we shall know of the doctrine whether it be true or false. And again; "Prove all things." How? By the unerring word of God. But how shall we begin? Not by trying to argue against, but simply listen calmly to what may be presented. Then, with the mind open to conviction, compare with the whole Bible, willing to accept or reject, as the general tenor and teaching of the word may be. I write this from personal experience and from observation in helping brethren and sisters into the truth of Life future only in Christ.

I wish here to thank Br. Simonds for his article upon the punishment of sin. I never saw it set forth so simple and plainly before.

Lines Suggested by the Sermon on the Mount.

We Christians should steadfastly ponder
What Christ hath so graciously taught;
For He, who would have us His freemen,
Would see us retain in our thought
How little things earthly are worth,
Lest those who heap treasures on earth,
The heavenly prize leave unsought.

All nature a sermon may teach thee;
The birds sing thy murmurs away,—
The birds, which, nor sowing nor reaping,
God fails not to feed day by day;
And He, who these creatures doth cherish,
Will he fail thee, and leave thee to perish?
Or art thou not better than they?

The lilies, nor toiling nor spinning,
Their clothing, how gorgeous and fair!
What tints in their tiny robes woven,
What wondrous devices are there!
All Solomon's stores could not render
One festival robe of such splendor
As the flowers have for every-day wear.

God gives to each flower its rich raiment,
And o'er them His treasures flings free,
Which to-day finds so fragrant in beauty,
And to-morrow all faded shall see.
Thus the lilies smile shame on thy care,
And the happy birds sing it to air:
Will their God be forgetful of thee?

Behold and Wonder.

BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

I cut the following from the editorial columns of a New York daily paper.

"The two years' advance supply on hand of breadstuffs, which was one of the boasted arrangements of the imperial system, seems to have been, for this year at least, as much a myth as the strength and reliability of its military organization. In one word—a word of solemn, overshadowing portent—the gaunt spectre of famine looms up in more gigantic and ghastly proportions every hour over the once fair land of France. The nation but yesterday so mighty is "hard bestead and hungry," and neither rulers nor people know whither to look in this hour of their tribulation. The trials that have fallen upon them are almost apocalyptic in their suddenness, their completeness and their terror. With the threatened dearth comes the nameless horror of the "pestilence that walketh in darkness," which falls upon all famished regions, and of the still more frightful outburst of frantic passions among hot-blooded races driven to despair. The hour seems close at hand, indeed, for the beautiful, the imperial city of the late Napoleonic empire, when "the keepers of the house shall tremble and the strong men shall bow themselves, and the grinders cease because they are few, and those that look out of the windows shall be darkened," and all the proud nation shall share in her sorrow.

This is a terrible contingency for Christendom to contemplate—a momentous lesson for ambitious princes and statesmen to ponder."

The Emperor deceived the people in respect to the supplies as fully as he did as to the strength of the army. He had a vast army indeed, but one "stronger than he," and with an army more vast, with supplies inexhaustible, came and "spoiled his goods." His fortresses, his cities, his people, his entire land. The army was the power of the Emperor. It did not belong to the people. With the great army gone, and the defences destroyed, what is left but complete devastation?

A nation impoverished and famishing, by a three month's war! A whole vast country, with forty millions of people, humbled and crushed and without hope, except the vain one of saving the capitol, all in the incredible short time of less than four months.

Prussia, under Frederick the Great, withstood Russia, Austria and France for seven years and then came out well, and without losing a foot of territory. Here is the manifest, special judgment of the Almighty, and by just so much, it is the fulfilment of the prophetic words that long went before. Really now, the sympathies of all lovers of liberty, of all who desire the liberation of the nations, should be with France, and against the action of the Germans, who seem to be reviving the barbarism of by-gone days. Having overthrown Napoleon, his government, and armies, what more legitimate work has King William to do?

But pity the French as we may, the word of God will not return to him unfulfilled. The judgment of God, upon a people who have arrayed themselves against him must be manifest. It is the infliction of the wrath of Jehovah upon a nation which has joined with the Apostate "wicked one" to drive the people of God, faith and the word of God from the world. Now a Protestant power sweeps the French nation away from her position as a first-class power, to complete dismemberment—with not only "almost Apocalyptic suddenness" but, in fulfilment of the prophecy. The actual realization of the Apocalyptic vision.

The quotations from Scripture, in this slip, show that the writer must see, to some extent, the hand of God in the terrible work now being enacted in France.

It was spoken in the Old Testament, of a rebellious people, that they should "pass through hardly bestead and hungry." Will the French ever pass through?

Truth Will Stand.

BY MARIA M WEAVER.

Often in our experience have we been led to thank God for the immutability of His word. Sometimes those who profess to love God's truth above everything else—will for the honors of this world, the praise of man, or for the love of money, give up their hopes and views of things divine. Others again seem strong in the Lord, established in his truth, and with their more than average understanding and aptness to teach, we consider them equal to every emergency, well equipped and we expect them to do good service for God. Yet even the strong ones sometimes fail, and the battle field is strewn with slain witnesses.

Our enemies may look on and think our cause must fail. If the cause were ours it might, but it is God's cause, and he upholds it, independent of human help. Let false-hearted and faint-hearted ones forsake and fall away; God remains, and his word will stand forever. It is a source of sorrow to us to see those we have had confidence in, turning their backs upon Christ; but it only makes us examine our own hearts the closer to see whether we are rooted and grounded in the truth or not. God always tries his people. Thanks to his name, we may know whether we love the truth or not. We have opportunities to choose between the Gospel and the flatteries of men very often. Only those who stand in the wisdom and power of the Lord can endure such trials. If we stand in the wisdom of man, when man departs from the truth we depart with him.

How much we need decision of character now. How much we need to have our feet on the "Rock." There amid winds and waves we stand secure. God wants his soldiers to be true at all times.

It is too late now, at the port of glory almost to be trifling with the King's business. A careless disposition is not allowable in the Lord's service at any time. He requires us to serve him with our "might, mind and strength" always.

"Stand up, stand up for Jesus,
Ye soldiers of the cross."

The conflict may be fierce and our foes strong; but the victory will be ours soon. The reward that awaits the faithful ones will repay us a thousand fold. That we may be faithful to the end, and obtain eternal life, is my prayer.

Those Computations.

BY J. D. SHERIDAN.

In the "Crisis" of Oct. 19th, I find an article headed "Time Measurements," by Bro. Sheldon, in which he states that at the present time much "prejudice" exists against meddling with this subject; and that "this feeling ought not to exist." I agree with the Bro. that these are facts, and much more that he says on the subject; and that "we are interested," or should be, in this great subject. Neither should the subject be discarded simply because somebody in by-gone days made a wrong application of them. And he might add, let us take heed lest we at this present day fall into the same error. I acknowledge that the Bro. approaches the subject in a bold and Christian spirit. But I am unable to understand his computation of time. In the first place he attempts to show the precise year of the Messiah's birth. He says: "God's word gives a measurement of sixty-nine prophetic weeks, or 483 years beginning with a specific commandment," etc.

Very well; that is very clear and true. He further shows that the birth of Christ terminates this "specific" time, or number of weeks. This also is very plain.

He then undertakes to prove the exact time that event occurred. In the first place he states that "Christ was certainly born previous to the death of Herod." That we can easily understand by reading the account as written in the inspired word. But now comes the unsettled problem. Our Br,. in tracing the reign of the different "Cæsars" before and after the birth of Christ, distinctly states that "Herod's death occurred B. C., four years, and that some time previous Christ was born; probably B. C. five years." Now this is an enigma that I am unable to solve. Will some Br. please inform me how Christ could be born before himself?

I thought when I first read the statement it must be a typographical error, but after finding it repeated several times I concluded it must be the meaning of the writer.

He then states that "the sixty-two weeks" of the 26 v. of Dan. ix., reach to the time "Christ should be cut off," etc.

He gives conclusive evidence that the sixty-two weeks should commence at the finishing, or dedication of the walls and temple of Jerusalem, and brings historical facts to show that that event occurred "B. C. 406;" and then by borrowing five years between the birth of Christ and the "Christian era," he makes it very plain that the sixty-two weeks would end A. D. 28 or 30. Here appears the great problem, unless he goes on the principle of borrowing without expecting to return.

Then comes the explanation of the "seventy weeks." But I will not enlarge on examination at present, lest I take up too much of your valuable space. If opportunity offers, I would like to say more in the future.

Loss of the Cambria.

BY P. GANNON.

If one half the enterprise actuated the Admiralty and pilot system of Great Britain which this government and the pilot system of New York possess, the Cambria might be afloat and one hundred and eighty souls saved from a watery grave. The Cambria was fifty miles in-land, past Cory Island light-house, and no pilot aboard at the time she was lost. Such an accident could not happen under our system, because a pilot would have been aboard forty-eight hours before she struck the fatal rock.

The officers of the Anchor-Line of Steam-Ships are well qualified to fill their position, so far as I am acquainted. I sailed out on the Europa, and back on the Australia, of the same line this summer. It cannot be expected that officers sailing from the port of N. Y., 2800 miles across the Atlantic, and arriving on the coast of Ireland on a dark and stormy night, and then to be fifty miles inland, past the light-house, that those officers could understand every rock, bar, and inlet, as well as a pilot whose profession is to understand the locality of those dangerous rocks and bars. The loss of the Cambria is chargeable to the Admiralty of Great Britain, for not having lights placed on this dangerous Rock, and to the imbecility of the pilot system.

On the night of July 21st, 3 o'clock A. M., I was on board the Europa, Capt. McDonald, about the same place the Cambria was lost. The night was dark, with rain and fog, so dark that we passed the light-house without seeing it. About 2 o'clock A. M., the engine stopped, the first time since we left New York.

As my state-room was near the screw, I bounded out and was soon on deck. I observed Capt. McDonald and officers heaving the sounding-lead, and in a few minutes we were under way again. I went below and in about fifteen minutes the screw stopped again. I again went on deck, and observed the officers sounding as before. The Capt. told me everything was working satisfactory. I then went below and was only down twenty minutes when the Steward sung out, "passengers for Derry get your baggage ready." I immediately went on deck, and to my great joy, Ireland was in full view, about three miles to the right of us. After an absence of forty-five years, the sight was cheering. Her hills and dales were dressed in bright luxuriant emerald green, such as no country in Europe can produce. After about an hour's sail close to the shore, a pilot put out and boarded us, the thing he ought to have done twenty-four hours sooner.

On my return home, I sailed on the Australia from Glasgow, and passed the coast of Ireland August 28th., in day light. When we arrived within two days sail of New York, 450 miles out in the Atlantic, we were boarded by a Yankoe pilot; and on the passage out in July, Capt. McDonald stopped the Europa 700 miles out from New York to give reckonings to a New York pilot boat.

These facts lead me to assume that if one half the enterprise actuated the pilots on the other side of the Atlantic that our pilots possess, one hundred and eighty lives would have been saved.

Patience.

One of the most remarkable instances of patience on record is found in the case of a lady recently residing in Massachusetts. A visit to her is thus described,

"The door was opened by a very old lady, wrinkled and bowed down with age, who invited me to enter. The room was so dark, that before my eyes were accustomed to the change, I could only see a figure dressed in white, sitting upon the bed and rocking to and fro. This motion was attended by a sound like the click of wooden machinery, which arose, as I afterward learned, from the bones as they worked in their loosened sockets. As we approached, she extended her hand to my companion, and said in a painful but affectionate voice, 'Eliza, I am very glad to see thee;' and then asked my name and place of residence. She had just given me her hand, when a spasm seized her, and it was twitched suddenly from my grasp. It flew some four or five times with the greatest violence against her face, and then, with a sound which I can only compare to that made by a child who has been sobbing a long time, in catching its breath, she threw up both her arms, and with a deep groan fell back upon her pillow, with a force inconceivable to one who has not witnessed it.

It was several minutes before she could speak, and then there was none to answer her. Both my companion and myself were choked with tears. Her poor mother went to the other side of the bed, and smoothed the coverlid, and rearranged the pillows, looking sadly upon her poor child, writhing in torture which she could not alleviate. I became faint, aud trembled with sudden weakness; a cold perspiration stood on my face. The objects in the room began to swim about me, and I was obliged to take hold of the bedside for support. I have been in our largest hospitals, and have spent hours in going from room to room with the attending physician. I have there witnessed almost every form of human suffering, but I had never beheld any thing to be compared to that now before me. Her sentences were broken, uttered with much difficulty, and frequently interrupted by the terrible spasm I have described above. Yet this was her quiet state; this the time when she suffered least. Day after day, night after night, fourteen weary years have dragged themselves along, while her poor body has been thus racked. No relief; no hope of relief, except that which death shall give. When I asked her if her affliction did not at times seem greater than she could bear, 'O! never,' she replied. 'I cannot thank God enough for having laid his heavy hand upon me. I was a thoughtless sinner, and had He not in mercy afflicted me, I should probably have been lost. I see only his kindness and love. The sweet communion I have with my Saviour more than compensates me for all I suffer. I am permitted to feel, in a measure, what he suffered to save me, and I can never grow weary in his praises.' This last sentence, I must say, gave me an argument which put doubts of the verity and power of religion to flight more effectually than all the evidences which the wisdom of man has arrayed against the skeptic; and I could but exclaim, 'If this be delusion, let me be deluded!'

She spoke in the most tender terms of her Saviour's love. Her conversation was in heaven, from whence also she looked for her Saviour, knowing that he should change her body of humiliation, and fashion it like unto his glorious body. I shall never forget the tones and language in which she entreated my sobbing companion to give that Saviour her heart. As she recovered from a spasm, I said to her, 'do you not often desire to die?' She had hardly recovered her exhausted breath, but replied with great decision, 'By the grace of God, I have never had that wish. Though death will be welcome when my Father sees fit to bestow it upon me, yet, thanks to his supporting grace, I can wait His time without impatience. He sees that there is much dross to refine away, and why should I wish against his will?'

I remained by her side for more than an hour; such, however, were the attractions of her discourse, that I was unconscious of the time. I know not when I have been so drawn toward a fellow Christian, and never had I been led to such delightful contemplation of our Saviour's character; his faithfulness and love. I remarked to her, as I turned to go away, 'God has made you a powerful preacher, here upon your bed of pain.' 'O,' she replied, 'if He will make me the instrument of saving but one soul, I am willing to live and suffer here until my hair is gray with age.'"

The Monarch and the Miller.

Near Potsdam, Prussia, in the reign of Frederick, was a mill which interfered with a view from the window of Sans Souci. Annoyed by this inconvenience to his favorite residence, the king sent to inquire the price for which the mill would be sold by the owner. "For no price," was the reply of the sturdy Prussian; and, in a moment of anger, Frederick gave orders that the mill should be pulled down. "The king may do this," said the miller, quietly folding his arms, "but there are laws in Prussia;" and forthwith he commenced proceedings against the monarch the result of which was, the court sentenced Frederick to rebuild the mill, and to pay besides a large sum of money as compensation for the injury he had done. The king was mortified, but had the magnanimity to say, addressing himself to his courtiers, "I am glad to find that just laws and upright judges exist in my kingdom."

A few years ago, the head of the honest miller's family, who had in due course of time succeeded to the hereditary possession of his little mill, finding himself, after a long struggle with losses occasioned by the wars, which brought ruin into many a house besides his own, involved in pecuniary difficulties that had become insurmountable, wrote to the king, reminding him of the refusal experienced by Frederick the Great at the hands of his ancestor, and stating that, if his majesty now entertained a similar desire to obtain possession of the property, it would be very agreeable to him, in his present embarrassed circumstances, to sell the mill. The king immediately wrote, with his own hand, the following reply:—

"My dear neighbor;—I cannot allow you to sell the mill; it must remain in your possession as long as one member of your family exists; for it belongs to the history of Prussia. I lament, however, to hear that you are in circumstances of embarrassment; and therefore send you 6000 dollars to arrange your affairs, in the hope that this sum will be sufficient for the purpose. Consider me always your affectionate neighbor, Frederick William."

How a Boy Silenced a Doctor of Divinity.

A youth called, some years ago, upon a learned Doctor of Divinity, who was President of a College, to borrow a book on the great Star Showers from the College library. Bringing the book, the Doctor asked,—

"And why, my young friend, are you so interested in that subject?"

"Because," replied the youth, "I have been led to believe that the great star shower of 1833, which Prof. Olmstead says was probably 'the greatest display of celestial fire works seen since the creation,' must have been one of the signs of the Lord's near coming; and I wish to get all the information that I can on the subject."

"And what makes you think that a sign of the Lord's coming?"

"The words of our Saviour, in the 24th of Matthew, 29th verse, in answer to the question, 'What shall be the sign of thy coming and the end of the world?' 'The sun shall be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light, and the stars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of the heavens shall be shaken . . . and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory.'"

"But didn't you know, my young brother, that all these things were fulfilled 'in that generation?' for Christ said plainly to his disciples, 'this generation shall not pass till all these things be fulfilled.'"

"What, did all those things take place then?"

"Yes, undoubtedly, they must all have been fulfilled at the destruction of Jerusalem."

"And the darkening of the sun, and the coming of the Son of man with his angels in the clouds of heaven—did that all take place at that time?"

"Certainly. As to the darkening of the sun, haven't you read that at the crucifixion of Christ there was great darkness over all the land for three hours? And the coming of the Son of man with his angels, was simply the coming of Titus, the Roman general, with his army to beseige Jerusalem, and cause 'the great tribulation' spoken of."

"Will you please to tell me, sir, in what year the darkening at the crucifixion took place?"

"In the year 33."

"And when was Jerusalem beseiged and involved in "the great tribulation?""

"Some 37 years after, about the year 70."

"Then 'the darkening of the sun,' as you understand it, took place before the 'tribulation?'"

"Yes."

"What, then, sir, does the Saviour mean when he says—'After that tribulation, shall the sun be darkened, and the stars fall, and the Son of man come, and the elect be gathered?' Is it not certain, sir, from these plain words of the Lord himself, that none of these events could have taken place either before or at the tribulation and destruction of Jerusalem?"

Blushing scarlet at being so completely worsted by a mere boy, the learned Doctor of Divinity was silent for a moment, and replied that he had no time to go into an argument on the question, as other duties demanded his attention.

There are many boys among us, who, like the boy Jesus, are able to unfold the Scriptures to learned doctors, and confound them with their questions.—The Young Pilgrim.

Phebe's Treasures.

"O dear, how few nice things I have got," said little Phebe, with a sigh as she turned over her small box of faded ribbons, glass beads, and bits of broken china and glass ware. "There's Emma Rice, where I have been visiting, she's got lots of treasures—a whole set of tiny china, a little plated castor with four cut glass bottles, and two handsome dolls with plenty of fine clothing for them; and I,—O dear me,—I haven't got hardly anything." And Phebe looked very sad and discontented.

"But you have some good things that a great deal of money could not buy, I know," said her uncle Fred, the young doctor.

"I should like to know what I have that would sell for even a penny," said Phebe.

"Well, I have been wanting a fine, bright eye to examine this long time. One that I can take to pieces and cut up to suit myself. Now I will give you five dollars for one of yours," he said, with a mischievous smile.

Phebe looked indignant enough at the idea of anybody cutting up one of her blue eyes; and she declined with great spirit.

"A hand will do as well, or even one of these little fingers. How much must I bid for one of these?"

"Do you suppose I would have a finger cut off for any money, uncle Fred?"

"Well, what will you ask for your mother? She would be very useful to me in my little office in town. She would keep it as nice as a pin, and now it looks shocking. Besides, she could cook my dinners for me as she used to, and save me a great deal on my board bill. You can get on some way without her, I dare say."

"No, indeed, you can't have my mother, uncle Fred," said Phebe, throwing her arms about him. "She would not go with you and leave us alone," she added triumphantly.

"There is no use in making you an offer for brother Roger or the baby, is there?"

"No, indeed, I guess not," said the little girl, earnestly, feeling all of a sudden how dear they all were to her.

"So it seems that you have some possessions that are worth more than I or anybody else could buy. I should think by your own showing that you were a very rich little girl."

Phebe thought the matter over, as she tripped about through the clover, picking the sweet, wild strawberries, that afternoon, and felt that after all she was not as poor as many others who were crippled. or had no loving mother to care for them, nor dear little brothers to love and play with.

As her mother bent over her pillow that night, she told her of another and more priceless gift still, which uncle Fred had not spoken of. It was the gift which Jesus bought for her with his precious life-blood, the gift of eternal life.

"This may be yours, dear Phebe, if you will only take it. Come to him daily in humble prayer and love, and he will not fail to save you. All the money in the world could not buy this gift; and if you had all the world you would be poor indeed without this last gift of God to man."—The Young Pilgrim.

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy, misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should allow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is o desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it. and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

2 COR. V. 1-9.

BY W. WOOD.

For we know that if our earthly house of this tabrnacle were dissolved, we have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." —2 Cor. v. 1.

WE believe that the labors of the great apostle by epistle to the church at Corinth would not be used to divert their attention or confuse their minds in regard to the future life, or a resurrection from the dead. In his first letter to the Gentile converts, who have just emerged from the darkness of heathenism, he answers their questions by applying to them the general principles of the gospel, and in the 15th chapter he elucidates the nature of the resurrection in a manner that none can misapprehend. In his second epistle, though they accused him of many things, and endeavored to disparage his mission and character, compelling him to defend himself unwillingly as a true minister of the gospel of Jesus Christ, yet we cannot perceive any conflict concerning a future life, in his second address to the Corinthians.

If the text, "Our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved" means our body, compared to a tent, in which the soul sojourns, and at the stage of dissolution the soul becomes a disembodied spirit which ascends to heaven or descends to hell, what can the apostle mean in 1 Cor. xv. 51, 52? He says: "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed in a moment at the last trump." It seems to me there can be no mistake in arriving at a correct solution of his argument, for most assuredly he teaches that all Christians who shall be living at the end of the gospel dispensation will not die, but will undergo a change similar to that which Christians who have died will experience by a resurrection. "For this corruptible" (whether living or dead) "must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." When the dead have been raised incorruptible and the living changed will the Scripture be fulfilled that is written, "death is swallowed up in victory." No more death, for the last foe of all men will be no more. As this is apparently the meaning of the apostle in his first epistle, we cannot expect an antagonism in his second address to the Corinthian church.

Suppose we examine our text a few moments and assume, for the time, that the "earthly house" here spoken of means in reality our body, and when dissolved we have a "building of God, a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens," which house is said to be a spiritual body. The apostle is silent in regard to an immortal soul, or disembodied spirit, but through some process we are taught to believe that there is an immortal spirit (when our earthly house or body is dissolved), in waiting to be clothed upon with our house from heaven, or our spiritual body. Now assuming that when our bodies die, our disembodied spirits are clothed upon with this building of God, or spiritual body, how shall we understand the apostle when he says, "It is sown a natural body, it is a raised a spiritural body, for if our spiritual body already exists eternal in the heavens, and our spirit when freed from this earthly house, or body, is clothed upon with it, what is the spiritual body that stands or exists by a resurrection from the dead? If it is true that our spiritual bodies are in waiting for us, myself for one would be obliged to admit that there can be no resurrection of the body corporeal to life. Were I a believer in the soul's immortality, this exposition would be very unsatisfactory, for the apostle is made to contradict himself. He does not, as far as I can see, speak of but one spiritual body, and that is raised up by a resurrection from the dead at the last day; but this spiritual body, eternal in the heavens, is something I really cannot understand.

Again: "For in this we groan, earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with our house which is from heaven." This is the language of Paul, but somehow, by what authority I know not, we are told that it is not desirable for us to die, for our desire is to live, but if it might be the will of God, our souls should be glad to be clothed upon without the dying of the body, as will be the case with those who are alive at Christ's coming. The apostle says: "we are confident I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord." We are again told, on what authority I know not, Paul does not mean that when we are enjoying health, and the beautiful things of this present life which God hath given us, that we should desire to die or be absent from the body, but he means that should sickness, disease, or persecution overtake us as in the case of the apostle when he said, "I am now ready to be offered, and the time of my departure is at hand," etc., that is, when we cannot possibly avoid death we should be willing to be absent from the body, and become one of that great company of disembodied spirits of just men who rest with Jesus or are present with the Lord. We are not told why so great a company are left disembodied when they have a building of God, a house not made with hands, to clothe them with, eternal in the heavens. I shall not pursue this explanation further as it cannot be the apostle's meaning, for he states in 1 Cor. xv. 20, "but now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the first-fruits of them that slept," which is a surety, or pledge that all who are united by faith to Christ would rise again from the dead at the last day. They will find no spiritual body awaiting them in heaven.

Again: it is thought by some that the apostle is describing the mortality of man, by the dissolution of the earthly house, and in contrast with this, presents a house or body which will be bestowed upon all believers at the resurrection, viz., a spiritual body, and this was what the apostle earnestly desired to receive. I must dissent from all such expositions, and will endeavor to give you what I understand the great apostle to the Gentiles intended to convey to the church at Corinth. "For we know." Paul seems to have been very careful how he used the expression "we know," Rom. vi. 9, knowing, or we know, "that Christ, being raised from the dead, dieth no more; death hath no more dominion over him." Paul knew this to be truthful, for he was associated with those who were eye-witnesses of his crucifixion and of his resurrection from the dead. "For I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day."—2 Tim. i. 12. The great manifestation which he received as he went to Damascus with authority and commission from the chief priests was sufficient to obtain this knowledge, and in his beautiful speech before Agrippa he says, "for the king knoweth of these things before whom I speak freely: for this thing was not done in a corner." Hence Paul knew in whom he had believed, therefore he was confident that he would keep what he had committed unto him.

Again: "for we know." Here we have something positive. Paul, or those to whom he had written, did not know that man, when freed from this body, became a disembodied spirit; nor can we find that he did teach any thing of that character, but I think we do find that the apostle was writing about something that was established, or was in operation at the time he wrote. "For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved." The Syriac reads: "For we know that, if our house on earth—this of the body, were dissolved, yet we have a building of God," etc. The Greek word here rendered house is the same as in John iv. 53: "and himself believed, and his whole house." John viii. 35: "And the servant abideth not in the house forever: but the son abideth ever." John xiv. 2: "In my Father's house are many mansions," etc. The Greek word rendered tabernacle, or body, in the text is not the same as found in 2 Peter i. 13, 14, where the apostle is speaking of his decease, showing that his tabernacle, or body, must be laid away, as Christ had shown him, and does not appear to be applied to the body of an individual in any sense, but to an association or body, political and ecclesiastical.

Paul was living in a day when there was a great and complete change in the religious systems of the age, especially in regard to the Jewish economy, and their mode of worship. The early impressions they received, being educated and fully convinced under the grand and imposing Mosaic ritual, with its magnificent temple, the only way to approach Jehovah, it was almost an impossibility to attract their minds to observe any thing like the simplicity of the gospel of Jesus Christ. This splendid and imposing service, this beautiful temple was their earthly house, their tabernacle which, according to the inspiration of holy men of past ages, would be dissolved and broken up; this was at first the movable tabernacle of the house of Israel, built by God's direction in the wilderness of Sinai, where none could officiate but the sons of Levi. These priests were only to minister in the earthly tabernacle which is but a type of the heavenly tabernacle where Christ now ministers. He could not officiate as a priest to the earthly house of this tabernacle, because he did not belong to the tribe from which earthly priests were taken. Moses, when about to make the tabernacle, was admonished of God to make it according to the pattern, the pattern of the heavenly tabernacle (Christ being the heavenly minister), which the Lord pitched and not man. We find, therefore, that the covenant made with the fathers, and the law, with its ordinances, which Paul calls the earthly house, would be dissolved, for it could not give life or make any thing perfect. Consequently there must be a change, a new covenant, a new law and a new priesthood which could save men from eternal death, that the worshippers of the old covenant might be clothed upon, and mortality (the old dispensation), swallowed up of life. The apostle draws a comparison between Paul's house on earth, and the one in heaven. "Moses was faithful in all his house."—Heb. iii. 26. This house was the Jewish economy, or their earthly house. God had appointed it. Moses, however, was a servant, showing that he belonged to or was a part of the house; but Christ, as a son, hath greater honor than Moses, because he is the rightful owner and head of this heavenly house. This house, says Paul, are we if we hold fast the confidence and the rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end.

Again: the apostle assures us that the earthly house was made with hands, though appointed of God, and when dissolved he would have a building, a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens. A house not made with hands; how very like the body of Jesus Christ. Destroy this temple and in three days I will raise it up. He spake not of the Jewish temple, made with hands, but he spake of the temple of his body, which was raised up without hands, and through which (temple, or body), all who believe can have access to God the ruler of all. This is the building of God, the house not made with hands eternal in the heavens, by which mortality, or Paul's earthly house, might be clothed upon and swallowed up of life. "For we that are in this tabernacle do groan, being burdened."

The great changes that were to take place, from the law given amid the awful scenes on Sinai's mount, to a new dispensation were freely spoken of by the Jewish prophets in such glowing language, that all true believers in the church of Israel looked forward, by faith, with longing eyes to the time of their deliverance. They groaned, being burdened, and earnestly desired to be clothed upon with their house which is from heaven. Paul gives an account of this bondage, or being burdened, in his epistle to the Galatians, iv. 25: "For this Agar is Mount Sinai, and answereth to Jerusalem which now is, and is in bondage with her children. Agar's position, and that of her son Ishmael, will represent the covenant at Sinai, and the whole Jewish ritual until Christ, with those who are groaning in bondage, under its burdensome rights. Therefore the apostle was desirous of being clothed upon with that more glorious house, viz., the Christian dispensation, eternal in the heavens. Not for that we would be unclothed (have no knowledge of God's divine institution), but clothed upon. The law, and the whole Mosaic economy evidently shows that God intended to bestow blessings on the house of Jacob, and all who rightly observed its ordinances received great benefits. It was not given that they might expect salvation through those rites but to lead them, through faith in Christ, to become the true seed of Abraham and heirs according to the promise. They did not wish to be unclothed (lose all this) but clothed upon with the glorious life-giving gospel of Jesus Christ. Not absent from the Lord by being away from the place of his special abode in heaven, but by not being willing to give up the forms of worship Moses had commanded. Therefore as long as they continued at home in or among the body of Jewish believers they were absent from the Lord, or from receiving that which would insure or give immortality, eternal life. But Paul's desire was that those who had put on Christ would not draw back, but continue to be present with the Lord, while those who remained in bondage would ultimately receive the gospel. Wherefore, he says, we labor, that whether present or absent, we may be accepted of him.

"LET US ALONE."

BY WM. H. SPENCER.

WHEN the Saviour was upon earth this was the cry of an evil spirit. The same cry has been borne down the stream of time until today we hear it uttered on every hand. What means this cry? From whence does it come?

It is the cry of evil-doers. This desire to be let alone is characteristic of the workers of iniquity. A good cause always invites the keenest scrutiny; but a bad cause shrinks away in fear from the light, and cries to be let alone. Go and look within that dingy old bar-room—peep behind the flimsy screen which they think hides them from the light; stop but for a moment to reprove the inveterate slaves of the glass, and how quickly they raise the cry, "Let us alone!" Reprove the bloated servant of sin who deals out the essence of destruction, and scatters the seeds of human wretchedness broadcast throughout society, and he echoes the same cry. They are afraid of the light because their deeds are evil.

Ascend to the courts of popular amusement; view the proud and gay worldling, and very often the professed children of light, decked with the flimsy flowers of fashion; and let the voice of warning be raised, and they immediately cry out, "Let us alone!"

Accost the pleasure-seeker in his wild and unsuccessful rambles to satisfy his insatiable desire, and he wishes to be unmolested in his pursuit. And breathe but a word of warning to the worldly-minded in all stations of life, and they desire to be undisturbed in their delusive dreams of "peace and safety." The warnings of God are met with a frown, and the children of sin turn away with an air of self-security and contempt.

Last of all, turn your eyes to the professed bride of Christ—the church. Where should we look for God's word to receive a hearty welcome if not here? But, alas! here the evil spirit has crept in under the mantle of popular theology! When the unadulterated word of God is presented that conflicts with any of the popular usages of the church, they, too, desire to be let alone. An eminent writer truthfully remarks:

"There appears to be an active competition between the church and the world, as to which shall furnish, for unsanctified human nature, the most attractive amusements. In the appeal to the taste, the church may justly claim the verdict. In but few communities can the other vie in magnificence with the so-called houses of worship. In exclusiveness the latter clearly have the precedence. The right of admittance depends upon the possession of the monied qualifications. Instead of being an earnest effort to offer acceptable worship to God, the services are evidently intended to gratify the worldly, the cultivated, and the refined. The sermon is carefully written, and the gestures studied before the mirror; the singing is conducted by the best musical talent that money can command. With the avowed design of keeping the young people under the influence of the church, the weekly sociable is instituted, and fun and frolic prevail. To pay the preacher, a donation party is held, and the old and young, professor and worldling, devote the evening to feasting and merriment. Festivals, pic-nics and excursions, oyster supper and lotteries are resorted to, for the purpose of replenishing the funds, or reviving the flagging interests—not religious—in the prosperity of the church."

If a faithful servant of Christ raises a warning voice against any one of these various expedients for promoting Christianity, they instantly raise the cry to be let alone.

But, beloved in Christ, does it follow because evil-doers love to enjoy their delusive dreams unmolested that we shall gratify them? Shall we sit idly by and see them sink never to rise, without making an effort to rescue them? No! We owe it to the imperilled sons of wrong to agitate and arouse them from their destructive repose. They want to be let alone because they are ignorant of their real danger. If a house were on fire while its inmates were locked in slumber, one would naturally raise an alarm to arouse them to a sense of their danger. They might partially arouse themselves and cry, "Let us alone!" But to let them alone is certain death; so you increase your agitation—increasing in earnestness as the danger increases—until you arouse them to a full sense of their danger. Then their hearts are full of gratitude to the instruments of their deliverance, and they thank God that they were saved.

Is not this the case with the world? They realize not the danger which is before them; hence when the child of God sees them standing on the awful vortex of eternal ruin, and sounds the warning to save them, they cry, "Let us alone!" But when they are brought to a full realization of their peril they shrink back in horror from their condition, and by laying hold of the Rock of Salvation, they will praise God to all eternity, that you were the instruments in his hands of saving them.

This condition of the church and the world is but a picture of the last days drawn by inspiration. The final scenes of this world's drama are rapidly passing before us. We have no time to lose. We stand on the vortex of a glorious eternity. The great day of wrath is ready to break forth in all its latent fury; and now is the time to

"Let sinners learn to pray,
Let saints keep near the throne!"

Let us not heed the cry of the self-secure to be let alone, but let us continue to agitate them with God's warning, "Behold the Bridegroom cometh!" peradventure they will see their danger and flee from eternal death.

"NEITHER CAN THEY DIE ANY MORE."

BY JACOB GRIM.

WHAT cheering words are these, in the hour of our sadness; when parents are made sad by the loss of their children, and children by the loss of dear parents. Cheering to the husband, when called upon to part with a dear wife, and cheering to the wife when parting with the only support and companion she has in this life; cheering to all, when called upon to part with dear friends, and companions, and fellow-laborers in the good work. There is a time coming, and not far in the future, when the words at the head of our article will have a fulfilment, for they are the words of Jesus. Who are they that cannot die any more? It is spoken of a class, and not of all men. It seems to me the language of our Saviour is so plain, there need be no mistaking its meaning. The answer of our Saviour to my question is: "they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead," are the ones who cannot die any more.

O what a glorious hope is ours, if we "shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection of the dead." It is the hope the apostle comforted the brethren at Thessalonica with, when they mourned the loss of friends by death. "But I would not have you to be ignorant, brethren, concerning them which are asleep, that ye sorrow not, even as others who have no hope (of a resurrection). For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, (from the dead) even so them also which sleep in (through) Jesus will God bring with him (from the dead where they are sleeping). For this we say unto you by the word of the Lord." I am always glad, when I read these words, that Paul is not speaking his own words. Yes, it is by the word of the Lord, "that we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord, shall not prevent (go before) those who are asleep. For the Lord himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God; and the dead in Christ shall rise first: then we, the living, who are left over, shall, at the same time with them, be caught away in clouds, for a meeting of the Lord in the air; so shall we be always with the Lord. Therefore comfort each other with these words."—Emp. Dia. What a glorious meeting of all the children of God! Well may the apostle say, comfort each other with these words. We have been losing so many of our dear ones scattered abroad, I have felt it my duty to write a few general words of comfort at this time. O may we all so live that we may be accounted worthy to be numbered among that band who shall attend the general meeting of the first-born, in the morning of the resurrection.

And why cannot they die any more? The answer of our Lord is, They are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. Yes, the change that shall take place in the resurrection, from mortality to immortality, constitutes the reason of their deathlessness.

I heard, some months ago, a minister preach on the passion of Jesus. In closing his discourse he said, Jesus died like a God. I thought at the time, and so expressed to a friend, how little he knows of the subject—dies like a God. Blessed be the Lord for the consolation he has left us. The children of God cannot die any more, and if the children cannot die how can he liken the death of Jesus to that of God, when God's children cannot die? How can God die? Somewhere, either close at hand or not far in the future, we shall attain to the glorious privilege of being the children of the resurrection, and as such we shall be the children of God. Then we shall realize the full meaning of our Saviour's words, "cannot die any more." No more parting then, no breaking up of companies. In the language of the disciple John, "Beloved, now are we the sons of God, (by adoption) and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure."—1 John iii. 2, 3. Now whatever our sorrow may be, and however hard our lot in being called upon to part with our friends, we have the cheering words of our Saviour, that there is a time coming when we shall realize the consummation of our hope, "neither can they die any more." And we have the infallible test of John, every man having this hope, purifieth himself as he is pure. This hope of immortality is not of a moment's seeking, to be put on and laid off at pleasure. Paul speaks of it as a life-long warfare. It is to them who by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory, honor, immortality, eternal life. May we all so strive as to win the prize, and be accounted worthy to obtain that world, and the resurrection of the dead. Thus shall we become the children of God, and die no more.

BY JOEL A. SIMONDS.

THE JUDGMENT OF THE DEAD.

"As by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all man, for that all have sinned." This passage accounts for all the death that will ever occur in this world. If no provision had been made in the gospel to save men from death, no further notice would have been taken of the dead. There would have been no need of the judgment of the dead.

But, "God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him, should not perish," (finally) "but have everlasting life," by being raised up at the last day. This offer of life, and resurrection from the dead removes the certainty that the first appointed death will be final, and puts those to whom this offer is made, on a second trial, or probation. The object of this trial is life from the dead. Not that we may not die, but that we may be redeemed from death, so that it may not be final to us. He that believeth on the Son shall not perish, but shall have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day. Under this offer of life from the dead, men have lived and died. Some have complied with the conditions of life, and some have not. They lie promiscuously in the grave, and their worthiness or unworthiness is not known. This condition of those that have died, and the promise, "I will raise him up at the last day," render it necessary that the dead should be judged. I will now show:

1. The Dead must be judged.—"And he commanded us to preach unto the people, and to testify that it is he which was ordained of God to be Judge of the living and the dead."—Acts x. 42. The living are one class to be judged. They are those who have not died. The dead is another class to be judged. They are those who have died. Again: "I charge thee therefore before God, and the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall judge the living and the dead at his appearing and kingdom." —2 Tim. iv. 1. Here are the same two classes to be judged by Christ at his coming. In Rev. xi. 18, the same fact is stated. "And the nations were angry, and thy wrath is come, and the time that the dead should be judged, and that thou shouldest give reward unto thy servants the prophets, and to the saints, and to them that fear thy name small and great." Here are the living nations to be judged, and here are the dead, who are first to be judged and then rewarded. These proofs are sufficient to show that the dead will be judged.

2. The Dead will be judged while they are Dead.—The conditions upon which life from the dead depend, require this. Christ said: This is the Father's will, that of all which He hath given me I should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day; that every one that believeth on the Son may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day; that every one that cometh to me shall be raised up at the last day; and that whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood may have eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day. The being raised up at the last day depends on the following conditions: He must be Christ's; he must believe in him; he must come to Christ; and he must eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink his blood, that he may be raised up at the last day. If these conditions have not been complied with, he will not be raised up at the last day. It is to determine who are worthy of life from the dead and who are not worthy of it, that the dead must be judged, while they are dead. The judgment must precede the resurrection, or there can be no resurrection, for it is only such as are found worthy of a resurrection, that are to be raised up at the last day. All the dead will not be raised up to be judged, in order to determine who of them are worthy to live, and who are worthy to be returned back to death again, but they are judged while dead, in order to find who is worthy to live, and such only as are found worthy will be raised up at the last day.

If the Spirit of God dwell in us while we live, our mortal bodies shall be quickened. If we have the first-fruits of the Spirit, our bodies will be redeemed. If we strive to attain unto the resurrection from the dead, we shall attain unto it. If our conversation is in heaven, from whence we look for the Saviour, our vile bodies will be fashioned like unto Christ's glorious body. If we sleep in Jesus, we shall be brought from the dead as he was. If we are dead in Christ we shall rise. If we are included in the harvest, of which Christ is the first-fruits, we shall be made alive at his coming. If we are found worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection of the dead, we shall be made like the angels, so that we can die no more. These assurances of being raised from the dead all depend on the conditions specified. The judgment of the dead determines who have complied with these conditions, and their resurrection is the result of the award of this judgment. The decisions of this judgment are according to the conditions of our probation. He that believeth on the Son shall have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day. He that believeth not the Son shall perish; he shall not see life, but the wrath of God shall abide on him. That the dead, then, will be judged previous to the resurrection of the dead, is an unavoidable conclusion.

3. The Award of the Judgment of the Dead. —To the righteous will be awarded life from the dead, but the condition of the wicked will not be changed. They shall remain dead.

They have perished as brute beasts perish. To them will be awarded shame, and contempt, and condemnation, to abide under the wrath of God. This must be so.

In Rom. xiv. 7, 9 we read: For none of us (Christians) liveth to himself, and no man (of us) dieth to himself. For whether we live, we live unto the Lord; and whether we die, we die unto the Lord; whether we live, therefore, or die, we are the Lord's (None but Christians are the Lord's). For to this end Christ both died, and rose, and revived, that he might be Lord both of the dead and the living. Christ is Lord of all of his people, whether they are dead or alive. But he is not the Lord of the wicked, nor of the wicked dead. They are without Christ, having no hope, and are without God in the world, and when they die, they die like the brute beasts, because they do not know the power of Christ's resurrection, and because he is not their Lord. The Sadducees denied that there is any resurrection. They came to Christ and urged their objection against it, and he answered them.—Luke xx. 27, 38. Here is the great issue. The resurrection of the dead is denied. It must be maintained, or Christ's mission would prove a failure. Therefore Christ, understanding the importance of the question, would make the best defence of the resurrection that could be made. He said: Ye do greatly err, not knowing the Scriptures, nor the power of God. The children of this world marry, and are given in marriage: but they which shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection from the dead, neither marry, nor are given in marriage: neither can they die any more: for they are equal unto the angels; and are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection. In this passage Christ explains the whole subject of the resurrection. He tells exactly how many will be raised: all that shall be found worthy, and, by implication he excludes all others. He explains the condition of all who will be raised from the dead. They will not marry; they will be like the angels; they can die no more; and they are the children of God, being the children of the resurrection.

He then goes on to prove from the Scriptures, that the dead will be raised. He said: When Moses called the Lord the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, he showed that they would be raised from the dead; for God is not the God of the dead (who are to remain dead), but he is the God of the living, for all (such as Abraham was) to him are alive.—Diaglott. Abraham and Isaac and Jacob are now dead. If, when Moses called the Lord their God, he showed that they would be raised from the dead, then, when Moses said the Lord is not the God of the dead, he showed that such dead will not be raised up. Moses said, the Lord is the God of Abraham and his seed; and Christ said this showed that Abraham and his seed will be raised from the dead. Then Christ did not claim a resurrection for any but Abraham and his seed. He excluded all others from it when he limited the resurrection to such as are worthy of it. The subject of the resurrection, as explained by Christ to the Sadducees, stands thus: God is the God of Abraham and his seed, whether they are dead or alive, because they are worthy; and because he is their God they will be raised from the dead. But God is not the God of the wicked, whether they are dead or alive, for they are not worthy, and because he is not their God they will not be raised from the dead.

The dead, then, will be judged, while they are dead, that those found worthy may be raised up at the last day. But they will not be judged that the wicked may, in any way, be punished again. Therefore the penalty of the law, "thou shalt surely die," is, to the wicked, final.

In our examination of this subject, we have found that the penalty of the law given to Adam; the first punishment of the wicked under the gospel; the general tenor of the Bible on the subject; the positive testimony that the wicked dead shall not live; the implied testimony, by contrast, that those who are not found worthy to live will not be made alive; and, in the judgment of the dead, that those only who are found worthy, will be raised up at the last day, are all in complete harmony—no shadow of discrepancy. The basis of this agreement is the penalty of the law. Thou shalt surely die.

I will conclude this subject in my next, by answering a few objections.

GRAND RAPIDS, Nov., 1870.

AN eminent judge of Virginia once said to a friend, that the most cutting reproof he had ever received for profaneness, was without words. He happened to be crossing a ferry with Dr. John H. Rice. On account of shallows, the boat could not be brought to land, and they were carried to the shore by the black ferryman. One of these was so careless as to suffer Judge H.'s clothes to become wetted, and the latter expressed his anger by an imprecation. Dr. Rice, without saying a word, turned to him his large sparkling eyes, with sorrowful expression. "I never so felt a reproof," said the judge, "in my life; and instantly begged his pardon. 'Ask pardon of God,' said Dr. Rice. I shall never forget it." At this time Judge H. was entirely ignorant who his reprover was.

A HIDDEN light soon becomes dim, and if it be entirely covered up, will expire for want of air. So it is with hidden religion. It must go out. There cannot be a Christian whose light in some respects does not shine.

HUMILITY is the low but broad and deep foundation of every virtue.

THE EDITOR'S HEALTH.

WE had hoped to be able at this time to announce to the many friends of the Editor the cheering news of a decided improvement in his health. As it is, we scarcely know whether to say he is better. In some respects he seems better, his physician having succeeded in partially removing a cough with which he has from the beginning of his illness been afflicted, and which has at times been extremely painful and, of course, debilitating. Without appetite, and having a distaste for almost everything in the way of nourishment, vitality was rapidly reduced. Hope, however, is now entertained that he may soon be able to take sufficient nourishment to check and finally arrest downward tendency.

Although his condition is still critical, little if any, less so than it was last week, we yet think there is reason to expect he may succeed, partially at least, in regaining his wonted strength.

So clear in mind, so strong in faith, so tender and thoughtful of others, the fire of love burning with increasing brightness, he is a bright example of that blessed spiritual condition which they only can experience who have lived very near to God.

CHRISTIAN LOVE.

"And now abideth faith, hope, charity, these three; but the greatest of these is charity."—1 Cor. xiii. 13.

IN all the ministrations of Paul we find the same unswerving devotion to his work of inculcating practical godliness with sound doctrine. In the epistle from which the text is taken, he labors to impress upon the mind of his brethren at Corinth the necessity of cultivating love to each other and to their fellows. So important, nay indispensable does he deem this, that he exclaims, "though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal. And though I have the gift of prophecy, and understand all mysteries and all knowledge; and though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains, and have not charity, I am nothing."

Thus we find, if, indeed, we need any thing outside of individual experience to teach us, that without this charity, this love, we cannot be profitable servants of God; we cannot be faithful disciples of Jesus. We may with all diligence, study the word and, by united efforts of ourselves and others, secure as thorough an understanding of the plans and purposes of God as any are blessed with, and yet, wanting this love we are incompetent to instruct in the mysteries of godliness; and although the Lord may bless our efforts, for the truth's sake, we shall fail to secure any blessing. But possessing this love we can be faithful stewards. We can be patient amid adversities, and forgiving amid persecutions. We can overlook the ignorance, errors, and short-comings of the children of God, and purge ourselves of all malice. Though others possess gifts superior to ours, and appear to labor more abundantly, we do not envy them, but feel the more to praise God that He has raised up such instruments to spread the truth. The possession of this love will preclude vaunting, and secure us against the growth of any undue desire to receive the applause of men. Knowing that it is not we who work, but God who worketh in us, we shall not be puffed up with thoughts of our own importance, fancying ourselves better than others, or entitled to more privileges than they. If this love abound in us, we shall be preserved from acts or expressions unbecoming our high profession. This is important indeed. A rich indwelling of this love will enable us to bring all our labors, every item of effort in behalf of Jesus and the truth, up to a very high grade of advancement toward Christian perfection. It will make us so gentle in all our dealings not only with our fellow Christians but with all men, so tender and thoughtful of their feelings and interests, forbearing their prejudices, that they will be drawn toward us with hearts mellowed for the reception of truth. The truth will thus be recommended by us with thousand fold greater effect than any words can do, for without this love and its precious fruits, words are but as "sounding brass, or a tinkling cymbal."

It may be asked, how can charity, or love, be greater than faith, since without faith it is impossible to please God? Or, how can it be greater than hope, since it is written, "we are saved by hope?" The three, faith, hope, charity, are indispensable. They are the essential elements that make up the perfect Christian; and without them there can be no such thing as religion. "He that cometh to God must believe that He is, and that He is the rewarder of them that diligently seek Him." This is the work of faith, and without it, there is no belief in God. Without it, we cannot receive the gospel nor be made partakers of the saving grace of our Lord Jesus Christ. By it we obtain a view of incorruptibility; never-fading glory; apprehend spiritual blessings, and walk with God. Hope is the offspring of faith and is sustained by it. "Hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it." Hope buoys us up in the midst of the many trials of this life of labor and preparation for the future life. It is the beacon-light in all our pilgrim wanderings, and points us to eternal blessedness. Great as are faith and hope, charity, or love, is greater. It is written, "Love is the fulfilling of the law." By giving evidence of its possession we show forth the excellencies and virtues of the grace of God which we have received by faith; magnify the Spirit, exalt Jesus, and glorify God. By faith and grace we receive a knowledge of the purchased possessions; by hope we expect to inherit them; but love sends us out into the world, sparing no effort and witholding no sacrifice that may tend to swell the number of Christ's redeemed.

Would that this charity might more abound in the hearts of professing Christians. Then would there be less casting out of names as evil because others differ with us on points of doctrine. Not only would there be less false accusations, and less willingness to believe evil report, but as "charity never faileth," when any depart from the path of rectitude and thus fall into suffering, we shall rejoice in the remembrance and consideration of everything that may tend to their advantage, and refrain from making their errors the subject of undue censure, while hope, borne upon the wings of love, will come to our assistance and bid us expect better things. If we are Christ's we are bought with a price, and are not our own. We have, therefore, no right to lull ourselves with the delusive assurance that we have no need to further prosecute our search for gospel truths. It is our duty to obtain all the knowledge of them we can, not expecting to receive immediately from God that which he has promised to convey only by the use of means.

Says Paul, "We know in part, and we prophecy in part. But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away . . . For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known." How presumptuous, then, for any to suppose they know all the truth, or to make any pretensions to an approach to infallibility. Vainly shall we assert that prejudice does not affect our minds in forming judgment upon many points. Futile, too, will be our efforts to wholly cast aside our preconceived opinions. As well might we attempt to obliterate memory itself and commence anew. There are truths which, if we ever learn at all, we shall learn despite our preconceived opinions. Hence the necessity that we strive to overcome, instead of being enslaved by them. Love will enable us to accomplish this. Love will help us to become so faithful, consistent, and true that we shall challenge the admiration of even ungodly men. They will say of us as of a people formerly, "How they love one another."

How vast, how mighty is the power of this love. Who can describe it, who can measure its influence? Yielding to its workings, it fills our whole being. We become more willing to bear with others, and share the sorrows, afflictions, and privations of them that are tried. That stern, uncompromising monarch, self, is dethroned and swallowed up in the current of love to God and to our fellowmen. May we experience more and more of the sanctifying power of love, and may our whole intercourse with the world and with each other be gilded by its lustre.

IT is now thought by not a few that Paris is that great city whose destruction is so graphically described in the eighteenth chapter of Rev. It is claimed there is no other existing city which answers the description for greatness in those respects particularly spoken of. As to unparalleled importance and greatness, it seems Parisians take the same view. It is asserted that a private letter from Paris, by balloon, says it is not Paris that is blockaded, but "the rest of the world." Then if Paris is destroyed the most important part of the world will be in ruins. A great city truly!

EUROPEAN AFFAIRS.

THERE is little of a startling character to chronicle since our last. The action of Russia respecting an abrogation of the treaty of 1856 has produced a deep feeling of uneasiness among the "crowned heads," some of the monarchs being made to sit rather uncomfortably upon their thrones.

The general shaking and trembling in western Europe during the past three months seems to have shaken Spain into comparative quiet. Her vacant throne is about to be filled. Prince Amadeus, of Italy, has been elected King of that tumultuous realm, and the committee appointed by the Cortes to present to him the crown has set out for Italy on that mission. The young Prince is launching his bark upon troubled waters. But whatever trials may await him and although they may end in death, he will be King for a time and that fact will amply compensate for all; so strong a thing is human ambition.

England is declared to be again seeking to bring about peace-negotiations between France and Prussia by reviving the armistice movement, but her own people are, the while, becoming deeply imbued with war feeling toward Russia. "Russia has broken faith!" exclaims England. "She threatens to break up the arrangement of 1856." In view of the fact that that treaty, so humiliating to Russia and destructive to her marine power, was signed by her when she had been overpowered by the combined strength of the allied western powers, that it was forced upon her, it is not at all strange, now France is prostrate, Italy not wholly reconstructed, Austria still staggering under the blow received in the war with Prussia, and Turkey still very "sick," that she should embrace the favorable opportunity to slip her neck from under the hated yoke. Had England been the humiliated party she would have done the same thing the first moment she thought it a safe undertaking. It is not improbable she may vigorously renew her efforts for peace between France and Prussia, hoping thus to relieve herself from the threatened necessity of either meekly yielding to the demand of Russia or meet that power single handed. Should she resort to war and obtain the aid of Italy, Austria, and Turkey she would still be, in one important respect, alone, for all those powers must in such an event look to England for funds. France, relieved from her engagement with Prussia, would be the strongest ally England could secure in any enterprise against Russia. It is not unlikely that King William, with the Czar at his back on this new question, may defy England and all her overtures on behalf of France.

In the mean time France does not seem to have been able to follow up the advantage gained a few days since. Much was expected from the contemplated second blow by Gen. Paladine. This however has been given but failed to effect any thing; in fact it was a defeat. How about Paris? Can it afford to wait? It is said that Trochu has been for some weeks past feeding the Parisians largely with horse flesh. If this be so, not only must it effect a rapid reduction of horses, but those required for army use, half starved, as they must be, can hardly much longer remain able to meet the requirements of those rapid artillery movements necessary to a sortie. As to the future of Europe, there is no knowing what a day may bring forth. One week hence the nations may be engaged in a general struggle, or they may by general consent be working to patch up a peace; so unsettled and uncertain is everything. All, however, depends upon what are the Lord's immediate designs respecting those nations. Let us calmly await developments.

DIVINE LIFE.

THE following article is taken from an old No. of the "American Presbyterian" editorial. It cannot fail to benefit all who accord it careful perusal. Our beloved Editor, now prostrated by disease, once said of it: "However sound any of us may be in our religious theory, life, spiritual, future, and eternal, can only be ours by that divine life dwelling in us of which the "American Presbyterian" speaks."

L. C. T.

"This is a sad and care-worn world, and one great reason why it is so, is that the right plan for enjoyment is not understood or followed. Rejoicing, in Scripture, is connected with reviving, and it is remarkable that in one well-known passage, the Hebrew connects the Divine returning to make us alive again, with rejoicing. The true sense of the words is often preserved in their etymology. If we analyze the word revival, we will find that it means, making alive again.

Nature abhors death. Wherever there is life there is joy. Our unhappiness springs from the absence of life. Infants are spontaneously happy, their fulness of life is fulness of joy. We would not repress the impulsive happiness of youth, rather we would teach the possibility and the obligation of being happy. The joy of the Lord is your strength. Christians have no right to be dull and stupid. They have no right to extinguish all brightness and enjoyment in themselves, and then set up that dulness in themselves as the standard of excellence. This is not the teaching of Scripture.

We think it certain that men are not very generally happy. It may be said, that all persons cannot secure the animal spirits on which physical happiness so much depends. To which we reply, that while we are not opposing, we are not advocating animal happiness.

We think men miss enjoyment by not seeking for it in the right way. Heaven is a place of happiness. "In thy presence is fulness of joy, and at thy right hand there are pleasures for ever more." God is the Fountain of Being, the infinite and glorious One, an illimitable ocean of sparkling joy. As light, wherever it strikes the waves, in the pale flush of morn, the brightness of noon, or the richness of evening, elicits beauty, so does every movement of the Infinite Ocean, from its centre to its endless out-goings, produce enjoyment. It is life, rejoicing in its own spontaneous outbursts.

But we have no essential life, and so no essential bliss. It follows that to enjoy, we must be connected with the source of joy. From the overflowing grace of God we must receive grace for grace. We must draw near

The shadow from the Throne—
The shadow without form, that meets
The edges of the crystal sea—
Awfuller than light derived,
And red with all those primal heats
Whereby all life hath lived.

The life of Christ is the life of the human soul. This is the central doctrine in theology. If any one asks how, we reply by asking him the nature of life. It is the mystery of mysteries. Look at family likenesses, national likenesses, and explain that mysterious conformity of being, by which the same traits of mind and heart, and the same features and form re-appear after many generations; explain the difference between the Arab and the Anglo-Saxon, the wild Indian and the domestic negro. The life of the parent, the ancestor, passes into the children, and this is all we know.

So it is with the life of Christ. It is not alone that our opinions become the same as His, or our tastes or feelings. It is not alone that there is mutual affection. All these things may exist between friends in this world, but that is not the same as being of the blood of your father and brother. Every one knows it is not. The closest relation that can be formed by those not of the same blood, is that between husband and wife, but even the murder of a wife by a husband, is not the fearful thing beyond words that the murder of a mother by her son would be. A gentleman told us that he once, when a boy, knew a German who struck his father a blow which felled him to the earth. Our informant told us that he always had a mysterious feeling about the man, that in some way, he would awfully expiate that sin. Many years passed away, the gentleman grew from a boy to middle life, when he heard that in the same town, that German was murdered by his own son.

Men may say what they will of the language of Paul being figurative, but there never were such figures as he uses to express the life of Christ in the soul of the believer. We are members of his body, of his flesh and of his bones. The apostle says it is a great mystery; the Saviour's life pervades our life; nay, we exchange lives. Our life is hid with Christ in God, and he is our life.

To be joyful then, we must feel the life of Christ quick in every vein. As it is with great nature in the Spring when the impulse of life comes, and the sap runs in every twig, and along the fine fibre of every blade of grass, and the power quickens every vein of the earth, and the world becomes a bright and joyous thing as a bride adorned for her husband; so is it with the felt presence of the Redeemer, the conscious life of Christ in the soul, the pressure of the everlasting arms, and the soft beam of the celestial eyes. We commit two great evils, we forsake the fountain of living water, and we hew out for ourselves broken cisterns that can hold no water. And then we complain of sorrow, and carking care, and of want of sympathy and help. It is because we are withering on the stalk, and have forgotten the power of the Living Vine.

There is no religion long where the doctrine of the immediate, direct influence of the Holy Spirit in regeneration and sanctification, is given up. Any one who has really and earnestly striven to do good will find this to be true. This is the dispensation of the Spirit. All the efforts of science from the beginning of the world, have failed to put life into a dead insect. How then put life into a dead soul? And how can we rejoice with dead souls all around us?—very many in the open valley; and very dry? We cannot; the Church cannot be happy, unless the Spirit of God, the sweet and holy Dove, the powerful Heart of the Almighty pulsate through these dry bones, these fearful and ghastly skeletons. But when there is a shaking, and bone comes to his bone, and the sinews and the flesh come upon them, and the skin covers them, and the breath comes from the four winds and they live—an exceeding great army—the presence of life brings joy. Let us understand and settle it in our hearts, that we cannot be happy or even comfortable without the felt, conscious, living presence, of the Holy Spirit in our churches.

The fact is, that the virtue which keeps even from open and disgusting wickedness, springs from the influence of religion, directly or indirectly. If the salt hath lost its savor, wherewith shall the world be salted? The Scriptures rely entirely upon the life of God, through the Church, for mortality. They do not expect it elsewhere and we should not. Earth is but a province of God's empire.

The forms of religion are of no value, except for the greater or less amount of spiritual life which they enshrine. See Saul; the Lord answered him not by prophets, nor by visions, nor by dreams, nor by Urim and Thummim. What is a church, if there be no God there. What is your house, when the beloved ones are gone? Very sad and lonesome, even when they are gone temporarily; and when they are gone forever, you can hardly bear the most familiar book, can hardly bear to look at the empty chair. Hophni and Phinehas took out the ark of God to save Israel, and the Philistines took it. It was an empty shrine. Every thing, it is true, has an appropriate expression, and so should a church have. It should be fit—however rude—in its grave decency, for the Eternal. "But is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment?" If the life of God pervade His house, then the place of His feet is glorious, and our faces shine and our hearts are transfigured. But otherwise religious worship is the most wearisome of all things. Dead form, God cannot away with, nor can a live man either. It is a smoke in his nostrils, an offence unto him.

God will give us any power, if we lean on His arm. See the living might in the arms of Moses, with Aaron and Hur on each side. The battle swayed to and fro as the arms of the great patriarch rose and fell in prayer. See Joshua with his spear outstretched to heaven. The infidel astronomer asks how the sun could stand still in heaven. How do we know? God started it and He can stop it if He chooses. We care not how. God gave Joshua power to stay the sun in his steep course. And Gideon's three hundred were greater than the three hundred of Leonidas, glorious as they were, for if Gideon's had been there, with Gideon's God, Xerxes and his millions would have recoiled backward and perished. If you doubt it, look at Sennacherib and his one hundred and eighty-five thousand. "This is the word which the Lord hath spoken concerning him; The Virgin, the daughter of Zion hath despised thee, and laughed thee to scorn."

When the spiritual powar of God comes upon a place, the greatest blessing in given to it that is possible. It may not be always pleasant at first. Light in a dark cavern reveals foul reptiles; the eradicating of rank weeds, however necessary, is not agreeable. Conviction, repentance, sorrow for sin, mourning over past unfaithfulness,—these are the dark avenues to the bright light.

Then it is true, that there is something frightful about the deeper things of the soul; there are depths in man's nature that it is fearful to sound; else he were not great. The topics of religion are so mighty that, when realized, they disturb our equanimity. They even sometimes lead to enthusiasm and even fanaticism. No wonder. It is not so surprising that a man should be an enthusiast, about religion, as that he should be stupid about it.

But who would set the small disturbance of his love of proportion over against so glorious blessings! Revivals of religion in the present condition of the world, are often revolutions. But the Reformation, and Revolutions of 1688 and 1776, were the very salvation of the world. That there may be quiet; that there may be enjoyment, the principles of liberty and right must be settled, even if it be "in battle and in storm." Better that the storm burst in wrath in mid heaven, that the air may be pure; the close and stifling atmosphere cannot be breathed, until Nature relieves herself by tears.

The presence of God is the Glory of the Church, and God's reviving is necessary to a rejoicing people.

TEACHING INFANTS TO DANCE.

BY A MOTHER.

I DO not say of this as is so often said of many of the glaring evils of the day, that it is one of the signs of the times; but practiced as it is and has been for years by many professedly Christian parents, I am of the opinion that it has contributed largely to bring about that sad condition of society which does constitute one of the signs of the times. It is urged in extenuation of the practice of instructing children in dancing, that it makes them graceful, that it is good exercise, and that there can be no harm in small companies of children amusing themselves, under the eyes of their parents, in this manner. Moreover, nearly all the youths of their acquaintance are instructed in the, so-called, art, and it would be depriving their children of much pleasure not to allow them to learn how to dance with others.

This sort of reasoning may be considered of sufficient depth and force to satisfy some Christian parents, but generally those only who do not stop to closely examine the subject. I cannot help feeling that if a thing is wrong for a Christian parent to do, it is certainly no less wrong to teach their children to do it. Graceful, indeed! Does it encourage the development of that kind of gracefulness which pleases the Master? I would tenderly urge upon professing Christians the necessity of properly appreciating the sacredness of the trust reposed in them by our heavenly Father as guardians, next to Him, of these little ones committed to their care. Impressions made on youthful, tender minds are often never effaced. Habits then formed often cling through life. There are few that have not realized how hard it is to disabuse a mature mind of the prejudice imbibed against certain views or things during early years. Then how earnestly, with prayer and loving watchfulness, should we seek to guide them in the strait and narrow way that leads to eternal life. How careful not to teach them any thing that will interfere with their spiritual growth. We frequently see notices of children's parties. We read how extravagantly they are arrayed; their names even given in connection with elaborate descriptions of their jewels and apparel, of the costly refreshments served, and how their tiny feet kept time to expensive music, until many hours after they ought to have been snugly tucked away in their little beds, with prayers for their protection.

When years pass by, fathers and mothers cannot hope to be always acquainted with the whereabouts of their children, and the occupations that engage their leisure hours. They must sometime leave home and begin for themselves the battle of life. Happy for them then if parental care has trained and sharpened their moral perceptions, and planted in them the seed that will be likely to spring up into religious life. Happy, if they have been led to heed the admonition to remember their Creator while their evil days came not, so that when tried, they are found to have strength of principle to withstand the many temptations so plausibly presented to their inexperienced minds. How often, at the dancing party, are stimulating concoctions offered? How short the step from this to other and worse excitements! Sad is it to see trusting children taught that which may lead them into divers temptations; that which, so soon as they recognize the aim and end of life, must be put away as more or less injurious and, perhaps, positively sinful. Will not parents think seriously on this subject? Think whether in thus instructing their children they are not also placing a stumbling block in the way of others? I would that we should try so to live and train our precious children that when the momentous question is asked, Where are the lambs committed to thy care? we can be ready with the triumphant answer of Jesus: "Those that thou gavest me I have kept and none are lost."

The Demand for Peace.

BY W. S CAMPBELL.

The peace movement failed, and Prussia would grant no armistice that France could accept. Still, it would appear to us that the French should have accepted the cessation of hostilities for 25 days on almost any terms, after the surrender of Metz. And now that the last fortified town, in the territory that the Germans will claim, is fallen, what is to prevent the possession of the territo y of Alsace and Lorraine by the invading enemy? It would seem again, that the Prussian Princes could not have objected, with any show of right, even if it were good policy to refuse, the revictualing of Paris. Yet he refused; and the French provisional government refused with scorn, the humiliating terms of the conquering foe.

It is very late in the day to look for a permanent and satisfactory peace for the benefit of France, she having become the subject of a chastisement that she so richly deserved, and which seems, at the same time, to be foretold. She has been stained the blood of the saints, aye drunken, and Jehovah says, "Give her blood to drink." But it must now be the blood of her own subjects, who cannot escape. The good offices of other powers failed, and they are now trying again, with Russia in the lead, England, Austria and Italy to join. Will the belligerents listen? Alexander is a man of peace; and he has succeeded in localizing the war, keeping it on French territory, but how has he done it? by the war threat; and only by that. He says peace. Peace for himself, peace for Europe, if he can have it, and let old King William fight France, if he must.

Before Alexander reached home from Ems, after his long conference with King William, who is his uncle, it was so clear that France would declare war on some pretext, (The Hohenzollern candidacy was plausible.) he said "For God's sake, if possible, have peace"—and still he cries, Peace. But all know that Prussia only bides her time to take possession of the Dardenelles which, of course, includes Constantinople, either by arms or diplomacy.

Now the four great neutral powers say "peace" again, but the time and the whole plan of events say "wake up the mighty men, let all the men of war draw near." So the word says. Alexander is one of these powers, and he said to Austria, after his secret treaty with Prussia, in which he agreed to pour down his hordes of Cossacks to the rescue, if France should get the better of Prussia in the fight. "You send one regiment across the Rhine and I will send two. You adopt the cause of France, and I will adopt the cause of Prussia." That is the way he keeps the peace. That is the way he keeps Austria from joining with her Catholic sisters in her hour of trial and death,—in her struggle against the Protestant conqueror.

So the peace is only enforced, and hence, may not last long, for the spirit of the people is for war.

From the word of God, and from the present out-look the prospect is not very brilliant for peace.

Non-Resistance and Trust in God.

Captain S——, of W——, Massachusetts, relates, that on a voyage to Brazil, in the spring of 1833, while sailing near Cape St. Roque, he descried, one morning, in the distance, a suspicious looking vessel, under a press of canvass, standing toward him. From several circumstances, he was led to imagine that she was occupied by pirates, who were advancing to plunder and murder. Still, not being certain of the fact, he concluded to keep the vessel on her course. The suspicious schooner continued to gain upon him, and soon, by the help of the glass, he saw her deck covered with men, and a long eighteen-pounder on a swivel, so prepared as to turn in any direction desired. She was evidently a faster sailor than his own vessel; he concluded, therefore, that if he turned out of his course, he would at length be overtaken and from the pirates, excited and exasperated by a long chase, little mercy could be expected.

The captain was a professed Christian, a strong believer in the providence of God, and emphatically a man of peace. Instead of fighting with carnal weapons, he determined to fight with spiritual ones. Having religious tracts on board, he determined, as soon as the schooner came alongside, to go on board, and present his tracts to the captain and crew, and preach to them in a bold but affectionate manner, appropriate truths from the Gospel of Christ. He ordered all the hands to go down below, but the man at the helm. This he did partly to keep them from being agitated and from agitating his own mind, and partly to do away with all appearances of opposition against the approaching foe. Then, committing his men and himself to God, he patiently awaited the pirate's arrival. The schooner came nearer and nearer, till at length even the figures of the men could be distinctly seen by the naked eye. A fearful crisis was fast coming. But still the captain never shrunk nor veered from his course for a moment. Suddenly the pirates altered their course, hauled the vessel upon the wind, and stood away as rapidly as sail and surge could carry them.

From the fact that they saw no men on board but Capt. S. and the helmsman, and no manifestations of fear, the pirates might have been led to suspect that there was a large armed force below, or some other decoy prepared; and thus concluded it dangerous to attempt their hostile design. Whatever process of thought it was, however, which led them to retreat, who will fail to recognize in that process an overruling Providence, protecting in this instance, as in many others, the man who resists not evil, but in the hour of threatened violence depends not on his own arm, but on God's?—Selected.

Letters and Extracts.

From Jacob Grim.

To the Friends of the Herald of Life: I have just returned from a visit to our dear Br. Storrs. I found him confined to his bed, and very weak indeed. His disease seems to be bronchial affection, the result of a heavy cold. He has suffered considerable from his cough, in consequence of which he has lost much rest. When we saw him on Tuesday, he seemed to be somewhat easier, and his cough not so distressing. His recovery must necessarily be slow, and friends cannot expect any thing from him for some time.

We also visited our Assistant Editor, Br. L. C. Thorne, and found him not so well or strong as we could wish, from the fact that he has been over-taxing himself with the labors of getting out the paper. Now we cannot afford to have them both sick, and thus be deprived of their labors, so we recommend the dropping of every other number of the paper for the present, and let us have it semi-monthly until there is some change in the "Editor's" health. I hope the friends will recommend the same thing, and thereby give Br. Thorne an opportunity to husband his strength. He has his own business to attend to, in consequence of which he must devote a considerable portion of the night to correcting and preparing manuscript. But he does not complain.

This is my own voluntary suggestion, and I hope the friends will see its propriety.

Philadelphia, Pa., Nov., 1870.

From M. M. Weaver.

Dear Pilgrims: It cheers my heart to read the communications that come from those of like precious faith. The Herald is a blessed medium for us to comfort each other through. If only a few simple words are read from the scattered ones, all taken together make a rich feast. There are some things in the Herald that I do not understand, but there is always something for the weakest ones. Am glad the children have a corner to themselves, and often wonder that Br. F. H. Burbank does not write some of his missionary experience for their benefit.

We have none of like faith in this place. Some are reading our tracts. Hope they may see light.

Will it not be blessed to get into a sinless, painless, tearless, deathless world, where we can rest in peace, free from care or fear? O how glad I am for every sign that speaks Messiah near. That he may come and take his throne and kingdom, is my prayer. I long for a home where evil is unknown; where friends never forsake nor foes annoy; where hearts are all pure, and free from deceit and envy. We often suffer here by the tongue of slander, by deceitful minds, but there the people will all be holy. And then to think of the bright glow of immortality that shall light up every face in all the countless multitude of the redeemed, and the thought inspires me with eagerness to behold them.

Sometimes I think of the poor, emaciated, faded forms that we see here, and then think of the "change" that will one day pass over them, in a moment made young and fair, and healthful. O suffering ones, have courage. By and by these lungs will ache, and heave, and bleed no more. One breath of Eden's atmosphere will make them eternally well; one touch of immortality will cure all our maladies.

The hope of life for the dead surpasses everything. We have faith to believe the saints shall be raised to life, though their dust may be blown through the whole universe. One promise of Jehovah is sufficient. He can find them without "entities" to assist Him. He had no "entity" nor "identity" to help make man in the beginning. It is mockery to preach such a doctrine. God can do his own work without our help. Let us be careful how we handle God's word.

Wendell Depot, Mass., Nov., 1870.

From Polly G. Pitts.

Br. Storrs; I again take my pen to write a few lines to let you and God's precious ones know that I am alive and trusting in our great Life-giver, our rock of safety on which my feet were set by sovereign grace. My health is poor, and I am feeble; and as mind suffers with the body, for all is mortal, I can adopt the language of the sweet singer of Israel. "O why am I cast down? and why am I disquieted within myself? hope in God, for I shall yet praise Him who is the health of my countenance, and my God." Sometimes I feel like David when he said, "There is but a step between me and death." I hope that I may never die, but only pass the change that is wrought in the twinkling of an eye, in a moment, at the last trump; that I shall behold the King in his beauty, and be like him, without sleeping in the cold, cold grave. Well be that as it shall please him. I will bless his holy name for his word, and for putting it into the hearts of his children to send out the Herald of Life as a messenger of mercy whereby we can comfort one another. O how much good it has done me.

Taking up yesterday a number of the Herald, I read the article, Divine Love—A Meditation—written by Dr. William Leask, editor of the Rainbow; England. His meditation on God's word comforted my heart, and I said it must be the one divine Spirit that made us feel just alike. He says: O my soul, take and eat these precious words! Blessed be my God and Father in Christ for such gentle oracles! How they comfort me under cares, and sustain me amid trials, and lovingly smile upon me through the frowns of brethren! The Lord knoweth, and I adore him for causing these words to be written. Again he said: "Am I conscious of utter unworthiness? Yes; but my answer to the self-accusation is, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain!" Do I deserve nothing at the hands of the Lord? He who gave himself for me deserves every thing that is good, and great, and glorious. Have I promised much, and performed nothing? "I will cry unto God Most High, unto God who performeth all things for me." O I bless God for such a testimony as Br. Leask's. Like him I can say: "When I look at myself, I am undone; a sense of weakness, ignorance, and folly comes over me, which makes me envy the anchorite, and wish for a 'glen in some lone wilderness' far from 'the strife of tongues,' the fury of maddening nations bent on mutual extermination, and the humiliating spectacle of a church rent into fragments; but when I look at the Lord and think what he did, and said, and suffered, and ask the meaning of it all, I am ashamed of my cowardice, and feel determined to hold on to the end under the leadership and in the strength of the glorious Captain of Salvation." Yes, bless the Lord. Hold on brother Leask. Is it not written in the word of God's eternal truth, "The righteous shall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands, shall wax stronger and stronger?" A few lines come into my mind, that were written by a late writer on the millenium. They are ascribed to the devil, as saying to his angels, when he sent them forth to oppose the everlasting gospel. He says:

"But there are some—as there has always been,
And still will be, to end of time—who, bold
And energetic; zealous, fully clad
In sacred vestments from above, and arm'd
Complete in panoply, long since approved,
Such as Messiah furnishes, from the Great armory of truth, which ancient seers
And patriarchs put on;—and there will be some
Of this invulnerable set, who will
Despise the sickening flattery of man,
And labor only that they stand approv'd
Of Him that sent them forth to preach the word.
Such men as these, engaged with all the heart
And all the soul, will prove inflexible,
And ne'er can we expect to turn their feet
From the highway of truth. The world, with all
Its baits, can ne'er allure, nor dangers fright
Them from the course, marked out in sacred writ,
For those that preach the word. No love of gain
Impels them to the work. The naked truth
Is all that they declare. No fear of man
Diverts them from their course. Their faces, like
A flint are set heavenward. Their only trust
Is in the living God. These we can ne'er
Annoy; but still we may traduce, revile,
Defame, asperse, and every means employ,
To render them obnoxious to the world."

O I do bless God that He has raised up so many of this "invulnerable set," that can ne'er be turned from the highway of truth; and that no love of gain impels them to the work. O may God abundantly bless brother Leask, with all the rest of His precious ones, and make them the light of the world, and the salt of the earth. O let us labor on, and in patience possess our souls. Only think, "A little while" yes a little while and he that is come will come, and will not tarry. And what then? The glorious resurrection to immortality, the marriage supper of the Lamb, the wedding garments, the crown of life, the great "Alleluia, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth." Then the glory of God, like a boundless sea, will bathe the immortal company. O will not God then have set the world (or earth) upright? When there shall be no frozen ocean, no darkness at the poles, no chilling winds, no nipping frosts; but one eternal spring shall bless the earth. Soon the glorious restitution, when Jesus shall reign from the river to the ends of the earth; when Jerusalem shall be the throne of glory, and all the mountains round about Jerusalem shall be clothed with the excellent fruits of the earth, for God will make the place of His feet glorious.

Yes, every foot of the habitable earth shall become like the garden of Eden. Joy and gladness shall be found in it; thanksgiving and the voice of melody. When meditating on the future glory, the language of my heart is "Thanks be to God for His unspeakable gift." The contemplation of these things, makes this life pleasant. I know that we often call it bitter, but looking back over my long life, almost seventy-six years, I feel that it has been almost filled up with Ebenezers, and way-marks to the kingdom. O the long-suffering, and goodness of God to usward! Surely "God is love." Bless the Lord forever, and let all holy beings say, "Amen." And now I will say in conclusion, hold on brethren to the arm of the Lord, and never let go. It is reviving to think that God is training us for service in the "Age to Come." To those that preach the word, I would say as another hath said,

"Be thou like the great apostle,
Be thou like heroic Paul;
If a free thought seeks expression,
Speak it boldly—speak it all!
Face thine enemies—accusers;
Scorn the prison, rack or rod;
And if thou hast truth to utter,
Preach! and leave the rest to God.

Your sister looking at the signs of the times, and watching, and waiting the coming of our Life-giver.

Fredericksburg, Iowa, Nov. 6, 1870.

From Eld. W. S. Campbell.

Br. Thorne: It is Sabbath evening. I have not only been unable to preach to-day, but unable to attend service at the house of God. I become by this deprivation somewhat depressed, and exceedingly hungry for the enjoyment of the sanctuary—the feast of truth.

While sitting here with Mrs. C., and dwelling on the cause in which Br. Storrs and myself have been associated for almost thirty years, its past history and present prospects, we had a degree of sorrow and sadness, which was relieved by the consideration that we had been enabled to pass through the many severe trials of our lot and effect something for the Master, whose work we hope has been our joy and delight—while we have been subjected to tribulation, perils, disappointments, and sometimes persecution.

My health is slowly mending, but my lameness is very severe. The physician whom I employed in Meriden thinks I will do well, if I go without a crutch in six months. I long for freedom from this mortal state; for resurrection and immortality. I go limping around with my crutch in the door-yard, and a little on the sidewalk (for I must use the crutch), stepping into a neighbor's, possibly, but I cannot go far from the house. I am very sure that I am now an invalid—a cripple. It is humiliating, but I must bear it. I will try to be patient.

I am greatly afflicted by the sickness of our dear Br. Storrs. Gladly did we read, in the Herald, that his symptoms favored a recovery. May the Great Head of the Church restore him to strength, and preserve him many years, if time lasts, strong and active, as heretofore, for the work.

My hand is still so lame that I cannot labor if I could get abroad.

New Britain, Nov., 1870.

From Janett A. Mayo.

Br. Storrs: Some five or six years ago I learned the name of a man, in the Province of New Brunswick, who was always contending with his minister and others against eternal torment. I immediately sent him some of your works, but, not hearing from them for so long a time, lost his address, and finally forgot the circumstance. Last week I saw a man direct from the place, and he told me the effect of the works upon the mind of the inquirer. He told this man that a person, unknown to him, sent him some reading which had proved a great blessing to him. It had given him an understanding of Scripture, before dark to his mind, and he had received light, such as he had never before had, and wished he could have more such reading. I send you money to furnish him with the Herald of Life for six months, and a package of Campaign Documents, such as you think suitable. I hope he will report himself through the Herald.

I feel an interest in our camp-meeting, but am situated so that the most I can do is to pray that the cloud may move forward from Marah to Elem, where there are fountains of water, and three-score and ten palm trees. I pray God to be with his people. I am interested in the different views of our brethren on the age to come. I have heard it said that there would be a split among us on that subject. This I cannot believe. All can give their views with kind words, as they have a right to do, in our paper. We all have a stand-point from which we see things, and we cannot help believing as we see. We can differ and still love as brethren and sisters of one family. I confess I do not expect the next event to be the return of our Life-giver. We are told in the Word (Isai. lxii. 7), that they that make mention of the Lord keep not silence; give him no rest till he establish and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth. They shall prosper that love Jerusalem. It is the place that God has chosen for himself a dwelling place. My affections hover round the holy hill of Zion.

I rejoice that Jesus has the keys of the house of David, as well as of death and the grave. I believe that all things written in the Prophets that have not been fulfilled must be. As to the order of events, I cannot see how any one can give them in detail. But of this I am sure, the plans of God will work so beautifully that all His children will be suited. Yes, praise His holy name, He is Almighty and can do everything. He can "make all things work together for our good." Afflictions and trials are undoubtedly sent for our good, and to better prepare us for our inheritance. I am well pleased with the way God has led me these forty-eight years in the wilderness. May it please Him to restore you to health.

North Amherst, Mass., Nov., 1870.

From Daniel M. Miller.

Br. Storrs: I feel that I have neglected my duty in not sending in my thanks for the continuance of the Herald of Life, the best religious paper I have ever read. It shows that God is love, and is not willing that any should perish. He invites them to come te Christ and have life, and He warns them that if they do not come to Christ they will be cast into outer darkness—remain in the congregation of the dead. When our Saviour comes, with all his holy angels, he will destroy the wicked, but his people will he redeem and give them everlasting life in glory. The wicked will be destroyed because they would not forsake their evil ways, and come to Jesus that they might have life. They shall be as though they had not been.

I thank God for the article on tobacco, published in the Herald, some three years since. The brother had used it a good many years and then broke off by degrees. I gave the article a second reading, and wondered if I could not do better than that. I had a new box full of "fine cut" in my pocket. I kept it there two days without touching it, and then I put it away from me. That was three years ago last March, and I have not used any since. I feel to praise God for the blessing I have received in abstaining from the filthy weed. May we all serve God in truth and in love.

From Dr. J. F. Lee.

Br. Storrs: Last night I received the intelligence that you were sick. "Let not your heart be troubled;" you believe in God, believe also in Jesus. May the will of God, our heavenly Father, be done on earth as it is in heaven. May you realize perfect resignation and conformity to His will, and the full assurance of faith—the knowledge that all things work together for our good. "Our Father who art in heaven!" how rapturous the expression and the feelings it awakens in the hearts of His adopted children. O my brother, may the unction of the Holy Ghost pervade your heart and mind, and strengthen, establish and console you, so that you can in your sickness rejoice and claim the glorious promises of him who died for you and glorify God who spared him not, but delivered him up for us all, that He might give us all things promised. Should it please God to restore you to health, may He so illuminate you that you may labor, by the spread of divine truth, to expose the gross errors and fictions which are so fondly cherished by many sincere professors of religion.

The very mention of your sickness is enough to evoke the ardent prayers of all who love the Lord Jesus in sincerity. Mine, feeble as they are, are yours—have been for twenty-four years.

"There is a land of pure delight,
Where saints immortal reign;
Infinite day excludes the night,
And pleasures banish pain."

May we meet there.

E. Wolcott's Tracts.

Br. Eseck Wolcott wishes again to announce in the Herald that he still has a supply of tracts for free distribution. They are of the following sizes and titles: 1st. "Signs of the Times." This was taken from the "United Presbyterian" of Aug. 28, 1861, and is in substance a sermon by the retiring Moderator of the U. P. Synod of Illinois. This forms a tract of eight pages. It gives a forcible illustration, from the Scriptures, of the condition of the world immediately preceding the coming of Jesus. This tract is well adapted for distribution among Presbyterians, the views we hold being more readable to them because presented by one of their own sect. 2d. "The Kingdom and Reign of Christ." This is a single sheet, or two page tract, showing the confession of faith of Baptist "divines," presented to Charles II. A. D. 1660, and signed by forty-one Elders and Deacons. This sets forth the order of the Resurrection and locality of the kingdom of heaven, and the reign of Christ on David's throne. It should be in the hands of every Baptist. 3. "You Want an Endless Life." This little four page tract gives the plan for obtaining an endless life, an exhortation to holiness, and quotations from Scripture, showing Christian duties, and a warning to the ungodly. This is specially adapted to scattering promiscuously on boats and railroads. 4. This tract contains ten pages, and comprises the following subjects: "Scripture Searcher," No. 1, "The Coming of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ;" No. 2, "Saints Inheritance;" No. 3, "State of the Dead;" No. 4, "Kingdom of God, where Located;" No. 5, "When will the Righteous be Rewarded?" No. 6, "What shall be the end of them who obey not the Gospel?" No. 7, "Great Truths." The whole concluded with a tract of two pages, by George Storrs, entitled "Bearing the Cross." In justice to Br. Storrs, whose views may differ in some respects with those held in the foregoing, to which he is attached, we would say it was not our intention to have them connected, but probably did not sufficiently explain the matter to the printer. As Br. Wolcott's health is still too feeble for him to attend to filling orders, those wishing these tracts will please address all orders to

"Our Father."

A Jew entered a Parsee temple, and beheld the sacred fire. "What," said he to the priest, "do ye worship the fire?" "Not the fire," answered the priest; "it is to us an emblem of the sun, and of his genial heat." "Do you then worship the sun as your God?" asked the Jew. "Know ye not this luminary also is but a work of that Almighty Creator?" "We know it," replied the priest, "but the uncultivated man requires a sensible sign, in order to form a conception of the Most High. And is not the sun, the incomprehensible source of light, an image of that invisible Being who blesses and preserves all things?" The Israelite thereupon rejoined, "Do your people then distinguish the type from the original? They call the sun their God, and descending even from this to a baser object, kneel before an earthly flame. Ye amuse the outward, but blind the inward eye, and while ye hold to them the earthly, ye withdraw from them the heavenly light. 'Thou shalt not make unto thee any image or any likeness.'" "How then do you designate the Supreme Being?" asked the Parsee. "We call him Jehovah, Adonia, that is, the the Lord who is, who was, and who will be," answered the Jew. "Your appellation is grand and sublime," said the Parsee, "but it is awful!" A Christian then drew nigh and said—"We call him Father." The Pagan and the Jew looked at each other, and said, "Here is at once an image and reality; it is a word of the heart." Therefore they raised their eyes to heaven, and said with reverence and love—"Our Father!" And they took each other by the hand, and all three called one another brothers.—F. A. Krummacher.

A lady applied to the eminent philanthropist of Bristol, Richard Reynolds, on behalf of a little orphan boy. After he had given liberally, she said, "When he is old enough, I will teach him to name and thank his benefactor." "Stop," said the good man; "Thou art mistaken. We do not thank the clouds for rain. Teach him to look higher, and thank Him who giveth both the clouds and the rain."

THE WAY BY WHICH HE LED THEE.

BY W. E. B.

WHEN we reach a quiet dwelling
 On the strong, eternal hills,
And our praise to him is swelling
 Who the vast creation fills;
When the paths of prayer and duty,
 And affliction, all are trod,
And we wake and see the beauty
 Of our Saviour and our God;

With the light of resurrection,
 When our changed bodies glow,
And we gain the whole perfection
 Of the bliss begun below;
When the life that flesh obscureth
 In each radiant form shall shine,
And the joy that aye endureth
 Flashes forth in beams divine;

While we wave the palms of glory
 Through the long, eternal years,
Shall we e'er forgot the story
 Of our mortal griefs and fears?
Shall we e'er forget the sadness,
 And the clouds that hung so dim—
When our hearts are filled with gladness
 And our tears are dried by him?

Shall the memory be banished
 Of his kindness and his care,
When the wants and woes are vanished
 Which he loved to soothe and share?
All the way by which he led us,
 All the grievings which he bore;
All the patient love he taught us—
 Shall we think of them no more?

Yes, we surely shall remember
 How he quickened us from death—
How he fanned the dying ember
 With his Spirit's glowing breath;
We shall read the tender meaning
 Of the sorrows and alarms,
As we trod the desert, leaning
 On his everlasting arms.

And his rest will be the dearer
 When we think of weary ways,
And his light will seem the clearer
 As we muse on cloudy days.
Oh! 'twill be a glorious morrow
 To a dark and stormy day!
We shall recollect our sorrow,
 And the streams that pass away.

REMARKS ON 1 COR. III.

BY R. J. TURNER.

THIS chapter it seems to me, has been very much misunderstood. I have heard it quoted so frequently in connections to which it cannot have the slightest reference, that it occurred to me a consideration of it might not be unprofitable.

The Christian church were divided, and had strife and envying, (3d verse,) from the fact, that some claimed to be of Paul and some of Apollos, or in other words, some had been converted by Paul's teaching, and some by Apollos. That this is true, the fifth verse plainly shows. "Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed?"

Their trouble was that tendency in human nature which, unfortunately time hasn't rendered obsolete; namely, to think more in their shortsightedness, of the instrument used, than the great God who wielded it, or the truth they claim to have in possession. Paul shows them the absurdity of this by reasoning about ministers, and then he likens himself and Apollos to husbandmen; the one plants, the other waters, but it is God himselt who gives the increase. "Now he that planteth and he that watereth are one, and every man, (remember he is talking of ministers) shall receive his own reward according to his own labor," verse 8.

We generally understand the reward of the husbandman is the harvest he reaps, and if Paul has chosen a good simile, it means just that here. Paul and Apollos, like every true minister of the Gospel, were laboring to bring people to the knowledge of that Gospel, and cause them to believe. Those who become believers through their labors, were their harvest, and here let me say that the quality of the harvest was of infinitely more importance than the quantity, as we shall see further on.

"For we (ministers,) are laborers together with God: ye are God's husbandry, ye are God's building," verse 9. It is certain that Paul makes a distinction between the individuals comprehended in the pronoun we and those addressed as ye. There is no chance to doubt who is meant in either case, for we know that by we, he must mean Apollos and himself, for he is talking of no others, and as he was addressing a church of living beings, it is only fair to suppose he meant them when he said ye. But in this verse he changes his simile and calls the church "God's building." Of course his own character must correspond with the change of simile, and we see that it does. "According to the grace of God which is given unto me as a wise master-builder, I have laid the foundation and another (master-builder) buildeth thereon. But let every one (every master-builder) take heed how he buildeth thereupon," verse 10. If Paul is a master-builder, he is master-builder of what? There can be but one answer to the question and that is, the building spoken of in the preceding verse, which Paul declares the church to be. Then the whole matter resolves itself into this, that ministers, of which Paul and Apollos are representatives, are master-builders of the church. How do they build it? By bringing the stones into the structure. Who are the stones? Peter tells us, "If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious, to whom coming as unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men but chosen of God and precious. Ye—also, as lively stones, are built up a spiritual house, an holy priesthood to offer up spiritual sacrifices acceptable to God by Jesus Christ." So it is all plain. Christ is the first living stone, and Paul in the eleventh verse, declares him to be the foundation, and we, by coming to him become lively stones built up with him into a spiritual house.

Ministers, then, are the instruments God uses to hew the stone out of the mountain, ready for the chiselling and polishing that a Christian experience will give them. "Now if any man (master-builder) build upon this foundation gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble; every man's (master-builder's) work shall be made manifest, for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire, and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is. If any man's work abide, which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward. If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss, but he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire."

I have ever failed to see any authority for calling the gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble, here mentioned, doctrines true and false, as I have heard some declare them to be. It seems to me to be without proof.

If there is a place in the Bible where doctrines are ever called gold, silver, precious stones, wood, hay, stubble, I am ignorant of the fact. On the other hand I know that they that "spake often one to another," to whom the Lord "hearkened and heard" were to be His jewels in the day of his appearing; and we are also told that the wicked shall be stubble in that day.

Then, too, the absurdity of believing that doctrines can be burned up. Is it reasonable to suppose that such is the meaning of the words, if any man's work shall be burned he shall suffer loss?" Loss of what? Why, loss of the harvest which he supposed he had reaped. The stone he cut from the mountain is worthless. If every man "receives his own reward according to his labor," he must suffer loss when he finds his labor is futile; but such loss does not affect his own salvation, for "he himself shall be saved, yet so as by fire," and I imagine we are all saved in the same manner, as "brands snatched from the burning."

Paul in the eighteenth verse, repeats what he has already said in a different form. "Know ye not ye are God's temple?" "If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy, for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are," verse 19.

This temple must be the "spiritual house" to which Peter referred, and how many, who are professedly built into this spiritual house, defile it by their presence. They are the wood, hay and stubble that will be unable to stand the test of fire that is coming in the last day. Therefore "let no man deceive himself."

May we examine ourselves and see if we be such stones as shall stand the fire test. It seems to me, to be built on the foundation of Christ means vastly more than many are willing to admit. I am unable to see the possibility of any one's being built on Jesus, who fails to understand his great mission, and has no knowledge of that plan of redemption in which he is the attractive point. I wish we appreciated the value of truth more than we do.

HARTFORD, CONN., Nov. 1870.

THOUGHTS ON JOHN III. 18.

BY LA FAYETTE NORRIS.

"But he that believeth not is condemned already."

IN commenting on this passage of Scripture, I wish first to make some statements of what I consider self-evident truths.

1st. A person is never condemned until he is tried. 2d. A person is never pardoned until he is condemned. 3d. A person is never tried after he is pardoned, for that crime of which he was pardoned. If these statements are true, and I cannot see how they can reasonably be denied, then it follows that every unrepentant sinner has already been tried, and hence no need of a future trial judgment, and as the Christian is not under condemnation he must have been pardoned for he was under condemnation; and hence the Christian has no need of a future day of trial for he has already been pardoned. Frequently, in earthly courts, a condemned criminal is granted a new trial, but God is perfect and all-wise, hence no new trial can be admitted for the sins of which the sinner has already been condemned. If a new trial were admitted it would prove that God might make a mistake, might decide unjustly.

From these premises I conclude that a future day of trial or a great day of assize is forever debarred by this passage. In view of these facts what shall we say of that doctrine that teaches the wicked will have a future life and die the second time. If they are raised it will be not to be tried, for they have already been tried; not to be killed, for they are already as dead as dead can be. It would be simply to torment them. It is said that God owes every man a future life, that we get the present life from Adam. If this were so it seems to me that the sinner's condemnation would forfeit all obligation on the part of God. If a condemned sinner can claim any thing from God except the execution of the penalty, would it not indicate that his condemnation was not just.' So it seems to me. But I claim it as a self-evident truth that no person has or ever will have any life that was not in the first place the gift of God. Adam did not give us our present life, but in God "we live and move and have our being." If any person ever has a future life it will be the gift of God. Will God bestow a future and hopeless life upon any of his creatures just for the sake of wreaking revenge (for you can call it nothing else) upon the creatures he has made?

CAMPTON, IOWA, 1870.

PAYSON AND THE LAWYER.

THE following rencounter with a lawyer of Portland, who ranked among the first in the place for wealth, and fluency of speech, will show Dr. Payson's insight into character, and also that his conquests were not confined to "weak women and children." A lady, who was a common friend of Mrs. Payson and the lawyer's wife, was sojourning in the family of the latter. After the females of the respective families had interchanged several "calls," Mrs. —— was desirous of receiving a formal visit from Mrs. Payson; but, to effect this, Mr. Payson must also be invited; and how to prevail with her husband to tender an invitation was the great difficulty. He had been accustomed to associate experimental religion with meanness, and of course felt, or affected, great contempt for the divine, as if it were impossible for a man of his religion to be also a man of talents. He knew, by report, something of Mr. Payson's practice on these occasions, and dreading to have his house a place for what appeared to him gloomy conversation, resisted his wife's proposal as long as he could do so, and retain the character of a gentleman. When he gave his consent, it was with the positive determination that Mr. Payson should not converse on religion, nor ask a blessing over his food, nor offer a prayer in his house. He collected his forces, and made his preparation in conformity with this purpose. When the appointed day arrived, he received his guests very pleasantly, and entered at once into animated conversation; determined, by obtruding his own favorite topics, to forestall the divine. It was not long before the latter discovered his object, and summoned together his powers to defeat it. He plied them with that skill and address for which he was remarkable; still, for some time, victory was inclined to neither side, or to both alternately. The lawyer, not long before, had returned from Washington City, where he spent several weeks on business at the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. Payson made some inquiries respecting sundry personages there, and among others, the chaplain of the House of Representatives. The counsellor had heard him in the devotional services of that assembly. "How did you like him?" "Not at all; he appeared to have more regard to those around him, than he had to his Maker." Mr. Payson was very happy to hear him recognize the distinction between praying to God, and praying to be heard of men; and dropped a series of observations on prayer, passing into a strain of remark, which, without taking the form, had all the effect on the lawyer's conscience, of a personal application. From a topic so unwelcome, he strove to divert the conversation; and every few minutes would start something as wide from it as the east is from the west. But as often as he wandered, his guest would dexterously, and without violence, bring him back; and as often as he was brought back, he would wander again. At length the trying, which was to turn the scale, arrived. The time for the evening repast had come; the servant had entered the parlor with the provisions; the master of the feast became unusually eloquent, resolved to engross the conversation, to hear no question or reply, to allow no interval for "grace," and to give no indication, by the eye, the hand, or the lips, that he expected, or wished for such a service. Just as the distribution was on the very point of commencing, Mr. Payson interposed the question, "What writer has said, 'The devil invented the fashion of carrying round tea, to prevent a blessing being asked?'" Our host felt himself "cornered;" but, making a virtue of necessity, replied, "I don't know what writer it is; but, if you please, we will foil the devil this time. Will you ask a blessing, sir?" A blessing, of course, was asked; and he brooked, as well as he could, this first certain defeat, still resolved not to sustain another by the offering of thanks at the closing of the repast. But in this, too, he was disappointed. By some well-timed sentiment of his reverend guest, he was brought into such a dilemma, that he could not, without absolute rudeness, decline asking him to return thanks. And thus he contested every inch of his ground, till the visit terminated. But at every stage, the minister proved too much for the lawyer. Mr. Payson retained his character as a minister of religion, and gained his point in every thing; and that, too, with so admirable a tact, in a way so natural and unconstrained, and with such respectful deference to his host, that the latter could not be displeased, except with himself. He not only acknowledged God on the reception of food, but read the Scriptures and prayed before separating from the family: and did it at the request of the master, though made, as in every other instance, in violation of a fixed purpose. The chagrin of this disappointment, however, eventually became the occasion of the lawyer's greatest joy. His mind was never entirely at ease, till he found peace in believing. Often did he revert with devout thankfulness to God, to the visit which had occasioned his mortification; and ever after regarded, with more than common veneration and respect, the servant of God whom he had despised; and was glad to receive his ministrations, in exchange for those on which he had formerly attended.—Selected.

A PRESENTIMENT

Is an impression on the mind, that something is going to take place, and usually such is the case; perhaps we may say without exaggeration, that something always does occur, after a presentiment is formed: if such were not the fact, we cannot conjecture what would become of everybody. Just imagine for a moment, that something did not take place in such a large world as this!

Presentiments love weak places, hence they flourish among weak-minded people, not necessarily weak-minded by nature, but made so by a diseased body. We are told of a young lady at Kinderhook, who was visited by an apparition two years ago, at dead hour of night, which announced to her in solemn accents, that in two years she would be the inhabitant of another and a better world; this circumstance had such a depressing influence on her mind, that she pined away by degrees and did die, at the close of the term named, and was buried a few days ago.

An eminent clergyman, on parting from another in St. Louis, said: "I have a strong presentiment that we shall never meet again." and within a few hours he perished at the Gasconade on the Pacific Railway.

An almost infallible cure for presentiment, however violent, is a good emetic, a grubbing hoe, with a few days bread and water diet For ourselves, we would omit the emetic, as we do not patronize physic, except by proxy. The reason we give medicine at all is that people are always in a hurry, not exactly to get well, but to get able to eat; if they can only eat, nine out of ten think they are getting along famously. Every body wants to get well in a minute, and for the bare chances of doing so, with a slight degree of assurance to that effect from any knave who is willing to promise, it having the wit to see at a glance that the assurance must be father to the fee—we repeat, with a very slim assurance of being made well in a short time, the large majority of invalids would swallow a quart of Shakspeare's soup thrice a day, said soup being made, as the reader may remember, by several old witches, of such things as newt's eyes, frog's toes, lizzard wings, stings of rattle-snakes, and other ingredients not necessary to be named, but all brought to the climax point by—onions.

An emetic will dissipate a presentiment in five minutes, while the vigorous use of the grubbing hoe in the open air, would work off the extra and thick blood, abuse accumulation in the brain generates these diseased imaginings, while the diet of bread and water would supply a pure article of blood in the place of impure material.

Whoever heard of a healthy, out door, day laborer, having a "Presentiment" in the pursuit of his occupation? The fact is, they have not time to be moping about such tomfooleries; the only presentiment that ever troubles them is a veritable fact, a tangible reality. "Root Pie, or Die," is their ever living ghost.

Presentiments do not exist except in connection with one of the three following things —1. A weak mind. 2d. A diseased body. 3d. An idle condition of life.

Loafing and gluttony are the great originators of this unfortunate condition of mind, and its almost certain removal follow in temperate eating, combined with physical activity. If unattended to, and friendly death does not step in to save from a greater calamity, insanity winds up the history.

To the reflecting, we suggest a fact which dissipates the mystery which hangs around "Presentiments." In ordinary cases, a thing is not baptized as a "Presentiment," until the coincidence of the fact. Superstitious minds, in which presentiments mostly dwell, take no note of the countless impressions that certain things might take place, which did not afterwards take place; one such coincidence makes an impression against a million non-concurrents.—Journal of Health.

"WHEN a stranger treats me with want of proper respect," said a philosophic poor man, I comfort myself with the reflection that it is not myself he slights, but my old shabby coat and hat, which, to say the truth, have no particular claims to admiration. So if my hat and coat choose to fret about it, let them; it is nothing to me."

"THIS little fellow," said Martin Luther of a bird going to roost, "has chosen his shelter, and is quietly rocking himself to sleep without a care for to-morrow's lodging; calmly holding by his little twig, and leaving God alone to think of him."

HAVE A PLAN.—Few people follow a definite plan in life. That is why so many come out almost any where, and about as often, next to nowhere at all. The purpose, steady aim, continuous and consecutive labor, the heroic do or die, is a spectacle which very many have no comprehension of.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

WHAT A FALL.

A MINISTER of the Gospel told me in 1847 one of the most thrilling incidents I ever heard in my life.

"A member of his congregation, came home for the first time in his life, intoxicated, and his boy met him on the door-step, clapping his hands and exclaiming, "Papa has come home!" He seized that boy by the shoulder, swung him around, staggered, and fell in the hall.

That minister said to me, (I could give you his name if necessary,) "I spent that night in that house. I went out, bared my brow that the night air might fall upon it, and cool it; I walked out and down the hill. There was his child dead; there was his wife in strong convulsions, and he asleep. A man but thirty years of age asleep, with a dead child in the house, having a blue mark upon the temple where the corner of the marble steps had come in contact with his head as he swung him round, and a wife upon the brink of the grave.

"Mr. Gough," said my friend, "I cursed the drink. He had told me I must remain till he awoke, and I did. When he awoke, he passed hand over his face, and exclaimed,—

"'What is the matter? where is my boy?"

"'You cannot see him.'

"'Where is my boy?' he inquired.

"'You cannot see him.'

"'Stand out of my way. I will see my boy.'

"To avoid confusion I took him to that child's bedside, and as I turned down the the sheet and showed him the corpse, he uttered a shriek, 'Ah, my child!'"

That minister said further to me, "One year after that he was brought from a lunatic asylum to lie side by side with his wife in one grave, and I attended his funeral."

The minister of the Gospel who told me that fact, is to-day a drunken hostler in a stable in Boston!

Now tell me what rum will do! It will debase, degrade, imbrute, and damn everything that is noble, bright, glorious, and god-like in human being. There is nothing that rum will not do that is vile, dastardly, cowardly, sneaking, or hellish. We are united, brethren, are we not, to fight it till the day of our death.—John B. Gough.

ALLIE'S DOLLAR.

"NINETY-FIVE, ninety-six, ninety-seven, ninety-eight, ninety-nine, one hundred," counted Allie. "O mother! I've got a dollar—a whole dollar! haven't I?"

Allie's mother answered that she had.

"And papa said when my pennies got to be a dollar, I might spend it just as I pleased; didn't he, mother?"

"I believe he did," replied Mrs. Raymond, smiling at her little daughter's eagerness.

"O, wont it be nice?" cried Allie. What shall I get?" There's so much to buy, you know; and I don't know what I want most."

"Think of how you can do the most good with it," said Mrs. Raymond. "You can use your money in such a way that it will do good to yourself and to others."

"O mother!" cried Allie, in her impulsive way, "there's little Prue Wells! She can't go to Sabbath-School because she hasn't got any dress warm enough. She wears her calico dress to school and her mother washes it Saturday night, and she wears an old one on Sundays because her good one isn't dry. My dollar would get her a real nice warm delaine dress, and then she could go to Sabbath School every week. May I get her a dress, mother?"

"I am perfectly willing," answered Mrs. Raymond. "You couldn't use your dollar in any better way, I think."

That afternoon Allie went down to the store and selected a pretty red and black delaine.

"How surprised Prue will be!" she kept thinking. She was so excited when she reached the Widow Wells' little cottage, that she fairly ran up the path, and could hardly stop to knock.

Prue opened the door herself.

"O Prue!" cried Allie, almost out of breath, "there's a present for you! See how you like it."

Prue wonderingly opened the bundle.

"You don't mean that this is mine, do you?" cried she, holding up the pretty cloth, and looking at Allie, who was enjoying her surprise in great delight.

"Of course I do," answered Allie. "I got it on purpose for you. Ain't it pretty?"

"Oh! it's the prettiest dress I ever had," answered Prue hugging it up closely as if it were a doll. "I don't know how to thank you."

"I'm satisfied if you are," answered Allie, and ran down the path again. The next Sabbath, Prue made her appearance at the Sabbath School in the warm and pretty new dress; and Allie felt how true that passage in the Bible is that says, "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

THE BOY THAT SMOKES.

WHAT shall we say of the boy that smokes? Shall we pronounce any judgment upon him? Shall we say that he is acquiring an evil habit; that he is becoming a slave to a master, who, by and by, will be very cruel to him; that he is on the high road to rowdyism; that he is beginning to be profligate with his money?" etc. O, that this were the worst! What say the druggists, who know the stimulating effects of tobacco? One and all, that it often proves the first step to drunkenness.

"No young man, who uses tobacco, in any shape whatever, is, or can be safe. He is apt to be thirsty, and water never satisfies. Tobacco-smoking feeds the love of strong drinks in two ways—first by creating a morbid thirst; and second, by impairing the appetite for food, and indirectly encouraging him who uses it to seek for that strength which food should give him, in the use of extra stimulus. Let the friends of temperance—temperance men above all the rest, beware of tobacco in every form."

Take care, then, temperance boys, how you get that filthy thing, a cigar, into your mouths. Abhor and detest it, for it is poison and death.

SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the origina Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Pric 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should allow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is o desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander' of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested. showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price, bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents; postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE TRUE HOPE.

BY STEWART CARLISLE.

"And every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself, even as he is pure."—1 John iii. 3.

WHAT a cheerless and comfortless thing life would be if it were not for hope. Men do hope and will hope. Whatever their present circumstances may be, hope still promises them a higher and better state of things beyond; and it is well that it is so, for were it otherwise, despair with all its terrible weight would settle down upon the hearts of men, and life itself become an intolerable burden. And here we behold another illustration of the infinite wisdom of our loving Father in heaven, whose illimitable resources furnish ample means for the fullest exercise of hope in man, from the lowest to the highest degree of mental and moral development, so that man, basing his hope in the immutable word of God's eternal truth, may find an anchorage that defies the fiercest storms and waves of persecution, all the while "looking for that blessed hope, and the glorious appearing of the great God and of our Saviour Jesus Christ."—Tit. ii. 13. And as hope, like other parts, or elements of the Christian's armor is liable to be misdirected, or based on wrong and unsound premises, we shall endeavor to show from the oracles of divine truth what this hope is, of which the apostle speaks in the text.

Christians have but one gospel hope, Eph. iv. 3, and we may say just here, that any other than this one hope cannot, in the very nature of things, be the gospel hope. No matter whence they derived it, nor how long they have held it, or what body of, so called, divinity sanctions it, it cannot be otherwise than spurious, for the hope of the gospel is one hope; and the apostle in the text calls it "this hope;" and by reference to the context we find this hope to be, "When he shall appear, we shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is;" "And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." Here, then, we have in plain and unequivocal language, the personal appearing of our Lord from heaven as the object of Christian hope. Jesus said to his disciples, John xiii. 33, "Whither I go, ye cannot come;" and in chap. xiv. 2, 3, "I go to prepare a place for you; and if I go and prepare a place for you I will come again and receive you unto myself." But some men have inverted this saying of the Christ, and persist in saying they can go to him, and the consequence is that the saying, "Whither I go ye cannot come," is being contradicted daily, and Christ's second personal coming cannot be to them a purifying hope. But again: this same apostle, John, when in the Isle of Patmos, saw the events of time as they pass in panoramic view before him, and was permitted to see a new heaven, and a new earth; also the holy city, the new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven prepared ("I go to prepare a place for you") as a bride adorned for her husband. At the second coming of our Lord, we may expect him to fulfil the promise, and put us in possession of the place which he has gone to prepare; and as we cannot go to him, we can look for and love his appearing, and though he tarry, wait for him and, girding up the loins of our minds, we can hope to the end, for the grace to be brought unto us at the revelation of Jesus Christ (not at death). That this was the gospel hope, and consequently the hope of the prophets and apostles, we shall abundantly show from the word of God.

When Paul stood before Agrippa, we find him using the following language: "And now I stand and am judged for the hope of the promise made of God unto our fathers: unto which promise our twelve tribes instantly serving God day and night hope to come, for which hope's sake, King Agrippa, I am accused of the Jews." "Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead?"—Acts xxvi. 6, 7, 8. Paul's hope, then, was based upon the "promise of God made unto the fathers," which promise can only be made good by a resurrection from the dead; and as the resurrection cannot take place until the appearing of our Lord from heaven, no more can the promise be fulfilled until that event takes place. But what was this promise that God gave "to the fathers?" Was it that they should go to heaven at death? Let us turn to Gen. xxii. 16, 17, 18: "By myself I have sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing and hast not witheld thy Son, thine only Son, that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies, and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed, because thou hast obeyed my voice." Abraham's obedience to God is seen in the fact of his compliance with the divine command, when he showed his willingness to offer up his only son Isaac, the child of promise, of whom God had told him, "In Isaac shall thy seed be called," and in his obedience to God he showed his faith in the resurrection, for he "accounted that God was able to raise him up, even from the dead, from whence also he received him in a figure."—Heb. xi. 19. Again: in Gen. xvii. 8 we read, "And I will give unto thee, and thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession, and I will be their God." Again: "Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art, northward and southward, and eastward and westward, for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever, and I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth, so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered. Arise, walk through the land in the length of it, and in the breadth of it, for I will give it unto thee."—Gen. xiii. 14–17. These promises, Paul tells us, constitute Abraham "heir of the world," Rom. iv. 13, the solid, material kosmos, not the trackless ether, nor an imaginary kingdom beyond the sky.

This then is "the promise that God gave to the fathers;" and upon this promise they based their hope; and because Paul believed all things which are written in the law and in the prophets; and knew their hope of the promise could not be realized without a resurrection; and knew that the resurrection only comes through Christ; and knowing also that neither the law nor the prophets ever uttered a single sentence about the re-living of the wicked dead, but on the contrary, "that they are dead, they shall not live; they are deceased, they shall not rise; therefore hast thou visited and destroyed them, and made all their memory to perish."—Isai. xxvi. 14. He was bold in affirming that the "wages of sin is death," without any "ifs" or "buts," or "that is to say," about it. "But the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord;" and that gift is to be given at the "last day" either by a resurrection or a translation. Says Paul, "of the hope and resurrection of the dead am I called in question."—Acts xxiii. 6. Paul had a great deal to say about the resurrection, but nothing about going to heaven at death, for that was no part of his hope, neither was it the hope of the fathers, because it was not in the promise that God gave to them. The promise contains something tangible, not all etherial. "New heavens and a new earth" are included in it. "Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made; he saith not and to seeds as of many, but as of one, and to thy seed which is Christ."—Gal. iii. 16. By faith Abraham sojourned in the land of promise, as in a strange country, dwelling in tabernacles with Isaac and Jacob, the heirs with him of the same promises. "For he looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God."—Heb. xi. 9, 10. Now Paul tells us that these "heirs of the promise" all died in faith, not having received the promises (see 13th verse of same chapter), and he tells us in 1 Cor. xv. 18, "That if there be no resurrection they have all perished." Does this look like going to heaven at death? or has the resurrection yet taken place? In Heb. vi. 15, Paul tells us that after Abraham "had patiently endured he obtained the promise," but the inheritance, which was the object promised, is yet in the future. The promise and the object promised are widely different things.

This gospel hope, then, as we have clearly shown, rests upon "the promise of God made unto the fathers." Abraham being the "heir of the world," by promise, and himself a captive in the dark domain of death, and all the children subject to the same bondage, it became necessary that Christ should take on him not "the nature of angels, but the seed of Abraham," Heb. xi. 16, and in a conversation with the Jews, John viii. 56, Jesus says: "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it, and was glad." "And the Jews answered and said, thou art not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham?" "And Jesus said unto them before Abraham was I am." He did not say before Abraham was, I was. No; but "before Abraham was I am." Not before him in the order of being, but "before Abraham was (to be delivered from the bondage of death), I am ("to abolish death, and bring life and immortality to light)." "I am the resurrection and the life." This was the day that Abraham rejoiced to see, and he saw it (by faith) and was glad. For "this is the will of him that sent me, that every one which seeth the Son, and believeth on him may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day."—John vi. 48. Although the promise was given to Abraham nearly two thousand years previous to the first advent of the Saviour, yet before Abraham was (to be put in possession of the promised inheritance) "I am" (through death,) "to destroy him that hath the power of death, that is the devil, and to deliver them who through fear of death were all their lifetime subject to bondage."—Heb. ii. 14.

We shall now proceed to show that this hope has been one in all ages of the world's history, so far as the Bible furnishes us with the knowledge of their hope. "I have set the Lord always before me, because he is at my right hand. I shall not be moved; therefore my heart is glad, and my glory rejoiceth: my flesh also shall rest in hope. For thou wilt not leave my soul in hell; neither wilt thou suffer thine Holy One to see corruption."—Psa. xvi. 8, 9, 10. Nothing here about going to heaven at death, though he is speaking of Christ. Again: "As for me, I shall behold thy face in righteousness: I shall be satisfied, when I awake with thy likeness," Psa. xvii. 15; and our text says, "We shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." Is falling asleep awaking in his likeness? Is David awake now, and more alive than ever? Let Peter answer: "Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day."—Acts ii. 29. "For David is not ascended unto the heavens."—34th verse. David's hope was that of awaking in the likeness of his Redeemer, for he says, in the 49th Psalm, 15th verse, "But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave, for he shall receive me." Job expresses his hope in very strong terms: "For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth, and after I shall awake, though this body be destroyed, yet out of my flesh shall I see God." (Margin). For my reins within me are consumed with earnest desire for that day." (Margin).—Job xix. 25, 26. Then Job's hope was not that of going to heaven at death, but at "that day" "then shalt call and I will answer thee."—Job xiv. 15. "The meek shall inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace."—Psa. xxxvii. 11. David must have learned this from "the promise that God gave unto the fathers."

BY S. W. BISHOP.

"When the Son of man shall come in his glory, and all the holy angels with him, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory:

"And before him shall be gathered all nations."—Matt. xxv. 31, 32.

THE above Scripture is supposed to clearly teach a resurrection of all men, good and bad, to be judged. The argument is based on the two words "all nations." It is urged that "all nations" must comprehend all who have ever lived on the earth.

If we can find one nation in the past that has been destroyed, never again to exist as a nation, this supposed argument is refuted. See Ex. xvii. 14: "And the Lord said unto Moses, Write this for a memorial in a book, and rehearse it in the ears of Joshua: for I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven." God commanded the children of Israel to do this work when they came to be settled in the land of Canaan. See Deut. xv. 19. It was fully accomplished by David. See 2 Sam. chap. viii. There, then, is one nation which has utterly been blotted from the earth, and therefore can never be gathered among the "all nations" of Matt. xxv. 32.

But there is another nation, of whose utter destruction we are informed in the Scriptures, in language, if possible, more positively strong, than even the above. See Jer. li. 56, 57: "Because the spoiler is come upon her, even upon Babylon, and her mighty men are taken, every one of their bows is broken: for the Lord God of recompenses shall surely requite. And I will make drunk her princes, and her wise men, her captains and her rulers, and her mighty men: and they shall sleep a perpetual sleep, and NOT WAKE, saith the King, whose name is the Lord of hosts." This prophecy was most literally fulfilled, as to Babylon's destruction, B. C. 538. A record of its accomplishment is found in Dan. v. There are two nations, then, who, so sure as the word of God be true, will never be seen again on the earth. "All nations," therefore, cannot mean all the nations that have lived and died in the past. Still there is force in the language "all nations." The words nation and nations occur about three hundred and sixty times in the Bible, and not once is either word used of the dead, but always of the living.

The "all nations" here spoken of, Matt. xxv. 32, must, then, refer to the nations living on the earth when the great event here spoken of shall transpire, and the expression has no reference whatever to any resurrection either good or bad. But, says one, will not the resurrection take place when Christ comes? I answer, yes. So also will the living church be changed to immortality, but neither is spoken of here. It is always safe to let particular texts "mean" the events of which they speak, and not attempt to make one text teach everything. It is, however, a distinctly declared fact that, first: When Christ comes, the second time, all living nations will receive their doom. Second: These "all nations" will be divided into just two classes, no more. The righteous, see v. 46, represented by the sheep, and the wicked represented by the goats.

The same truth is just as clearly stated in other portions of the teachings of the word of God. See Matt. xxiv. 30, 31. Here are two classes only. First: all the tribes of the earth, who mourn at sight of "the sign of the Son of man;" second: "the elect," who are gathered by the angels. What does it take to constitute an individual one of the elect? Let Peter answer. "Elect, according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit, unto obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ."—1 Pet. i. 2. All, then, of all the tribes of the earth, who, when our Lord shall present his sign in the heavens, shall be found destitute of the sanctifying power of the Spirit of God, and walking in disobedience, uncleansed by the blood of Jesus Christ, will "mourn" and will be "left" not to find salvation in a future age, or ages, but to go away into everlasting punishment, while the "elect," the righteous, will have an endless life.

The same fact is most plainly declared in Matt. xvi. 27: "For the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father with his angels; and then shall he reward every man according to his works." In Matt. xiii. 37–43, we have given us, by the Son of God, an exposition of the parable of the good seed and the tares. An explanation of a parable must be understood literally. To suppose otherwise, is to virtually assume that it is no expression at all. How would speaking in parables explain a parable? In this exposition of the parable of the wheat and tares, Christ says that the entire work of consummation and destruction is in the end of this age. He also says that in the final adjustment there are but two classes, the righteous, represented by the wheat, and the wicked, represented by the tares; that the first of these two classes, the righteous, shall then "shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father; and that the wicked shall be gathered out of the earth, the territory of the kingdom, by being cast into a furnace of fire.

How entirely futile is any attempt, while we believe the teachings of the Son of the Highest, so plainly, clearly, and positively stated, to urge that when Christ comes the second time, there will be found at least four classes of people on the earth; and that three of these classes will be saved, two of them having an opportunity to secure eternal life in an age beyond "this age." Are Jews, who are alive when the Lord comes, neither wheat or tares, sheep or goats, righteous or wicked, good or bad? Who dare say that Jews and "heathen" belong to neither of these two classes, when Christ so emphatically and so often declares that all nations are thus divided at his coming?

It will have a salutary influence upon us all to remember that this is the last and only age in which any son or daughter of Adam's race will have an opportunity to prepare for an endless life. And as we see unmistakable evidences that the "end of this age" is very near, we shall endeavor to make a sure preparation for future life. So let it be.

"A DANGEROUS DOCTRINE."

BY WM. H. SPENCER.

A PROMINENT objection that is not unfrequently offered against believing or teaching the doctrine of "Life only in Christ," is, that "it is a dangerous doctrine," because "it weakens the motive for men to become Christians."

This objection ignores the great question which should pervade every Christian mind —"WHAT IS TRUTH?" and is forgetful of the Scriptural affirmation that Christians are sanctified "through truth;" hence the objection is fraught with the most consummate presumption, in declaring what we should or should not believe or teach, instead of ascertaining, by careful Bible investigation, whether or not it is God's truth. Whatever is God's plan can have no such tendency.

This objection, it is quite apparent to us, springs from a dissatisfaction with God's plan of redemption as revealed in the Scriptures, and those who offer it doubtless suppose that in their system of theology they are offering something better. Can we, as Bible Christians, cast such serious reflections upon the infinite wisdom and goodness of Jehovah, as to assume that He is not qualified to affix to the gospel those motives which are best calculated to arrest the attention of men by presenting His plan of salvation in all its attractive features? Such conduct would be supreme madness. It becomes us to accept His plan and be contented with it just as we find it revealed, because, being of divine origin, we can neither amend or alter it; and it becomes us to rally for its defence against all who would arraign it before the tribunal of human judgment.

We offer as a proposition, which it appears to us any reasoning mind must commend, that whatever motives God has affixed to the gospel to induce men to become Christians, must be adapted to human comprehension, or else they are powerless to accomplish the end for which they were designed. Now, we inquire, Does the doctrine of future punishment offered by our immaterialistic brethren meet the demands of this proposition? We think not, and therefore, their objection to the doctrine that "the wages of sin is death," is void of foundation. They are either right or wrong. If they are right in their views of future destiny, then we are wrong, and we shall expect them to offer motives for repentance which are adapted to man's comprehension, and which are found in God's revelation, to be of divine origin, and in harmony with the character of their heavenly author.

The inquiry now forces itself upon our attention, What is the natural tendency of the popular doctrine of eternal torments in a future state? Does it beget feelings of love and veneration for God who is represented in the Scriptures as a God of love, "merciful in judgment" and full of compassion? Nay! It comes in direct antagonism with our views of righteousness and justice, and has an effect reverse from producing obedience to the requirements of God. "The popular views of future punishment," says a careful Bible investigator, "are perfectly unphilosophical, and so extremely incomprehensible and inconsistent with the nature of things, that to present its features to the mind, causes reason to reel upon her throne, and involves men in no small degree in a species of incoherent delirium, while the honest intellect makes abortive efforts to reconcile its inconsistent absurdities; the mind must, therefore, be tortured and thrown off its balance before the thought can be permitted to make an impression, even of its plausibility; and even then it only finds a location in the extraordinary development of marvellousness. The fact is, it fails to produce upon the mind a reasonable conviction of its truth;" . . . "like fictions told, being so perfectly beyond our comprehension, and even contrary to common sense, it perfectly fails to produce the least conviction upon our reason of its truth; hence presents no motive whatever to repentance."

The truthfulness of these remarks is abundantly confirmed by the condition of religion at the present day throughout the world. From the high-salaried preacher to the poorest missionary on foreign soil, the immaterialistic theory of future punishment has been taught; and what is the result? What influence has it had upon the world? Facts are stubborn things. Missionary labor has become almost paralyzed, and in enlightened lands, where every advantage has been afforded for the promulgation of the gospel, it is a notorious fact that law and religion combined are powerless to stop the increasing tide of iniquity, which has become so enormous that men beholding it filling their pathway at every step, have stopped in alarm and vainly inquired, "What are we coming to?" The Christ-like character which the church should bear seems to have become so completely lost in sectarian strife, the worldly-mindedness of professed Christians, and the unimportance which they attach to revealed truth, that they are but little affected by the high-handed wickedness which curses every grade of society, and threatens the very existence of our own government.

We have but briefly touched the facts in this matter; but in fairness to our opponents we will not say that the present condition of the world is wholly a result of the promulgation of the immaterialistic theory of future punishment. It is largely attributable to this, and also to the fact that they have lost sight of the hope of the gospel—the second coming of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, and the inheritance of the saints—and hence the gospel motive to repentance has been almost obliterated.

When we consider how sadly the preaching of eternal misery has failed to deter men from sin, and how powerless it is to induce professed Christians to "come out from the world and be separate," we can comprehend the feebleness of the objection to the doctrine of "Life only in Christ" that it is a dangerous doctrine. As the doctrine of eternal misery has failed to frighten men into Christianity, it seems the height of folly to resist the promulgation of a milder form of theology, which strives to induce men to serve God through love instead of fear. Many instances are known where "Life only in Christ" has reached men walking in the paths of unrighteousness, who are now living lives of holiness; and there are instances where popular theology had utterly failed to induce them to serve their righteous Law-giver.

An infidel once in conversation with another remarked: "I should not oppose Christianity so bitterly if they did not require men to believe so many unreasonable things." To this source we may trace a large portion of the infidelity of our age. But the gospel of the Bible destroys infidelity at a single blow. Its truths are not at war with reason, but commend themselves to every unprejudiced mind. It unfolds the character of God as one of supreme goodness, and represents Him as full of love and compassion for sinful man. It offers life from the dead—eternal life—as the great motive for turning from sin to holiness, and plainly declares that all who will not secure eternal life through Christ, must "perish in their own corruption," for "the wages of sin is death, but the gift of God is eternal life."

This gives us something tangible; something real that is within the comprehension of man, and that is like an anchor sure and steadfast. "Now if any man have not the Spirit of Christ, he is none of his." "But if the Spirit that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you."—Rom. viii. 9, 11. Without the indwelling of the Spirit we cannot expect a revival from death.

CHRISTIAN TRIUMPH.

ON board an East-Indianman was a pious boatswain, whom, on this account, the crew looked upon as a strange man. The ship was overtaken with a storm so dreadful, that after every effort to preserve life, the captain said, All that could be done had been done—it was impossible the vessel could weather it. The ship seemed sinking. The captain withdrew into the cabin, the men were some on their knees, and others filled with horror, were hanging on parts of the rigging. All expected the vessel would founder. The boatswain had been very active, and apparently unalarmed, during the whole of the gale. At this moment, when a heavy wave struck the ship, and seemed as if it would instantly sink her, looking up with a smile he exclaimed, "Blessed be God, all is right!" and he began to sing. The storm afterwards abated, and the vessel was saved.

Thus, amidst the storms of life, on the dark ocean of death, and amidst the terrors of the judgment day the Christian may still smile, and exulting, exclaim, "Blessed be God, it is all right."

"MY first convictions on the subject of religion," says Rev. R. Cecil, "were confirmed by observing, that really religious persons had some solid happiness among them, which I felt the vanities of the world could not give. I shall never forget standing by the bedside of my sick mother. 'Are not you afraid to die?' I asked. 'No.' 'No!' 'Why does not the uncertainty of another state give you no concern?' 'Because God has said, Fear not; when thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee.' 'Let me die the death of the righteous.'"

SYMPATHY FOR THE ERRING.

O HOW much of our indignation against even a deliberate wrong would be disarmed if we could know for ourselves a tithe of all the sorrow and trouble and disappointment the poor erring heart had passed through! What efforts are made in youth to stand up against the pressure of the world, and how, when fallen, from miscalculation, or an over-confiding nature, or want of tact, it bravely rose up and tried again; and when hard necessity came and drove it to the wall, how it looked around for help, and waited, still striving to stand upright, and fell while striving; and even when fallen, how it yearned for one more chance to rise and be a man—how loth at last to give up all for lost! Could we but see a thousandth part of these struggles, as they rend our brother's bosom, and almost break his heart, how should it disarm us of our vindictiveness, and incline us even to run to him and raise him up, and stand by him, and with God-like forgiveness bid him "Try, try again!"—Selected.

"A DISTINGUISHED Oneida chief, named Skenandoah, having yielded to the instructions of the Rev. Mr. Kirkland, and lived a reformed man for fifty years, said, just before he died, in his hundred and twentieth year, "I am an aged hemlock; the winds of one hundred years have whistled through my branches; I am dead at the top; (he was blind;) why I yet live, the great good Spirit only knows. Pray to my Jesus, that I may wait with patience my appointed time to die; and when I die, lay me by the side of my minister and father, that I may go up with him at the great resurrection."

THERE is a way of smoothing over and down those who are beginning to search after truth for themselves, by assuring them that the points attracting notice, however great they may be, are of no importance.

The Design of Russia.

BY W. S. CAMPBELL.

Great excitement in London! The British Cabinet awake!! The message of the Russian Premier, Prince Gortschakoff, to Lord Granville, demanding the revision of the treaty of 1856 by which Russia was shut out of the Bosphorus and the Dardenelles,—and the like demand sent to the courts of Berlin, Vienna and Constantinople! The opportune moment has come, when Russia will have no fear of great trouble in securing the prize. The Russian Government is now determined to take advantage of the downfall of France, as a military power, to obtain the freedom of the Black Sea and the Dardenelles. The Ally of England is down. England has stood by and seen her humiliation, and Russia has only waited till France could not lift a finger while she claims the abrogation of the articles of the treaty, (1856) which neutralized the Black Sea. She wants the free navigation of the Bosphorus, whether Turkey will or not, and now what power will gainsay her? If, as we believe, she is in secret treaty with Prussia, she may boldly fling down the gauntlet. Who will take it up?

But is all this for the peace of Europe? England, when the Russian ambassador communicated this purpose to the British Cabinet, sent messengers to St. Petersburg, Vienna, Constantinople, Berlin, Copenhagen and Florence, informing her ministers at these courts of the danger of complications which are to be dreaded. The storm must break, and not only France but Europe must "drink."

An article in the "N. Y. Herald" would prove that Russia does not want Constantinople because she might have taken it a dozen times, if she would, since 1829. She wants the control of the Black Sea, and the only outlet to the Mediterranean and the Atlantic. Now she may obtain the coveted possession.

In 1829 the victorious armies of Nicholas were within fifty miles of Constantinople. In 1840 the Czar sent an army to keep off Mohamet Ali from Constantinople, and took no territorial renumeration. In 1848, when all Europe was in Revolution, and Austria was occupied with Hungary, Russia might have taken Constantinople. She did not; the time had not then come. Now, the demand is different. In 1852, upon the accession to the throne of France, Napoleon said he wanted a war to consolidate his power; and he proposed to Russia to aid him, offering Constantinople as the remunerative motive. Alexander haughtily rebuked these offers, and would not condescend to call a Bonaparte a brother. The result was an Eastern war, opened by Russia. France and England united and, by the treaty of Paris, crippled Russia, by sea, and secured British supremacy, upon the seas for awhile longer. In 1859, when Napoleon declared war upon Austria, Russian aid was again applied for and Eastern remuneration was offered. The only thing required of Russia was to put three hundred thousand men on the Prussian frontier, so as to maintain Germany in activity. These offers were again refused, and Napoleon was obliged to make peace at Villa Franca.

In 1866, during the war between Prussia and Austria, requests for help, and offers, poured into St. Petersburgh from all quarters; and if the Emperor Alexander had only been less scrupulous and less decided in his policy he could have made then a brilliant bargain. To all the interested parties he opposed the most resolute refusals and rebukes, and said that the only thing he wanted was general peace.

The next year, when war was on the eve of declaration between France and Prussia, on account of Luxembourg, peace was maintained solely by Russia. So in the present war, she shows that she is for the peace of Europe, well knowing that her prestige is so mighty, a word may be sufficient to keep the tumultuous elements from breaking out in open and devastating war.

This war is ruining Prussia, who has been hitherto the victor, as well as France. Russia, who is to obtain the greatest benefit, suffers nothing. An argument is used to show that Russia does not want Constantinople because if she had it, her people would move southward. But she must want, for her integrity and aggrandisment, the control of the sea, and its shores, which is almost all within her own territorial dominions. The traditional policy of Prussia for at least half a dozen reigns has been that Constantinople was important to the extension of the Russian empire. When Alexander said to Napoleon Bonaparte, "Constantinople is the key of my house," Napoleon replied, "Constantinople is the key of the world."

The ambitious objects of princes will frustrate the purposes of peace, and thus far there appears to be no disposition to forego the great temptation, by those who are loudest in the profession of good will to their subjects, or their neighbors. Even King William will not refuse to be crowned Emperor of Germany; and Russia will not labor for peace that destroys her own ambition.

Plays raise the passions, and prevent the use of them; and in consequence are dangerous to morality.—Plato.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 30, 1870.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive.

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

The Editor's Health.

Nothing materially different from last week can be said on this subject, the Editor remaining much the same, with the exception that with no more indication to take nourishment, it is feared he must be declining in strength. This has, in fact, been the case and is so at the present time. Some little indications there have been of returning appetite, but too evanescent to afford any substantial encouragement. Doing what can be done in the case, to support and strengthen frail nature, we must all prayerfully leave the matter in the hands of that Being who, as our beloved and afflicted brother a few days since remarked to us, "is too good to do evil, too wise to err."

The Wicked Dead.

A Christian friend, whose faith, of seventeen years standing, in the theory of revival to life of the wicked dead is somewhat shaken, writes us expressing much interest in the paper and the views it advocates, and says if certain texts that stand in the way could be satisfactorily explained, acceptance of the view—truth, we boldly declare it—of no future life for any who die in impenitence would be compelled.

Without knowing ought of individual experience in this matter, except in comparatively few cases, we venture the opinion that when they who hold that man is mortal, came to see the glorious truth—for all truth is glorious, notwithstanding it may be humiliating to creaturely pride—that man is by nature a dying, perishing creature, they did not any of them wait to be able to harmonize with that view, especially to the satisfaction of others, every text which seemed to teach inherent immortality. When they learned that a vast preponderance of Scripture testimony not only either indicates or plainly teaches man's mortality, but renders any other explication unreasonable, they accepted the truth and rejoiced in it, leaving the few texts to be harmonized therewith when further light shone on them and revealed their true import. We hesitate not to say all lovers of truth will find it equally safe and profitable to let the same principle govern their action in determining questions respecting the future of the wicked dead.

We opposed the doctrine of no future life for any who fail to form a living union with Christ, the Life-giver, until we plainly saw that the weight of Scripture evidence was against our position. Then, thinking it unreasonable that we should permit our understanding of a few texts to set aside and at nought the unquestionable teaching of the many, we yielded the point. We then thought John v. 28, 29, and two or three other texts did certainly seem to teach a re-living of the impenitent dead. On the other hand, however, we saw that scores of texts manifestly taught the contrary. The consequence was we concluded our exposition of the two or three texts must be wrong, and that they must be designed to teach something different from what we had understood them to teach. Now, with further light on the then, to us, conflicting texts, Scripture testimony is the same grand, harmonious whole respecting the destiny of the wicked that it is respecting man's nature. We have since only too plainly seen that there is among professed lovers of truth too much of clinging to certain expositions of Scripture passages to the utter disregard of all other Bible testimony bearing upon the point. Suppose ten reliable witnesses enter court and plainly testify to a certain thing, and one witness, who happens to be testifying to another matter entirely, seems to say something in conflict with what the ten have said. What would be thought of the judge who should say, "These ten witnesses are credible, it is true, and they testify plainly, but I cannot believe what they say, until the testimony of the witness in the other case can be harmonized with theirs?" Let us examine some of the texts supposed by our friend to conflict with our view.

First: "For thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just."—Luke xiv. 14.

We are aware that this passage is claimed by some as favoring a resurrection of the wicked dead, but we frankly confess to an utter inability to discover any ground for the claim. The passage teaches a resurrection, but only of a class—the just. A resurrection of any other class is not even the most distantly implied. None who consider both text and context will fail to see the object and aim of the expression. A learned writer renders the passage: "Thou shalt be reqnited, en, through, by means of, the resurrection of the just." The verse just simply says, in substance, there will be a resurrection of the just, and thou, by having part in it, "shalt be recompensed," or rewarded. A resurrection of the just, and a recompense to the just by means of the resurrection, is plainly taught in the passage. If it implies any thing it is that only the just will have a resurrection.

The next passage mentioned is: For as in Adam all die, even so in Christ shall all be made alive. But every man in his own order; Christ the first-fruits; afterward they that are Christ's at his coming.—1 Cor. xv. 22, 23.

They who think this passage countenances the theory of a universal resurrection, either overlook or disregard certain palpable facts. If verse 22 read, "For in Adam all die; even so in Christ," etc., the qualifying term "as" being omitted, there would be some reason in the explication which makes the passage teach the resurrection of all men; but even then the language could not properly be considered as involving, of necessity, the resurrection of the wicked, for there would still exist a reasonable doubt as to whether the term "all" was designed by the apostle to have a broader application than all Christians. It is a fact that some, so called, orthodox commentators do interpret the term "all" relatively, taking it to denote all believers only, since they alone are spoken of in the context.

The two parts of the verse (22) form a comparison between two facts; the first based on the union of mankind, on the one hand, with their natural head, the first Adam, who introduced death into the world, and the other based on a union with a spiritual head, the second Adam, who introduced into the world life from the dead. The headship, remember, in the one case, is Adam; in the other it is Christ. The expression "in Adam" means as partakers of his nature. This none will deny. Accordingly, "in Christ" must mean as partakers of his nature. This none can reasonably deny. In the terms as—so, then, we have the formula of comparison. As all men die by reason of their connection with the natural head, Adam; even so all who become connected with the spiritual head, Christ, will "be made alive," or will live again. The one connection is natural—comes by generation; the other is spiritual, and comes by believing in the Lord Jesus Christ, and working the works of faith. As the one connection (and it includes the whole race) leads to death, so the other connection (which includes all who secure it) leads to life. Are the wicked in Christ—partakers of his nature? In no sense whatever.

Verse 22, in itself only considered, presents, as we believe, an unanswerable argument against a revival to life of the wicked dead, but considered in connection with the following verse it becomes still further fortified against such an explication: "But every man in his own order; Christ the first-fruits; afterward they that are Christ's, at his coming." Could any thing be plainer than this makes it? Two orders are stated. Christ was the first in "order." He was the first to rise from the dead to eternal life. The next in "order" are "they that are Christ's, at his coming." No wicked dead found in Paul's order of resurrection. "Then cometh the end." O, says one, this means the wicked dead; they come last; they are "the end" of the resurrection. "Then cometh the end, when he shall have delivered up the kingdom," etc. Thus "the end" relates not to a resurrection of wicked dead, but to the consummation; to the event of having conquered all enemies, and put down all rule, and authority, and power opposed to him and his righteous rule. The construction of this text is such that to make "the end" relate to a resurrection of wicked dead is to turn things upside down, for the end here spoken of transpires when all opposing authority has been put down, and the kingdom of God thoroughly established. Consequently the wicked dead would, for no inconsiderable length of time, be in the kingdom of God, polluting it with their presence. We do not think it is reasonable, and cannot believe it is desirable, and this because we nowhere find God has threatened it.

Let all who believe in a re-living of the wicked dead remember that the object of their revival to life cannot be the better to determine what shall be their future state, for that must be determined before they can be left behind, at the resurrection of the righteous. It cannot be to deprive them of life, for they are utterly dead already. And finally, it cannot be to torment them, for torment is not even implied in the penalty for sin. The only object, then, in raising them, if they were to be raised, must be the gratification of feelings of revenge. Such a work, with such motives cannot be attributed to the divine Being without doing the grossest violence to those conceptions of His character which every unprejudiced student of the Bible must obtain. God is love.

Affairs in Europe.

There is very little about the condition of matters in Europe to betoken anything like a speedy establishment of peace among the contending nations, or a long preservation of it among those nominally at peace. The struggle in France continues with no marked advantage gained on either side, though time itself is, of course, a great weakener of French resources. For twelve or fourteen days the two armies, between whom the battle which gave the French some advantage and much encouragement was fought, have been manœuvring, preparatory to a struggle, but no engagement of importance is reported up to this, Monday a. m.

The excitement over the Eastern question has once or twice partially subsided, and encouraged the hope of a peaceable adjustment, but at the present time the cloud looks no less threatening than ever. It will be remembered that there was said to be little of a conciliatory nature in Earl Granville's note to Prince Gortschakoff, and when the Prince's reply to that note was received, some four days since, so firm and unyielding in its demand was it found to be, it created intense excitement in the British Cabinet. The Queen, so says the despatch, sent for Earl Granville, and immediately upon his arrival in her presence he was somewhat abruptly assailed by her with regard to his reply to the Russian circular. She declared, says the cable, that she "would not hear of war under any circumstance." The scene at the Cabinet session, immediately after, is reported to have been exciting in the extreme. The members of the Cabinet are some for war and some for peace, and it is arranged to meet the Queen in council at Windsor, on Tuesday. Should the majority favor peace the Queen will probably have her way, but should they favor war she may have to yield her wishes in the matter. Should it come to that, it will not be the first time in her experience. In the meantime Russia stands firm, and it would appear that England must yield to her demand or take the initiative in war, so adroit is Prince Gortschakoff in contriving to throw on England the onus of commencing the difficulty.

In Italy the question now is what is to be done with the Pope? He protested against the seizure of his temporalities by Victor Emanuel, has protested against everything, at every step, and he now issues his bull of "Major excommunication" against the King and all concerned. So they are in the city, but he has marched them out of the church. "In his letter to the Pope declaring his intention to take Rome and the little kingdom of the Pope, the King of Italy avows himself not only a Catholic, but a good Catholic and says that he was compelled to move on Rome in the cause of law and order—that he had to choose between Rome and a 'red' revolution.

"But what will King Victor do now—now that he and all his confederates in this occupation of Rome are read out of the Church and booked for purgatory? He has been doing all he could to conciliate the Holy Father, including full protection in Rome as head of the Church and large money considerations; but the Holy Father says, 'No. I protest against this sacrilegious robbery, and I bide my time. I excommunicate you, now do your worst.' There is no reconciliation here; there is nothing less than a state of war between the Pope and the King. The Pope, confining himself to the Vatican, is, in fact, in the position of a prisoner in his own house. The King is going to Rome, and during his stay it is said the churches of the city are to be closed by order of the Pope. What then? The King will order them to be opened. But the priests will refuse to officiate; and then? Why, then, perhaps, the King will be compelled, by the pressure of the 'reds,' to banish Pope and priests and to set himself up as the head of the Church of Italy."

It is not unlikely that the Pope may yet be compelled to change his residence. But where will he go? Feeling himself driven from Rome, there would be no place for him in Italy. He could not be expected to go to Austria; Spain has just chosen an Italian King; and France, not only a Republic but reduced to anarchy, and overrun by a Protestant power, could afford him little rest or protection. Think of it. The events of a few short weeks have so overturned the old order of things that in no Catholic country throughout all Europe can the Pope find a safe asylum, if driven from Rome. God works in a mysterious way, but when His work is once accomplished it is thoroughly accomplished.

But probably no place throughout the whole theatre of this or any strife is or has been, if we except Jerusalem, at its period of overthrow, in so pitable a condition, all things considered, as that into which Paris and its surroundings are now rapidly sinking. Poor Paris! Poor France! How the merchants of the earth, standing afar off, bewail her. In an article relative, more especially, to the present financial condition of France, a secular paper says:

"Her capital was both the delight and the wonder of mankind; her exquisite art and her profound science had been turned into channels so practically useful and so acceptable, in every land and clime, that her manufactures, great and small, from the production of the most delicate "article de Paris" to the building of stupendous steamships, were rapidly becoming in reality what fashion had already made them in fancy—the absolute models of taste and of serviceable value.

"But why need we linger to remind any one who has been living in our day of the brilliant light which seemed to rest over that part of the earth's surface called France and was seen radiating from it in ever extending and warmer reaches of effulgence? Its splendor, its pre-eminence, its apparently endless variety of resources, its astonishing record of martial achievement which reads like a romance from first to last; its unparalleled accumulation of artistic and literary treasures and the peculiar charm that seemed to cling to the very names of the localities made forever famous as the homes of so gay and gallant a race have all conspired to convey to the remainder of the enlightened nations the impression of a master people residing in that space of territory chiefly bounded by the English Channel, the Pyrenees, the Mediterranean and the Rhine. Arts, arms, laws, population, genius, soil, climate, situation, products, skill, all appeared to have been combined for them upon peculiarly favorable conditions, and the Muse of History seemed to have dipped her pen in sunbeams when she sketched her annals.

"Well may the coolest business men unite with sympathizing philanthropists in exclaiming 'Poor France!' while viewing the dry calculations of the accountant alone.

"But who shall utter, who shall understand the absolute, eternal loss, the speechless woe, of the families decimated and scattered; the hearthstones chilled forever, the homes obliterated in the thirty departments of this beautiful land overrun and despoiled by the invader? The agony unspeakable of wife and husband, of parent and child, torn from each other's arms and gaze, to meet the loving smile and hear the tender voice no more; the blackness of ashes only left to mark the scene so lately hallowed by what is nearest on this earth to God, because it is the truest and the humblest—mutual affection and common toil? For the elegancies and refinements of life that have been extinguished and trampled out over so wide a region, so lately one of the gardens of the world, we might be pardoned a sigh; but 'the mother's corpse beside the half-burned cradle of the missing babe,' which so many a desolated hamlet has beheld in France since the summer ripened, demands the tears and the prayers that whole nations shed in pity. Let those rulers weep who feel no blame, but who can hold out the unspotted hand of charity to this stricken people. Let those tremble who, in their troubled dreams, beholding such a ruin, and feeling the reproach of conscience, already hear the avenger coming, 'who treadeth the wine press of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God!'"

L. C. T.

The Suggestion.

It will be remembered that a suggestion was last week made by Br. Grim, to temporarily omit the issue of every other number of the paper, on account of the editorial labor, in addition to our own business as a merchant, being too heavy a strain upon our energies. By all from whom we have heard, the suggestion is approved, and we presume there will hardly be two opinions among our friends, on the subject.

There are nevertheless several reasons why we would prefer not to adopt such a course, unless ill health necessitates it. Not the least of these reasons is the fact that hundreds of our friends, who feel the deepest interest in the welfare of the Editor, are so situated that they have no means of information respecting his state of health, other than the paper. To all such it must be a great deprivation not to receive the paper oftener than semi-mothly. Some of the other objections are no less important.

There are, as Br. G. states, grave considerations why the paper should not, for a time, be issued weekly, and deference to those considerations may induce us to occasionally omit a number. Our friends, and patrons of the paper need not, therefore, be surprised if it shall sometimes fail to make its accustomed visits. This, however, shall not occur any oftener than stern necessity compels, and may not occur at all. Trusting in the Lord, we desire and design to do our duty each day as we have strength given. The rest we leave in the hands of him who doeth all things well.

The Christian Race.

"Looking unto Jesus."—Heb. xii. 1-13.

Under the similitude of men running in a race we are here advised by the apostle Paul to lay aside every weight, or encumbrance, and the sin which does so easily beset us, to run with patience, "Looking unto Jesus, the author and finisher of our faith." This common sense advice is given also by Peter (1st Epis. i. 13,) "Gird up the loins of your mind, and hope to the end." We run for life, and we should run unencumbered.

The sin which most easily besets us—the parent sin it may be called—is that ever-recurring desire to do our own will rather than the will of God. We know that our own ways are not as God's ways, nor his thoughts as our thoughts, yet, despite this conviction, we are constantly beset with this sin, springing not so much from obstinacy as from pride, ignorance, or self-sufficiency. It is natural to like our own way; but this way, unless it is also God's—which can be learned chiefly from his word—is sure to lead us into evil. Self-conceit has the effect of obscuring the designs of God, and rendering us oblivious both of his promises and threatenings: it weakens us for his service, so that we run without spirit: it is, moreover, subversive of that faith by which we have "fled away from the corruption that is in the world."—2 Pet. 1-4. As seekers after immortality we must, then, have no will but God's will.

"Lay aside every weight." One heavy clog upon our movements consists of the cares and anxieties of life, and one pressing form of these is the necessity of providing for the future wants of ourselves and families. Well as we know theoretically, and perhaps experimentally, that God is the preserver of his people, and that he is always at hand, so that we need be careful for nothing, yet will a natural instinct, or distrust of God, or perhaps custom and bad example, draw us aside after what the world calls the "main chance"—in other words, mammon. Somehow or other we contrive, like Martha, to be careful and troubled about many things. We see daily proofs of the truth of the Lord's saying, "The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light," and we should endeavor to imitate these wise ones so far as to strive with our whole soul and strength, in order to the attainment of the "true riches," which we profess to seek after. Not that it is wrong to have a little forethought and provide for one's own; but an over-anxiety and carefulness, a half-repressed wish and thought, that all things around us shall remain stable and secure, tend grievously to confine our energies to this perishing state, and constitute the "weight" which we are to cast aside. They create doubts in the mind, which, like exhalations, render our way obscure, and hide from our eyes the "Sun of righteousness," to whom we should look.

Another weight, which impedes us in our course, is the undue indulgence of our appetites—that is, excess in eating, drinking, slumbering. This weight adjusts itself so nicely to our natural strength that we are scarcely conscious of its existence. But we all carry it, more or less. The indulgence of these appetites tends to foster a dull, sluggish habit of body and mind, whereby our energies are cramped, our conceptions are rendered poor and fruitless, and the hope set before us is obscured. By intemperance in any shape, the thoughts are forced into a worldly, fleshly channel; soon the inert spirit finds pleasure in the ignoble ease of captivity—captivity to sin! Temperance in all things best preserves the vigor of the man, and will help to keep him in the best possible condition for hearing and understanding what is the will of God. "He who striveth for the mastery is temperate in all things."—1 Cor. ix. 25.

We are also fearfully obstructed in our Christian course by the improper exercise of our passions. He is strong who has them under due control; "he who has no rule over his spirit is like a city without bars or gates." As for the man "who is hasty in his spirit," the melancholy truth appears on the page of Scripture, "there is more hope of a fool than of him." What self-condemnation! What misery! What remorse! do many suffer through yielding to envy, anger, or malice. What burning blushes of shame will mantle the cheek of many, when they bring to recollection some past actions of their history, when their passions led sober reason captive. If it were possible, would they not restore, at almost any price, the time now gone forever, that their course might be amended? The indulgence of the passions darkens and perplexes a man's way, and too often leaves him in such a position that he must either renounce the hope of immortality, or recommence the Christian race with diminished strength and hope. O what tyrants these passions become! Is the reader one of their slaves?

There is yet another weight—a burdensome one no doubt—one, however, that must be laid aside. It is this:—Impatience at the vexations we meet in this changeful world; or rather, it is a want of due submission to the divine operations and oversight. Could we get rid of this weight, we would esteem others light in comparison and easily parted with. But we must lay it aside and become patient, watchful and prayerful. Patience and perseverance are twin sisters. It is here that Paul, after having cited a cloud of witnesses, who were all eminent examples of suffering patience, quits the line of direct prec pt and points to Jesus; Heb. xii. 1. He says, verse 3, "Consider him who endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be wearied and faint in your minds." He tells them, moreover, that their troubles are intended as chastisements, and are proofs of the love of their heavenly Father. Now, as we know that "all things work together for good to those who love God," it will be our wisdom to look upon such things as cause grief and vexation—which tend to abate our pride and self love,—to expose our ignorance to our own eyes—as being only the gentle and merciful dealings of our great Parent. "No chastisement for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous; nevertheless afterward, it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them that are exercised thereby," verse 11. If, then, we should be visited with the undeserved scorn or ridicule of our fellows, or with the loss of worldly goods; if sickness should attack and waste our frames, making us desire death rather than life; if through calumny old friends turn cold and forsake us; or if beloved relatives are untimely removed from our side;—if any events such as these do come upon us, undoubtedly we must grieve; not to do so would indicate an unnatural and unamiable disposition, alien from the spirit of Christ, who wept over both the griefs and the follies of men; but we ought to learn cheerful submission to God's pleasure and arrangements, trusting that, with infinite wisdom and goodness, he knows better than ourselves what is good and profitable for us.

If the trials and crosses of this life are received—as they too often are—in a repining spirit, as if we were hardly used, then, indeed, our discontent and impatience, as before stated, become a weight, threatening to stop us entirely in our onward progress. We must consider, first, that we are chastised in measure, as medicine is very carefully dealt out by a skillful physician; and, secondly, that we are so constituted, that affliction has a direct tendency to bring into exercise the virtues which most adorn the doctrine of Christ, and make man pleasing to God—namely, patience, perseverence, hope, joy, peace, confidence, and love. There are few of our readers, probably, but can call to mind some illustration of the wholesome effects of this discipline, and can bear witness that out of deep suffering and sorrow there has been brought forth the quickly sympathizing spirit, ever seeking to pour into the wounded breast the wine and oil of consolation. And of such we may affirm, the spirit has been tamed and taught by adversity—rendered sensibly alive to the claims of all who stand in need of its ministrations.

In a cheerful submission to the events of God's providence, and in a patient endurance of all that his chastening and fatherly hand may inflict upon us, Jesus, the only begotten of the Father, is our exemplar. "Look unto Jesus" will bear us up and on through every trial.

As the Captain of our Salvation, it was necessary that he should be perfected in the school of obedience; Heb. x. 7. Hence he passed through the deep waters of affliction. He became a scoff and a jest! Brutal and unfeeling men surrounded and mocked him. As it is written, "They compassed me about with hatred, and fought against me without a cause. For my love they are mine enemies. I am poor and needy, and my heart is wounded within me: my knees are weak through fasting, and my flesh faileth of fatness. I became also a reproach unto them."—Psa. cix. 2, 4, 22, 25. "Reproach hath broken my heart."—Psa. lxix. 20. Jesus bore unmurmuringly a mighty load of grief, keeping in veiw "the joy that was set before him;" to attain which joy, and that he might be fitted for his Headship, he was subjected to this trying ordeal.

Elijah.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

Has Elijah come, or are we to look for him yet to appear? This is an important question. Important because when Elijah does come he has a special work to do, and a special message to deliver to the people. Every message of this character that God has sent by his appointed agents in the past has been life or death to the people to whom it went; life to those who received the message, death to those who rejected it. Instance Noah, Lot, etc. In a question of so much importance, no carelessness, or love of a pet theory should be allowed to influence us in the least.

In order, therefore, to come directly to the question before us, it is necessary to know what is the work that Elijah is to do when he does come. The only prophecy in the Old Testament that speaks of the sending of Elijah, and the work appointed for him to do, is found in Matt. iv. 5, 6. It reads as follows: Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord; and he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse. The only work marked in this prophecy, that Elijah is appointed to do is "to turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and of the children to their fathers." Any supposition of more than this is an attempt to add to this the only prophetic Scripture that speaks of the coming of Elijah. Let us bear this always in mind, then we shall be saved the trouble of hunting after somebody to do something of which the prophecy does not speak. In Luke i. 5–20 we have an account of the visit of the angel Gabriel to Zacharias the priest, where he announces to him the, to Zacharias, incredible news that his wife Elizabeth shall bear him a son. In declaring the character and mission of John, he says, v. 14, "And thou shalt have joy and gladness; and many shall rejoice at his birth." V. 15, "And he shall be great in the sight of the Lord, . . . and he shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb." Here is an endowment never before received by any child—a baptism of the Holy Spirit from his birth.

In perfect kindness of feeling permit us here to say that, in this respect at least, he was very much the superior of all modern "Elijahs." V. 16, "And many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God." This certainly looks like the work that Malachi declares that Elijah should accomplish. If you turn men's hearts to the Lord their God, as many as are thus turned will most assuredly be turned toward each other. V. 17, And he shall go before him in the spirit and power of ELIAS. There can be no mistake on one point, viz., so sure as Gabriel got it right, John did go forth in the spirit and POWER of Elijah. And for what purpose? "To turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; to make ready a people prepared for the Lord." So Gabriel said, and does it become any of us to dispute his word? Did John fulfil his mission? The question seems almost sacriligious. From whom did John receive his commission? "There was a man sent from God whose name was John."—John ii. 6.

The truth in the matter then is this: God sent John to do a certain work; and that work, according to the declaration of the angel Gabriel, is exactly the work that Elijah was to do. Now unless God made a mistake and sent the wrong man, or Gabriel was mistaken as to his mission, we have the "Elijah message" definitely accomplished by John the Baptist. How vain and presumptuous is it for poor, erring men to undertake to set God's angel right by assuming that he was mistaken. Let us look at other testimony. "For all the prophets . . . prophesied until John." "And if ye will receive it this is Elias that was for to come." "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."—Matt. xi. 13, 14, 15.

But it is urged, that because he was not received by the Jews, therefore he was not the Elias that was to come. What a wonderful idea! And how profound. God sent him with Elijah's commission, but because unbelieving Jews rejected his message, therefore he was not what God sent him to be. On the same principle of reasoning Christ is not Christ, for "He came to his own and his own received him not."—John i. 11. The simple idea in Matt. xi. 14 is this, And if ye will receive what I say, ye will believe that this is he who was to come. According to this view of the text Murdock translates it. "And if ye are willing, receive ye, that this is he who was to come."

The next testimony is found in Matt. xvii. 10, 11, 12, 13: "And his disciples asked him, saying, why then say the Scribes that Elias must first come?" "And Jesus answered and said unto them, Elias truly shall first come, and restore all things." All what things? I answer, just those things that Malachi said he would restore, and no more. "He shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children." This, we have shown by the testimony of Gabriel, John the Baptist came expressly to do. And the angel also said he would do it.

But v. 12 sets the matter forever at rest. It reads: "But I say unto you, that ELIAS IS COME ALREADY, and they knew him not, (just the case with some now) but have done unto him whatsoever they listed. So likewise shall they do unto the Son of man." V. 13, "Then the disciples understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist." Here is an unqualified declaration made by Christ himself, that Elijah had come in his day, and no amount of ingenuity can do it away.

The same testimony is borne of him in Mark ix. 13: "But I say unto you, that Elias is indeed come, and they have done unto him whatsoever they listed, as it is written of him." Where is it written of him? We have seen that there is but one prophecy which speaks of the coming of Elijah, and that is Mal. iv. 5, 6. This, then, is where "it is written of him." Thus, not only does Christ declare that Elijah has come, but also that he has come as the prophet foretold he would come. But it is objected, against all this testimony, that John the Baptist was not the Elijah that was to come, because that, when questioned by the Jews whether he was Elijah, he said, "I am not." Now what shall we do? Shall we take the position that John contradicts Christ? Shall we not rather seek some way to harmonize the two declarations? One thing is sure, Christ has said, over and over, that John was the Elias that was to come, and I should believe it though I could see no way to reconcile John's statement with his so oft-repeated asseverations. John was not the old Elijah who went to heaven in a chariot of fire, but he was the one that was to come. So says Christ, and so said Gabriel and so we believe.

Neither was John that prophet, (whom God was to raise up like unto Moses) still he was "the prophet of the Highest."—Luke i. 76. Yea more than a prophet.—See Matt. xi. 9. Again: it is urged as an objection to the view we take of the Elijah message, that the language indicates that this work immediately precedes the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord. The prophecy reads, "Behold, I send you Elijah the prophet before the great and dreadful day of the Lord come." But we are told nothing about how long before.

Take a perfectly parallel case. The prophet Joel, chap. ii. 28–31, gives a series of events that are to occur before the coming of that same day, and Peter says the first of these events occurred on the day of Pentecost, at the opening, or rather the full and complete bringing in of the present age; and he says it fulfilled Joel's prophecy. I suppose Peter got it right. At any rate I would rather have Peter's testimony on a point of theological truth, particularly as he was commissioned of God especially as an apostle of Jesus Christ, and speaks at this time under the direct inspiration of that miraculous outpouring of the Spirit of God, which was received on the day of Pentecost, than the opinion of any modern writers, or anybody else who would assume to be wise enough to correct him.

Judgment.

BY H. M. BRYANT.

If the theory that we hear so frequently advanced, be true, that all men that have ever lived must appear before the judgment seat of Christ, at his coming in order that their individual cases may be investigated, to determine what their future destiny may be, then there is no possibility of judgment being administered before that time arrives. All judgment must be based upon investigation, and if it be God's arrangement that investigation, decision, and execution be administered at that time such an arrangement cannot be anticipated or forestalled. The foundation of all judgment is investigation, and all admit the justness of the principles, a juryman who is known to have expressed an opinion, or who is prepossessed in any case is disqualified from sitting upon such case.

In all criminal cases there are three phases of judgment. As murder is committed suspicion fastens upon an individual; he is tried, found guilty, sentenced, and finally executed; what is the process that leads to execution? 1st, investigation to ascertain whether he did commit the murder. 2d, decision, or sentence in harmony with existing law. 3d, execution of sentence. If at the coming of Christ, men must pass through the three phases of judgment in order to be rewarded or condemned, by what authority does the Saviour anticipate such an arrangement in the case of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and all the Prophets? He expressly informs us, in Luke xiii. 28, that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and all the prophets shall be in the kingdom of God. Who supposes that the divine judge rendered such decision before trial, or investigation? The idea is absurd, and is at war with every principle of justice. Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and all prophets have already passed through two phases of their judgment. Their case has already been investigated, the decision has been rendered, and sentence has been pronounced by the judge of all the earth. They now await the execution of the sentence, or decision. They have been on trial before the judgment seat. That trial was thorough and impartial, and satisfactory to the judge. Hence all that remains in their case, as they are now dead, is for the judgment to be executed, and they thus made alive and enter the Kingdom of God.

NORTHWOOD NARROWS, Nov. 22, 1870.

Paris, the Babylon of Rev. xviii.

BY C. C. WEBB.

BABYLON, THE MOTHER OF HARLOTS, meets her doom. She sat in the temple of God, and proclaimed herself to be God's Vicegerent on earth, and in four weeks she was as destitute of political power as she is of the fruits of the Spirit. Almost at the same moment the beast that carried her, France, the removal of whose support opened the way for her overthrow, is bearded in his den, and to-day is in exactly the condition described by the angel. The kings of the earth stand afar off lamenting and bewailing her, saying, alas! alas! that great city.

No city on earth can be made to answer the description here given so well as Paris. Look at her merchandise, her traffic with the merchants of the earth, her kinds and qualities of manufactures, her fashions; in fact, unless Paris is worked or stamped on almost any article of luxury, it is not so desirable for market. No man can describe the trade, style, manufactures, habits, voluptuousness, in short the characteristics of the city of Paris as well as they are described in this chapter. And then the position of the nations with reference to the investment of Paris by the Prussians, could not be so well described by any as the pen of inspiration has done. If these are facts, then the event of the siege is plainly described. By the destruction of Paris the prophecy would be fulfilled to the letter. If this is so then we may expect soon to hear the voice of a great multitude saying, Alleluia, for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth.

EAST CONSTABLE, N. Y., Nov., 1870.

Under the Cloud.

How little we know of what God is doing with us! We see half way into His dealing, and think we have looked through. A child, in a telegraph office, sees a man tapping a little brass cap with his finger. He watches the operation; he hears the click of the spring. It seems a simple matter. He thinks he can tell you what the man is doing; and he can, in one sense. The man is making a noise with that little hammer. But ask the operator, himself, and he will tell you, perhaps, "I am selling some stock in San Francisco;" or, "I am calling a man home from New Orleans." The child has hardly begun to see what he is at! He has had a glimpse only of the shell of it. And it is a great deal less than that, often, that we see of God's operations, when we think we see the whole, and are in doubt only about the reasons.

And there is nothing more wholesome for a man than to be made to feel how weak and short sighted a creature he is; and he may know that, but will never feel it, till he is thrown into some deep trouble, and begins looking about to see why God has done it. O there is meaning, then, in the question with which he turns to look upward, "Lord, what was the need of this?" It may in another man be only curiosity that asks that; but in him it is anguish. When the mind puts a question it is one thing; but when, from far down out of the depths of her grief, the heart joins in, it is quite another thing! The mind asks it—the heart groans it.

For the soul's health, if not its life, we must have from God, at times, something to shock us, to stir up in us the sense of awe and mystery, to make us feel how near the other world we are and how like dancing bubbles, in their instability, are all our fortunes. Who would ever make a seaman, sailing in the trade winds by the hundred leagues together, with his helm lashed tight and himself half asleep on the deck? Who would ever learn how to turn life to the best account, drifting on drowsily year after year, with nothing to force his thought inward, or upward to God? This smooth prosperity is treacherous. It draws a man into presumption. It shelters from something uncomfortable, and brings in something fatal—like a steel umbrella that keeps off the rain, but draws the lightning. There is peril in it, and aims to save us from the peril by gracious and merciful troubles.

We know not much of ourselves. We think we are thoroughly conquered, loyal to God all the way down to the bottom of our character. Now a man has different levels of consciousness in him, like the stories of a house. And he is often like a family who own the whole house, but let out all but the upper story, and live in that themselves, and know nothing about the families in the rooms below. You say you have given up your will to God. As far down as you know yourself, you have. But God knows you all the way down. And He wants you to make your own acquaintance. He wants to introduce you to yourself. He sends some piercing grief, that goes down below the upper level of your consciousness. Like an artesian well, it shows what lies below—a hidden unwillingness, after all, to let Him have His own way with you. "God help me!" you cry: "I must crush this, and let Him manage me as He will!" And you do. You bring your own will to give up more thoroughly than ever it had before. And this is only a process of letting in God more fully than ever to inhabit you, and to bring Him life and health and all manner of nobleness and excellence that are possible to a human soul.

There is a certain something that no Christian activity can do for us. There is a fineness of spirit, a quiet depth of character, that no man ever got from all his busy zeal. There must be suffering, for that! No other price will buy it. Christians talk, at times, as if, in affliction, God were not aiming so much to add some new virtue as to prune off some old sin. They say He has a controversy with us, in His chastening. A controversy? There may, in some cases, be that; but must we always take that for granted? Has the harper a controversy with his harp because he strikes it? Has the sculptor a controversy with the marble because he hews it with mallet and chisel? It is a sweeter harmony—it is a finer beauty—that God has in His thought in the sorrow. Not whom He hateth, or threateneth, or contendeth with, but "whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth."—Selected by JANETT MAYO.

Letters and Extracts.

From Clamor Franke.

BR. STORRS: I have so often expressed myself approvingly of our dear HERALD OF LIFE that I deem it superfluous to reiterate to its readers my convictions in this respect. If by the common consent of its patrons the first seven volumes were very good, it has certainly lost none of its former prestige since it has entered upon the eighth one. It comes to us laden with the same precious truth that has ever illuminated its pages with heavenly radiance, "Life future and eternal in Jesus Christ alone," at His appearing and kingdom. So glorious, so sublime a truth will never, to the remotest ages, lose its freshness and power.

Most dearly do I love it, on this account. But I love it too, for the charitable, Christlike spirit that permeates most of its sayings. Its very breath is perfumed with the sweet odors of Heaven, and no one, who has tasted that the Lord is gracious, can fail to be sensible of its stimulus to still greater devotedness and consecration to our blessed LIFE-GIVER. Not the least of my joys are those when, once a week, the loved ones gather around the festive board of the HERALD to feast upon the good things so richly provided there. Absent from the body we meet together in the spirit, and together do we rejoice in the hope set before us in the Gospel, the blessed hope that we shall soon see Him who is our heart's chiefest joy, the chiefest among ten thousand, the one altogether lovely. The fond anticipation that He is nigh even at the door fills us with immeasurable bliss, and we cry out from the fulness of our hearts, "Come Lord Jesus, come quickly."

O the wondrous love of our God! My heart overflows with gratitude for His unspeakable gift. O that men would praise Him for His goodness and for His wonderful works to the children of men.

How sad to me is the thought that there are thousands upon thousands of our fellow men cannot or will be attracted by this love. The god of this world has blinded the eyes of their understanding. They have eyes, but see not Jesus. They have ears, but they hear not the tender, loving voice that speaks to them, in tones of pity: "How oft would I have gathered you, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings but ye would not." Ye will not come unto me that ye might have life. How true it is that we love darkness rather than light, because their deeds are evil. This I conceive is the whole secret of man's unwillingness to come to Jesus. They hate the light because it makes manifest their wickedness. But, blessed be God, He hath commanded the light to shine out of darkness. And it shines in the hearts of thousands of his dear children, and has given them the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.

To us as a people, has light come in wondrous splendor, while others are groping their way in comparative darkness. Of us therefore more than of any others ought it to be said that we have renounced all hidden things of dishonesty, not walking in craftiness, nor handling the word of God deceitfully, but that by the manifestation of the truth in our lives, we commend oursolves to every man's conscience in the sight of God. We may be subjected to the scorn and contempt of those who know not the truth, but let us not heed that, for "our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." Let us keep the bright crown of life in view and not mind the scoffs and sneers. We know in whom we have believed, and we know that He is able to keep that which we have committed unto Him until the day of recompense. Take courage, then, ye valiant soldiers of the cross, and keep your armor bright. Fight the good fight of faith. Be steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as you know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord.

The subtlety and the wiles of the adversary are everywhere apparent. Spiritual wickedness in high places abounds to an alarming extent, and the rulers of darkness are busy. Observing, thoughtful men and women cannot close their eyes to the fact that evil men and seducers are fast increasing, that they are growing worse and worse, deceiving others and being themselves deceived.

Of no body of people is this more true than of the Spiritualists. I listened for two evenings to a debate on Spiritualism, now in progress here between a noted Spiritualist and a Presbyterian minister, from Philadelphia. If ever my eyes were opened to see the wickedness and blasphemy of this monster of depravity they were then. Irreparable ruin must inevitably overtake all that fall into his clutches. This demon is so fully described in 2 Thess. ii., that it is to be wondered at that Christians, as sometimes happens, should be deceived by him. But the awful lie that man is immortal has only come to a head in this mystery of iniquity, Spiritualism. It has existed in embryo ever since the father of lies said in the garden, "Thou shalt not surely die." No wonder then that Christians are deceived by him, since they virtually believe his words. O when will they learn that God only hath immortality, and that He hath given us eternal life in His Son. He that hath the Son hath life, he that hath not the Son shall not see life. There is no other name given under heaven whereby we can live, except Jesus the LIFE-GIVER. They that attempt to climb up some other way are thieves and robbers. It is no small sin to rob Christ of His glory, as the only LIFE-GIVER, and ascribe it to the devil. O when will men cease their wickedness and give glory God.

May God keep us to trust only in Him for salvation. Yours in hope of eternal life though Jesus Christ alone.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.

From George W. Brown.

DEAR BRETHREN: I am still in the field proclaiming "Life only in Christ," and the immediate coming of our Lord Jesus Christ to judge the quick and the dead. Signs are fulfilling, and earth's pillars are groaning. They are sure indications that he whose right it is to reign is about to give the kingdom to the saints of the Most High, and they will possess it forever even forever and ever; or as it is written, "it shall not be left to other people."

When I heard of the sickness of dear BR. STORRS, my heart cried out, good God, spare our brother for the benefit of thy people and thy truth until Jesus shall bring that life and immortality to his people, which is brought to light in the gospel.

O how glad I am that I ever saw the light on these glorious truths. They show the plan of redemption so clear, consistent and heavenly. They clear the smoke of the bottomless pit that has so long blinded men, and clothed Christ's two witnesses in sackcloth for a thousand two hundred and three-score years.

Brethren, let me say do not lose your confidence, which hath great "recompense of reward." Confidence in what, you ask? I answer, in these great truths which have brought us out from the traditions of men, and have shown us the difference between the chaff and the wheat, between the word of God and the fables of these last days. Now when we read, "the wicked shall be turned into hell," we understand it means the same place where Jesus was not left. Them that have no part in Jesus will be left. Job expresses it, "they shall remain in the congregation of the dead." Daniel says: "God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave, for he will receive me." He believed the only hope of redemption from death was that the Lord would receive him. This is in perfect harmony with Jesus' words: Whosoever seeth the Son, and believeth on him, may have everlasting life, and I will raise him up at the last day. This is redemption. This is salvation. It is bringing man out of his lost state. Amen.

BR. STORRS: I write to let you know I am still alive, although I have been very sick. When I grew better I went to visit my brother and sisters, in the flesh, living in Kentucky. I talked to them concerning the kingdom, and "No life out of Christ." Some said it is a strange doctrine, and some condemned it. I obtained the church in Winchester, the one I formerly belonged to. I showed the people that the kingdom is to be established on the earth when Jesus comes, and that he is taking out of the Gentiles a people to his name. Told them if they wanted eternal life they must come to Christ, and if they do not come to him they will not have life. Again some said it was a strange doctrine.

They were going to have their preacher overthrow my arguments. I gave an opportunity, but they said not a word. Had a good time also at Cold Spring, Ky., presenting the truth to a large congregation. I wish I was able to spend my time in that State, talking to the people. Some of my strong opponents at the start, were my best friends when I left. Some will hear and some will not.

Prayer and Potatoes.

[If a brother or sister be naked and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, "Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled, notwithstanding you give them not those things which are needful to the body, what doth it profit?"—James ii. 15, 18.]

An old lady sat in her old arm-chair,
With wrinkled visage, and disheveled hair,
And hunger-worn features;
For days and for weeks her only fare
As she sat in her old arm-chair,
Had been potatoes.

But now they were gone; of bad or good
Not one was left for the old lady's food,
Of those potatoes;
And she sighed and said, "What shall I do?
Where shall I send, and to whom shall I go,
For more potatoes?"

And she thought of the deacon over the way,
The deacon so ready to worship and pray,
Whose cellar was full of potatoes.
She said, "I will send for the deacon to come;
He'll not much mind to give me some
Of such a store of potatoes."

And the deacon came over as fast as he could,
Thinking to do the old lady some good,
But never for once of potatoes.
He asked her at once what was her chief want,
And she, simple soul, expecting a grant,
Immediately answered, "Potatoes."

But the deacon's religion didn't lie that way;
He was more accustomed to preach and pray
Than to give of his hoarded potatoes.
So not hearing, of course, what the old lady said,
He rose to pray with uncovered head,
But she only thought of potatoes.

He prayed for patience, goodness and grace;
But when he prayed, "Lord give her peace,"
She audibly sighed—"Give potatoes."
And at the end of each prayer which he said,
He heard, or thought he heard, in its stead
That same request for potatoes.

Deacon was troubled—knew not what to do;
'Twas very embarrassing to have her act so,
And about those carnal potatoes.
So ending his prayers, he started for home;
The door closed behind, he heard a deep groan,
"O give to the hungry, potatoes!"

And the groan followed him all the way home,
In the midst of the night it haunted the room,
"O give to the hungry, potatoes!"
He could bear it no longer; he arose and dressed,
From his well-filled cellar taking in haste
A bag of his best potatoes.

Again he went to the widow's lone hut;
Her sleepless eyes she had not yet shut,
But there she sat in the old arm-chair,
With the same wan features, same wan air;
And entering in, he poured on the floor
A bushel or more from his goodly store
Of choicest potatoes.

The widow's heart leaped up for joy,
Her face was haggard and pale no more;
"Now," said the deacon, "shall we pray?"
"Yes," said the widow, "now you may."
And he knelt him down on the sanded floor,
Where he had poured out his goodly store.
And such a prayer the deacon prayed,
As never before his lips essayed.
No longer embarrassed, but free and full
He poured out the voice of a liberal soul,
And the widow responded a loud "amen!"
But said no more of potatoes.

And would you who hear this simple tale
Pray for the poor, and praying prevail?
Then preface your prayer with alms and good deeds;
Search out the poor, their wants and needs;
Pray for their peace and grace, spiritual food,
For wisdom and guidance, all these are good;
But don't forget the petatoes!

The Coming Kingdom.

BY C. A. HASTINGS.

The heading of this article is one half the title of our paper (The Herald of Life), hence presenting an article on this subject will be in harmony with the purport of the title of the paper. The Coming Kingdom; what is it? Is it a spiritual kingdom in the hearts of believers? We answer, no. Is it the Christian Church? We have many reasons for objecting to this. What then is it? The term Kingdom first presents to our mind the idea of a territory, or country where the people are governed by a king. Webster defines it; "Sovereign power, that over which a king bears rule; the territory or country subject to a king."

Never since the days when Nimrod, the mighty hunter, one of the grandsons of Ham, established a kingdom which was called Babel, or Babylon has there a kingdom existed but what has been composed of at least six elements, some have seven. 1st, a territory; 2d, a capitol; 3d, a king; 4th, rulers; 5th, subjects; 6th, laws; 7th, dominion. This Coming Kingdom is interchangeably called in the Scriptures, the Kingdom of God; the Kingdom of Heaven; the Kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Now we purpose, to prove from the Scriptures that this kingdom will have all these seven elements.

1st, then, the territory; where is it located? Is it above the stars, beyond the bounds of time and space? The Scriptures are silent in this direction. We turn to the promise God made to Abraham, and we there find the land of Canaan promised to him and his seed, from the river of Egypt to the great river Euphrates. Stephen says: Acts vii. 5, "And he gave him none inheritance in it, no, not so much as to set his foot on;" yet it was promised him for an everlasting possession. Now to have the word of God true, Abraham must live again from the dead and dwell in the land of Canaan. We read in Dan. ii. 44: "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms; and it shall stand forever." This chapter presents five universal kingdoms on the earth. The fourth is shown to be divided into petty kingdoms and the fifth kingdom that the God of heaven will set up, will break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms. No difficulty then in the locality of this kingdom which the God of heaven will set up. The coming kingdom must then take the place of the previous ones—on the earth. In Dan. vii. 27, we read: "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." This text shows not only the locality of the kingdom, but proves my seventh statement, a dominion which is not the kingdom proper.

We will come to our 2d and 3d statements, capitol and a king. In reading over the history of the past we find recorded in 1 Chron. xvii. 11–14, also xxix. 23, that the Lord once had a kingdom on this earth and that David and Solomon sat upon the throne of the Lord; and that throne was in Jerusalem, the city of the Great King. Zedekiah was the last king that sat upon that throne, and the Lord said to him, Ezek. xxi. 25–27: "And thou profane wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end, thus saith the Lord God, remove the diadem, and take off the crown; this shall not be the same: exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him." God had previously made a covenant with David, as recorded in Psa. lxxxix., and sworn by his holiness that his seed should be established forever and build up his throne to all generations, that it should endure as the sun before God, "It shall be established forever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in heaven." This promise was revealed also to Isaiah. "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given: and the government shall be upon his shoulders; and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, the everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace. Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice, from henceforth and forever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this," ix. 6, 7. Here we find a child is to be born having these various titles, which is to sit on David's throne, and that throne was in Jerusalem, in the land of Canaan. Coming down the stream of time over six hundred years after the overthrow of Zedekiah, we find it recorded, Luke i. 30–33, that an angel appeared to Mary and said that she should bring forth a son and should call his name Jesus. "He shall be great, and shall be called the son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end." A part of this prediction was fulfilled. A son was born; his name was Jesus, and he was called the son of the Highest. But he never sat on the throne of David. He never reigned over the house of Jacob. Yet we believe the word is sure and that he will yet sit on the throne of David, that he will yet reign over the house of Jacob.

When the question was asked by Pilate, art thou a king then? Jesus answered, "Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world." Peter also affirms, Acts ii. 29–32, "Men and brethren, let me freely speak unto you of the patriarch David, that he is both dead and buried, and his sepulchre is with us unto this day. Therefore being a prophet, and knowing that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruit of his loins, according to the flesh, he would raise up Christ to sit on his throne. He seeing this before spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption. This Jesus hath God raised up whereof we all are witnesses." He therefore lives, and so long as he lives, so long there is hope of these promises having fulfilment. He has since declared to John, "I am he that liveth, and was dead, and, behold, I am alive forevermore. Amen." Thus far we have found who the king will be and where the capitol or seat of government will be. Next then, who are the associate rulers? The apostle asserts 2 Tim. ii. 12 "If we suffer, we shall also reign with him." Peter has said of the strangers scattered abroad, the elect, that they are a royal priesthood, a kingly priesthood.

A promise was made to Israel after Moses had brought them out of Egypt. "If ye will obey my voice indeed and keep my covenant then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me, ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests." They did not obey his voice; they did not keep his covenant; they were a stiff-necked people, and for this cause Christ said to the Jews, the kingdom shall be taken from you and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof." This kingdom I apprehend, is the kingdom of priests spoken of by Moses. Peter asked our Lord the question, "Behold, we have forsaken all, and followed thee: what shall we have therefore? And Jesus said unto them, Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed me, in the regeneration," (or restitution) "when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging (or ruling) the twelve tribes of Israel." Luke records something similar, xxii. 28, "Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptation. And I appoint unto you a kingdom, as my father hath appointed unto me; that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." In this we find the apostles have the promise to become associate rulers, sitting on thrones in Christ's kingdom with the twelve tribes of Israel for subjects.

Our Lord tells John on the Isle of Patmos: "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with me in my throne, even as I also overcame and am set down with my Father on his throne. And he that overcometh and keepeth my words unto the end, to him will I give power over the nations and he shall rule them with a rod of iron," etc. Sin and wickedness will not be permitted to reign as it does now. Now, "because a sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil." It will not be so then. It will not be said, "The Fathers have eaten sour grapes and the children's teeth are set on edge. But every one shall die for his own iniquity." A time is looked for, as given in Revelation, when a new song will be sung in which will be said, "Thou hast made us unto our God kings and priests; and we shall reign on the earth." Also in cxlix. Psa., "Sing unto the Lord a new song; let the children of Zion be joyful in glory, let them sing aloud upon their beds; let the high praises of God be in their mouth and a two-edged sword in their hand; to execute vengeance upon the heathen and punishments upon the people. To bind their kings with chains and their nobles with fetters of iron: to execute upon them the judgments written: this honor have all his saints. Praise ye the Lord." Here we not only find rulers but subjects. Thus in proving my fourth statement, (who are the associated rulers?) we have to some extent proved our fifth, viz., who are the subjects? But we will continue on this part a little farther. In Zech. xiv. we read of the left of the nations in the day when the Lord is King over all the earth, which are required to go up to Jerusalem to worship the King, the Lord of Host, and to keep the feast of tabernacles. If they do not go up, there will be judgments poured upon them. This Scripture has not had its fulfilment in the past, therefore I must place it in a future age. Daniel says vii. 13, 14, "I saw in the night vision, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages should serve him." This is emphatic. In the 27 verse it says shall serve and obey him. This cannot be the instantaneous destruction of all those nations: no, no. The Psalmist says, "All thy works shall praise thee, O Lord, and thy saints shall bless thee. They shall speak of the glory of thy kingdom, and talk of thy power; to make known to the sons of men his mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of his kingdom." How can the saints make known to the sons of men these mighty and glorious acts until the kingdom is established? They may talk of their hope, their faith in these things, but that does not fulfil the statement. It must be realized; it must be seen. When this is realized, then will the promise made to Abraham: "in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed," be fulfilled. This promise I assert fearless of any successful contradiction, has never been fulfilled in the past. Now if there is to be a kingdom, king, territory, capitol, rulers, subjects, there must of necessity be laws, which brings me to my sixth statement. I read in Mic. iv. 2, "The law shall go forth out of Zion, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem." Some claim this was fulfilled in the Gospel. But has that accomplished what the law purports? Read the 3d verse, "And he shall judge among many people, and rebuke strong nations afar off: and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up a sword against a nation, neither shall they learn war any more." This again has never had its fulfilment. War and bloodshed and preparing for war has been the order ever since this prophecy was written. Now either this must have its fulfilment before the King comes, or after, in an age to come, or it is of no account whatever. I can place it no where but in an age to come when he shall cause war to cease from the ends of the earth. If so it reveals manual labor. These nations must manufacture their implements of war into implements of husbandry. Then the earth will need plowing and pruning; but who will do the work? Will it be the immortal saints?

In verse 6th we read, "In that day, saith the Lord, (not I) will I assemble her that halteth, and I will gather her that is driven out and her that I have afflicted: and I will make her that halted a remnant, and her that was cast off a strong nation: and the Lord shall reign over them in mount Zion from henceforth, even forever. And thou, O tower of the flock, the stronghold of the daughter of Zion, unto thee shall it come, even the first dominion: the kingdom shall come to the daughter of Jerusalem." I need not multiply texts farther. Therefore, in conclusion, if the texts I have quoted are sufficient to prove that the Lord Jesus Christ is to reign on this earth, they prove also who are the associated rulers. If so, then they equally prove who are to be the subjects. Thus I am compelled to believe in a most glorious future age, and kingdom to come; also an eternal succession of ages.

Prayers too Selfish.—A man once complained to his minister, that he had prayed for a whole year that he might enjoy the comforts of religion, but found no answer to his prayers. The minister replied, "Go home now, and pray, Father, glorify thyself." Reader, are you one of those who find no profit in calling upon God? Ask yourself if your prayers are not all selfish.

Whan Dr. Swift was arguing one day with great coolness, with a gentleman who had become exceedingly warm in the dispute, one of the company asked him how he could keep his temper so well. "The reason is," replied the dean, "I have truth on my side."

Ruling Over Rum.

Col. B—— was a man of amiable manners and well-informed mind. Being much employed in public business which called him from place to place, ardent spirit was often set before him with an invitation to drink. At first he took a social glass for civility's sake. But at length a habit was formed, and appetite began to crave its customary indulgence. He drank more largely, and once or twice was quite overcome. His friends were alarmed. He was on the brink of a precipice, from which many had fallen to the lowest pitch of wretchedness. In his sober hours he saw the danger he was in. Said he to himself one day when alone, "Shall Col. B. rule, or shall rum rule? If Col. B. rules, he and his family may be respectable and happy; but if rum rule, Col. B. is ruined, his property wasted, and his family made wretched!" At length, said he, I set down my foot, and said, "Col. B. shall rule and rum obey. And from that day Col. B. did rule. He immediately broke off from his intemperate habits, and lived to a good old age, virtuous, respected, and happy. Let every one who has acquired or is acquiring a similar habit, go and do likewise.—Selected.

It is said of Melancthon, the celebrated reformer and colleague of Martin Luther, that when he made an appointment, he expected not only the hour, but the minute to be fixed, that the day might not run out in the idleness of suspense.

An accomplished musician, who had been engaged for many years performing at theatres, assemblies, and other places of amusement, on being asked why he relinquished his employment, answered, "Because I cannot look to heaven for a blessing upon it."

The Prayer of Socrates.—O Beloved Pan, and all ye other gods of this place, grant me to become beautiful in the inner man, and that whatever outward things I may have may be at peace with those within. May I deem the wise man rich, and may I have such a portion of gold as none but a prudent man can either bear or employ.—Prayers of the Ages.

To conclude that men are bad because they differ from us in opinion, is to prepare ourselves for the blackest deeds of persecution, did not the civil arm restrian our passions. Hatred has wielded many a sword, and killed many a flame.

Many profess to be trusting God for their eternal salvation, who cannot depend on him with child-like confidence for the necessary supplies of to-morrow.

If you have been tempted to evil, fly from it; it is not falling into the water, but lying in it, that drowns.

It is a good rule to keep silence when angry; for angry words always bring regret.

Children's Department.

"Ye Have Done it Unto Me."

"Mamma, please mamma, can't I give Gracie Russel something?" Little Tessa Howard had been thinking; and the sober thoughts had sent a thrill like the sound of tears in among her yearning words.

She went on answering her mother's questioning look: "Don't you know, mamma, that away out there at the edge of the woods, where there wouldn't anybody else stay, Mrs. Russel and Gracie live?"

"Yes, my child," with conscious uneasiness. "And are they very poor? I never thought much about it."

"But Jesus knows it, mamma, because I've told it over to him in my heart ever so many times since I came home."

"Just back of the little brown house, in the great, still thicket, I gathered my white wild-flowers, and crimson vine-leaves, and velvet mosses to make my basket of; and then I wanted to go in and rest me a little. Pushing away the wild creepers and vine-blossoms, I sat down on the old stone step, and waited. In the darkened room beyond, I heard Gracie say, so despairingly,—

"'It don't seem as if I ever could go to school another day, mamma, or go out to do errands either, because I dress so poorly; for they all shun me, or laugh at me, and set me aside so.'

"How still it was there then! and when Mrs. Russel spoke, it seemed like an angel's voice, it was so sweet and tender:—

"'Seventy times seven.' That was all.

"'O mamma! and it seems as if I had forgiven more times than that already.'

"'Perhaps that is your life-work, my poor darling,—to bear and to forgive. Christ will lay no burthen or cross in your pathway but what he would have you take up for him. Then take it up, from beneath the hem of his garment if need be; though the toiling hands are tired and trembling, it will be a work, accepted, owned, and blessed, though thy Lord may only know of the service and the sacrifice. When I am better, my child, and can work, I hope to get something better for you to wear, so that you can go to the Sabbath School; you have wanted to so long!'

"'O mamma,'—and such a gladness came in her voice now!—'I do so wish I might! I hear the girls telling each other about the beautiful Sabbath School books and papers. O if I could only have some to read,—to read to you, who are so weak and weary! And I have, mamma,'—and I could hardly hear the fluttering whisper,—'I have prayed for this.'

"And the answer seemed so restful!—'We will wait, then, for the promise.'

"And I knew they were both softly crying.

"'Jesus will hear the falling of the tear drops,' I thought.

"And they never knew I had been there."

And Tessa Howard and her mother were crying, too.

"Mamma;" broken and low was the sentence of pleading, for the little girl's lips were quivering still.

"You know what lots and lots of Sabbath School papers I have, just as good as new, and beautiful books: can't I go and carry them over now? And mamma,"—a sweet reverence stealing in among the low, low words,—"won't it be the Saviour's answer to Gracie's prayer?"

The mother could only answer "Yes," under her breath; and, with solemn thoughts in her soul, she said, "You may go, my darling, now; and while you are gathering up your papers, I will fill a basket of nice things for Mrs. Russel. And ask her if she will let Gracie come here some day, and I will see that she has everything she needs, so she can go to the Sabbath School: you have so many things laid aside, still good. I have been very careless and forgetful not to think of this before."

And so the dear child went, with her message and her ministries, with a little cry of joy in her heart.

But she never knew how the Angel of Love walked by her side, and helped her. She never knew how he had listened, that still summer afternoon, that Christian mother's words of faith and forgiveness.

"Well, my child, my darling?" And Tessa Howard, nestling down in her mother's arms, with the dear caressing hand laid upon the loved head, and tenderly putting back the damp curls darkened by tear-drops, answered her—

"Dear mamma, they were so glad! It was so blessed! And Mrs. Russel said, 'God bless you!' and Gracie said, 'God bless you!'" And how solemn the rich woman's words seemed:—

"I know that He sent you. 'Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me,'—just as if Jesus was here, and alone and destitute, and you had given him a cup of cold water, and blessings."

And so, listening, I hear him say, "Ye have done it unto me.'"

"And I am so glad, mamma! and I shall thank him—oh, so many times!—that he sent this little errand by me. I am so glad! 'It is more blessed to give than to receive.'"

"Lift a Little."

One day while walking up the street, I saw a short distance before me, quite a small boy carrying a large bucket. It seemed very heavy, for the little fellow was bending and staggering under its weight; yet he went resolutely forward, only stopping occasionally to change it from one hand to the other.

He was poorly clad, and as he turned his head, I recognized him as the son of a poor widow, who was obliged to work very hard to earn food and clothing for herself and her two little boys. My heart ached for the brave little fellow who was beginning so early to bear life's burdens, and I wanted to help him. "Lift a little," he seemed to say to the passers-by, as he trudged on with his load.

Soon I heard rapid footsteps behind me, and, in a moment, a bright, pleasant-faced boy, the only son of a professor in one of our colleges, passed me. When he reached the littie boy who was still bending under his burden, he stretched out his hand, and taking hold of the bucket, bore on his stronger arm the larger share of the burden, until he reached his own home.

How I honored the brave boy for his kind act! I knew his own heart was beating a happy measure, for we are never so happy as when doing something to make others happy. And as the widow's son went struggling on, I knew his burden seemed less heavy, that for a little it had been borne for him. His heart was lighter, too, because another had showed him kindness, and the memory of that little act would be a bright spot to him in many a toiling day. It cost little, that act of thoughtful kindness, but how much happiness it brought!

Dear children, learn a lesson from the conduct of this noble boy. Do not, because you have kind parents, a pleasant home, and so many things to make life sweet to you, neglect or speak unkindly to those on whom God has not bestowed so much. Help them to bear their burdens in every way that you can, and be willing even to deny yourself to help those in need.

But, perhaps I am writing to some one who is poor and sick. If so, let me say, that even you can be a burden-bearer. Do you not know some one in greater need than yourself, to whom you may give a helping hand? If you have nothing else to give, you can at least give kind words and pleasant smiles to all.

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the origina Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Pric 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of tne first importance, and should allow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is o desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it: and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

THE TRUE HOPE.

BY STEWART CARLISLE.

And every man that hath this hope in him, purifieth himself, even as he is pure."—1 John iii. 3.

JESUS said, "Blessed are the meek for they shall inherit the eearth."—Matt. v. 5. "And we shall reign on the earth."—Rev. v. 10. "New heavens, new earth, and all things new," is the promise, see Rev. xxi. in full. Dan. vii. 27. "And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him." Daniel saw nothing of a kingdom beyond the sky, which men enter at death; but he did say that "many (not all) of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake."—Isa. xxvi. 19. Looked forward to the time when "Thy dead men shall live, together with my dead body shall they arise," but says nothing of going to heaven at death. He does not seem to have understood the promise to point that way. The prophet Habakkuk ii. 14 says: "For the earth shall be filled with the knowledge of the glory of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." He does not lose sight of earth and talk of a kingdom beyond the sky. Zech. xiv. 9. "And the Lord shall be king over all the earth: in that day shall there be one Lord, and his name one."—Zech. xiv. 9. So Zechariah believed in something tangible, and says nothing of flying through the trackless ether at death. Malachi iii. 16, 17 says: "Then they that feared the Lord spake often one to another, and the Lord hearkened and heard, and a book of remembrance was written before him for them that feared the Lord, and that thought upon his name." "And they shall be mine saith the Lord of hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels; and I will spare them, as a man spareth his own son that serveth him," not when they die, and close their eyes on earthly scenes, and the next moment open them in an imaginary kingdom beyond the sky. When Jesus spake of the time that his people should receive their reward he said: "Thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just."—Luke xiv. 14. And in John's gospel we find the Saviour four times, in chapter vi. 39, 40, 44, 54, promising his people "a resurrection at the last day." We must not forget that he told them "that whither I go ye cannot come," so that if he went to heaven, that was just where "they could not come;" but a resurrection they should have at the "last day."

But did not the apostles expect to go to heaven when they died? We shall let them answer for themselves. "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him."—1 Thess. iv. 14. Where are these sleepers, of whom the apostle speaks? Are they in heaven, or are they sleeping in the dust of the earth? That they cannot be in both places at the same time is scripturally and logically true. "For since by man (Adam) came death, by man (Christ) came also the resurrection of the dead."—1 Cor. xv. 21. By Adam, then, came death, not a change of residence, but a return to the dust of the earth from whence he came. How necessary then that some provision be made by which, "if a man die he may live again;" for without this there is no condition so hopeless, so utterly hopeless as death — God's penalty for violated law. "Christ has redeemed us (Christians) from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us."—Gal. iii. 13. Peter makes this fact a matter of rejoicing when he exultingly exclaims, "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which hath begotten us again unto a lively hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, to an inheritance . . . ready to be revealed in the last time," 1 Pet. i. 3, 4, 5, (not when they die). They had been begotten unto this hope of which the apostle speaks in the text. When Jesus had led his disciples out to Mount Olivet, after promising them the gift of the Holy Ghost, as the effectual means by which they were to be his witnesses to men everywhere, "a cloud received him out of sight." And while they looked steadfastly toward heaven, as he went up, behold, two men stood by them in white apparel, which also said, Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus which was taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen him go into heaven.—Acts i. 9, 10, 11. Yes, he shall so come. "I will come again," is the promise. He "shall come again," testifies the angels. With these specific promises in view, and the fact clearly stated by Christ himself that, "whither I go ye cannot come," the second personal coming of the Lord from heaven is an absolute, a positive necessity; for if those who sleep in Jesus are not raised up at the "last day," then they have forever perished.—1 Cor. xv. 18. It is at the day of Christ's appearing that Paul and all them that "love his appearing are to receive the crown of life."—2 Tim. iv. 8. And to those who thus "love his appearing," and look for it, (not for death) "shall he appear the second time without sin unto salvation."—Heb. ix. 28. "When Christ, who is our life, shall appear, then shall ye also appear with him in glory."—Col. iii. 4. "For our conversation" (our citizenship) "is in heaven; from whence also we look for the Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body."—Phil. iii. 20, 21. "But if the spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his spirit that dwelleth in you."—Rom. viii. 11. "Knowing that he which raised up the Lord Jesus shall raise up us also by Jesus, and shall present us with you." 2 Cor. iv. 14. "And God hath both raised up the Lord, and will also raise up us by his own power."—1 Cor. vi. 14.

There being no promise then in the whole Bible of going to heaven at death and no promise of future life for those who fall asleep in Jesus without the resurrection from the dead, an event which cannot possibly take place until the second coming of Christ from heaven, is it any matter of surprise that the apostles never mentioned the subject of dying and going where Christ told them they could not come? Is it any wonder they were constantly talking of his second coming, and the resurrection from the dead? Did they not believe that Christ was "the first-fruits of them that slept," and that "they that are Christ's at his coming," whether they "sleep or wake," are to be made like him, either by a resurrection or translation? Is not this hope of theirs based on the teachings of the prophets, and our Lord Jesus Christ? "Every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as he (Christ) is pure." But then, says the objector, "we now have eternal life in us." That we may have been sealed with the Holy Spirit of promise, which is the earnest of our inheritance, until the redemption of the purchased possession, Eph. i. 13, 14, is true; but Paul tells us in Rom. viii. 24, 25, "for we are saved by hope; but hope that is seen is not hope: for what a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for? But if we hope for that we see not, then do we with patience wait for it." "In hope of eternal life, which God, that cannot lie, promised before the world or (age) began."—Tit. i. 2. "And this is the record, that God hath given unto us eternal life, and this life is in his Son."—1 John v. 11. Now are we content to believe the record, that nowhere speaks of going to heaven at death? Eternal life is the subject of divine promise, and the object of human hope. This was and still is the promise, in its ultimatum, "that God gave unto the fathers," and in this hope Abraham, to whom it was first given, and Isaac and Jacob, to whom it was reaffirmed, and all the prophets and ancient worthies lived; and in the possession of this hope, "these all died in faith, not having received the promise." The question is not, are they all somewhere alive now? but will they have a resurrection at the last day? We are aware there are those who teach and believe that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and all the ancient worthies are now in heaven; that all the righteous dead are not dead at all, but more alive than ever they were, and know more than all the living, notwithstanding the Bible says "the dead know not any thing."—Eccl. ix. 5. Are we wise above that which is written, when we say that the dead, who know not any thing, are in an unconscious state? Are we wise above that which is written, when we say that if there be no resurrection of the dead, then Christ is not risen, and "they which are fallen asleep in Christ are perished?" Is it being wise above that which is written to affirm, "no man lieth down and riseth not till the heavens be no more; they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep?"—Job xiv. 12, Is it being wise above that which is written, when we say that "the heaven, even the heavens are the Lord's, but the earth hath he given to the children of men?" Is it being wise above that which is written, when we say, "the dead praise not the Lord, neither any that go down into silence?" Is it being more wise than others, when we say that "there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest?" Is it not rather the part of wisdom to "believe all things that are written in the law and in the prophets? If so, we cannot believe that the dead are now in heaven. There is not a promise in all God's holy word upon which we can base such a hope.

Now suppose we turn to 1 Pet. iii. 15, and apply his injunction to all Christians in possession of hope. "Sanctify the Lord God in your hearts; and be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you with meekness and reverence." This seems to be perfectly reasonable. Now search the prophets, the law, the teachings of our Lord Jesus Christ, and of his apostles, and when you have found a single promise of going to heaven at death, then with meekness and reverence you can give a reason for such a hope. But such a promise cannot be found in God's holy word, and this renders such a hope a mere delusion. To recapitulate. First, then, "the promise that God gave to the fathers" was not heaven, but the earth, as we have abundantly shown. Second: the promise included their resurrection from the dead, and their complete possession of an everlasting inheritance, "when the kingdoms of this world have become the kingdoms of our God and of his Christ." Third: "the promise includes the second personal coming of our Lord Jesus Christ from heaven, to execute the Father's will that sent him; and that will is "that of all that he hath given Christ he should lose nothing, but should raise it up at the last day." And when the purifying fires of the last day shall destroy death, and him that had the power of death, that is the devil (of evil), then, as in the glorious morn of creation, when God pronounced all his works very good, "and all the sons of God shouted for joy," so will the announcement of the heavenly host, at the first coming of Jesus, find its grand and complete fulfilment at his second advent, when the jubilant hosts of the redeemed shall swell the mighty chorus of "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, and good will to men." This is the "hope of our calling." Upon this hope we can, and do rely; and we know that "the foundation of our God standeth sure, having this seal, "the Lord knoweth them that are his." "For if we be Christ's then are we Abraham's seed, and heirs according to the promise."—Gal. iii. 29.

WILMINGTON, Nov. 3, 1870.

HOW SHALL WE MEET DEATH?

BY A. G. M.

NATURE and revelation agree that death has a sting; that the grave gains a victory over all. The utmost wisdom of man has been used to prolong life, to avert death. The greatest miracles recorded in revelation have been the bringing back of the dead to life; yet all know and feel that they must die; and each asks, How shall death be met?

To me the world presents no spectacle so glorious as old age looking back upon a life spent in doing good—work all done, waiting for rest and resting in hope. Such an one may lie down not to "pleasant dreams," but to a dreamless sleep, and wait for the voice of Him who loses nothing that is committed unto him. But who has done all his work? The moments fly and cannot be recalled. Life speeds away, and where are the results of our work? The mind, that great source and centre of power, too often controlled by passion and avarice, is itself debased and becomes a blight and not a blessing.

(2.) With resignation—Not stupidly, not carelessly, not even stoically. For to be stupid is to be like the brutes that perish; to be careless is to think lightly of God's greatest blessing, life; to be stoical is to summon all our power and blindly resolve that we will not be moved, however great the evil it is to shut our eyes and, without knoweledge of God or the future, meet death as the inevitable. Rather should we feel that when we can no longer help ourselves, Christ shall care for us. We having done what we can, the Master shall receive us at death to be preserved to life eternal.

(3.) We should meet death when it comes—Not before. A Christian ought not to be all his lifetime subject to bondage through fear of death. All duties are of the present. It is not for the Christian to ask constantly, how shall I die? Death may not be our duty or our trial; when it shall be such, then every work being done, we may have faith equal to the emergency.

In a sense, we pass through life carrying a lamp in our hand which dispels the darkness a little before us. There is light enough to show us where to step now, and as we move forward each succeeding step is made plain; but we cannot at once see to the end of our journey. If our light is enough for the present step, why not enough for all that shall follow? and when death is at hand our steps shall not be in darkness.

(4.) In hope—Not of soaring "beyond the bounds of time and space," but in hope of a resurrection, in hope of life eternal beyond, of unknown glory reaching on, on, forever on, Life forever! This encompasses and comprehends all; it is the centre and circumference of all things to us. Ten thousand years of death are but a passing shadow in the light of such a life. What a glorious hope!

(5.) As a rest—This may be wrong, but to the weary, the overburdened and suffering though trusting Christian, death may seem a repose from toil. As the lengthening shadow and setting sun bring thoughts of repose and sleep, so death may seem rest from labor, and care, and trial. And as the weary toiler of the night rises with new vigor to meet the coming sun, so shall the Christian rise from the slumber of death to unfading glory and everlasting strength and joy.

Death has a sting; the grave has a victory, but not forever. The Master hath died and risen again; has overcome death, and will surely take away its sting.

REVERENCE FOR THE SCRIPTURES.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

OFTEN in the past, when we have urged, as evidence on disputed points, the writings of the apostles, we have been told that the teachings of Paul and others, on these points, are not reliable. The reason assigned why the testimony of the apostles is rejected, is that they are opposed to the teachings of the prophets of the Old Testament.

If this statement be correct, there are certain legitimate conclusions that inevitably follow.

First: If the apostles are mistaken on some points, they are liable to be mistaken on all; therefore, whatever they may say, it is not safe to believe it simply because they say it.

Second: This being true, they are not inspired men.

Third: The writings of the apostles are not an infallible rule of either faith or practice.

Fourth: This opinion of the teachings of the apostles places them on a par with the writings and teachings of all other good men, as respects both their inspiration and divine authority.

Is this receiving the Scriptures with that reverence which is their due? But is it true that the apostles do, in a single instance, contradict the old prophets? Is it not rather true that these supposed contradictions merely refute somebody's favorite exposition of prophecy? It is an important fact that no individual was ever caught saying, "Paul is mistaken;" "Peter is untruthful;" "James did not get it right," unless these New Testament writers cross their theoretical track. It is always true, with those who undertake to impeach the testimony of the apostles, that they have a pet theory to save, and it is only because these apostles testify squarely against them that they are dissatisfied with what they say.

There is another important consideration in this matter. These men that arraign Paul, Peter, and other New Testament writers for impeachment, are not the only wise or good men in the world. There are men who are just as honest, conscientious, and capable as they, who differ absolutely with them in their peculiar notions concerning what the prophets teach; and these other men happen to be in exact harmony with the apostles. These men have carefully and prayerfully studied these same prophets, and have honestly arrived at entirely different conclusions from those who find fault with the apostles; and have become fully satisfied that Paul, Peter, Mark, Matthew, and John are right: that a correct interpretation of Old Testament Scriptures shows a perfect and entire harmony between both prophets and apostles. These disputers of New Testament writers should, therefore, at least, manifest extreme modesty in urging their opinions against the statements of New Testament writers. But if it be a mere matter of opinion, the apostles were very much better qualified to judge rightly on any matter of theological truth, than any man who lives at this long distance from the time in which they wrote. They were certainly men of intellect; they were of the same nation as the prophets, and understood the full force and meaning of their own native language, in which the prophets wrote and spoke; and above all, for years they sat under the teachings of him who was sent of God to be "the light of the world." So then, if these apostles merely gave expression to what was their judgment as to the teachings of the Old Testament, their opinions, even, would be superlatively more valuable to us than those of any modern theological disputant. But are the teachings of the apostles merely a giving of their opinions? or is there rather a divine, an inspired authority in their writings and teachings? These questions the word of God must settle. First: The apostles were chosen of God to bear testimony concerning the truth. Acts x. 41: "Not to all the people, but unto witnesses chosen before of God, even to us, who did eat and drink with him after he arose from the dead." V. 42: "And he commanded us to preach unto the people." John xv. 27: "And ye also shall bear witness, because ye have been with me from the beginning." Acts i. 8: "But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth." The apostles have been unconscious in death for eight hundred years, consequently the only way in which they can witness to the uttermost parts of the earth is through their writings. Were they fully qualified for this work, and so qualified that they would give us an infallible code of moral precepts, and theological truth? Let us see. John xvi. 13: "Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth: . . . and he will show you things to come." V. 14: "He shall glorify me: for he shall receive of mine, and shall show it unto you." V. 15: "All things that the Father hath are mine: therefore said I, that he shall take of mine and shall show it unto you." John xiv. 26: "But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things, and shall bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever I have said unto you." From the above Scriptures we learn that the apostles were divinely sent, and qualified to both speak and write the truth, yea all the truth. Is it not, then, unwise in any man to set his opinions above these inspired men?

But says one, "Paul was not among the twelve." Paul was an apostle, and "not a whit behind the very chiefest of the apostles." See 1 Cor. ix. 1, 2, and 2 Cor. xi. 5. Again: Paul's writings are, by New Testament authority, reckoned among "the other Scriptures." See 2 Pet. iii. 16.

But Paul was also divinely called, and divinely qualified. All who will take the trouble to read Acts ix. and xxii. will find the following facts distinctly stated. First: When Paul was stricken down, on his way to Damascus, God directed him to go to Damascus for the purpose of receiving all necessary instructions as to his mission. Second: He had also directed, and fully qualified Annanias to deliver these instructions to Paul. These instructions were as follows, "The God of our fathers hath chosen thee, that thou shouldest know his will, and see that Just One, and shouldest hear the voice of his mouth." "For thou shalt be his witness unto all men of what thou hast seen and heard."—Acts xxii. 14, 15.

But the Lord said unto him, (Annanias) go thy way: for he is a chosen vessel unto me, to bear my name before the Gentiles, and kings, and the children of Israel.—Acts ix. 15. Again: Paul received this commission direct from the Lord. "And he (the Lord) said unto me, depart, for I will send thee far hence unto the Gentiles."—Acts xxii. 21. See also Acts xxvi. 16: "But rise, and stand upon thy feet, for I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness both of these things which thou hast seen, and in those things in which I will appear unto thee." V. 17: "Delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom I now send thee." V. 18: "To open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, that they may receive the forgiveness of sins, and inheritance among all them that are sanctified by faith that is in me." The apostles hold the highest position in the New Testament church. "And God hath set some in the church, first apostles."—1 Cor. xii. 28. "And the wall of the city had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb."

The apostles occupy as high a position in power and authority as the prophets. "Therefore, said the wisdom of God, I will send them prophets and apostles, and some of them they shall slay and persecute."—Luke xi. 49. "Which in other ages was not made known unto the sons of men, as it is now revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets by the Spirit."—Eph. iii. 5. "That ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy prophets, and of the commandment of us the apostles of our Lord and Saviour."—2 Pet. iii. 2. "Rejoice over her thou heaven, and ye holy apostles and prophets, for God hath avenged you on her."—Rev. xviii. 20. "And are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner stone."—Eph. ii. 20.

These Scriptures do most clearly teach us that on the great principles of divine truth given to the children of men, through the teachings of the prophets and apostles, the church of God is builded. With this testimony before us, is it not passing strange that men who claim to be walking under the blaze of all the light that is shining on the path of the church in the day in which we live should attempt to invalidate the testimony of those men whom God has directed, qualified, and inspired, to give the light of truth to a lost race of men; and that, too, merely because their teachings are in the way of something "we" want to believe? We are well convinced that this is a dangerous path, and our only safety lies in shunning it altogether. Better, far better is it to relinquish any view that may happen to be held than attempt to save them by disregarding God's chosen, inspired witnesses.

Genuine humility will lead us to bow in hearty submission to every precept and principle of truth found in the Holy Book, whether it was written there by prophets or apostles, or by the Son of God himself. So may it ever be with us all, till we come to that perfect day, when all darkness and obscurity shall have passed away. Then shall we, in a perfected judgment, see all things right.

LET THY HEART BE FILLED.

BY A. N. BLAKE.

OPEN thy mouth, (thy heart) and I will fill it. Who will fill thy heart for thee? Thy heavenly Father, who careth for and gave His Son to die for thee. He who is thy life, thy wisdom, thy full supply for all thy wants, and says to thee, his child, Ask of me. Thy joy may, if thou wilt, be full. He will fill thee with holiness, full reliance on his promises: fill thee with faith in Christ's great sacrifice, which saves from death, and gives to thee new life again forevermore; saves thee from divers things which doth entangle thee and bind thy heart to things non-essential, and are of men. He will fill thee with the Holy Ghost, to help thee comprehend truth, without which thou must surely fail.

This Comforter will illumine thee and thy new sight, and vision will astonish thee. As thou shalt gaze on Christ, the great salvation, a crucified and risen Lord, thou shalt see he is thy righteousness, thy resurrection, and the Life. And on the resurrection morn he will come again and raise thee from thy grave, and clothe thee with immortality; and thou shalt have new life, a glorious body like unto his own, and thou shalt ever be with him when death is swallowed up in victory.

Watch then thine own heart. Beware of self, lest false construction of God's word deceive thee. And then when Christ fills all thy heart, and thou art wholly his, thou art forever free. That liberty is thine which only they can know, with whom Christ is all in all.

STOCKTON, CAL., Nov., 1870.

A CHRISTIAN COLONY.

ONE of thirty or forty New Englanders, who went out to settle in the Western wilderness, related to Mrs. Child the following particulars. They were mostly neighbors, and had been drawn to unite together in emigration from a general unity of opinion on various subjects. For some years previous, they had been in the habit of meeting occasionally at each other's houses, to talk over their duties to God and man, in all simplicity of heart. Their library was the Gospel, their pri sthood the inward light. There were then no anti-slavery societies; but thus taught, and reverently willing to learn, they had no need of such agency, to discover their duties to the enslaved. The efforts of peace societies had reached this secluded band only in broken echoes; and non-resistance societies had no existence. But with the volume of the Prince of Peace, and hearts open to his influences, what need had they of preambles and resolutions?

Rich in God-culture, this little band started for the far West. Their inward homes were blooming gardens; they made their outward in a wilderness. They were industrious and frugal, and all things prospered under their hands. But soon wolves came near the fold, in the shape of reckless, unprincipled adventurers; believers in force and cunning, who acted according to their creed. The colony of practical Christians spoke of their depredations in terms of gentlest remonstrance, and repaid them with unvarying kindness. They went farther—they openly announced, "You may do what evil you choose; we will return nothing but good." Lawyers came into the neighborhood, and offered their services to settle disputes. They answered, "We have no need of you. As neighbors we receive you in the most friendly spirit; but for us your occupation has ceased to exist." "What will you do, if rascals burn your barns, and steal your harvests?" "We will return good for evil. We believe this is the highest truth, and therefore the best expediency."

When the rascals heard this, they considered it a marvellous good joke, and said and did many provoking things, which to them seemed witty. Bars were taken down in the night, and cows let into the corn-fields. The Christians repaired the damage as well as they could, put the cows in the barn, and at twilight drove them gently home, saying, "Neighbor, your cows have been in my field. I have fed them well during the day, but I would not keep them all night, lest the children should suffer for their milk."

If this was fun, those who planned the joke found no heart to laugh at it. By degrees a visible change came over these troublesome neighbors. They ceased to cut off horses' tails, and break the legs of poultry. Rude boys would say to a younger brother, "Don't throw that stone, Bill! When I killed the chicken last week, didn't they send it to mother, because they thought chicken-broth would be good for poor Mary? I should think you'd be ashamed to throw stones at their chickens." Thus was evil overcome with good; till not one was found to do them wilful injury.

Years passed on, and saw them thriving in worldly substance, beyond their neighbors, yet beloved by all. From them the lawyer and the constable obtained no fees. The sheriff stammered and apologized, when he took their hard-earned goods in payment for the war tax. They mildly replied, "'Tis a bad trade, friend. Examine it in the light of conscience and see if it be not so." But while they refused to pay such fees and taxes, they were liberal to a proverb in their contributions for all useful and benevolent purposes.

At the end of ten years, the public lands, which they had chosen for their farms, were advertised for sale at auction. According to custom, those who had settled and cultivated the soil, were considered to have a right to bid it in at the government price, which at that time was $1 25 per acre. But the fever of land speculation then chanced to run unusually high, Adventurers from all parts of the country were flocking to the auction; and capitalists in Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, were sending agents to buy up western lands. No one supposed that custom, or equity, would be regarded. The first day's sale showed that speculation ran to the verge of insanity. Land was eagerly bought in at seventeen, twenty-five, and forty dollars an acre. The Christian colony had small hopes of retaining their farms. As first settlers, they had chosen the best land; and persevering industry had brought it into the highest cultivation. Its market value was much greater than the acres already sold at exorbitant prices. In view of these facts, they had prepared their minds for another remove into the wilderness, perhaps to be again ejected by a similar process. But the morning their lot was offered for sale, they observed with grateful surprise, that their neighbors were everywhere busy among the crowd, begging and expostulating! "Don't bid on these lands! These men have been working hard on them for ten years. They are always ready to do good for evil. They are a blessing to any neighborhood. It would be a sin and a shame to bid on their land. Let them go at the government price."

The sale came on; the cultivators of the soil offered $1 25, intending to bid higher if necessary. But among all that crowd of selfish, reckless speculators, not one bid over them! Without one opposing voice, the fair acres returned to them! I do not know a more remarkable instance of evil overcome with good. The wisest political economy lies folded up in the maxims of Christ.—K. A.

THE eminently pious Richard Baxter, after he had spent many years in the advancement of the glory of God, by laborious and constant preaching, unceasing pastoral labors, and numerous publications from the press, was yet unwilling to give himself ease, even amidst the infirmities of disease and age. An old gentleman, who heard him preach, related, that when he ascended the pulpit, with a man following him to prevent his falling backwards, and to support him, if needful, in the pulpit, many persons would be ready to say he was more fit for a coffin than for labor; but all this he would soon forget, and manifest the fervor and energy of youth in his labors. It was feared, the last time he preached, that he would have died in the pulpit. And yet, such was his humility, that when reminded of his labors on his death-bed, he replied, "I was but a pen in God's hand, and what praise is due to a pen?"

EXAMPLE OF THE EARLY CHRISTIANS.—"Justin Martyr, one of the earliest writers, in his 'Apology' to the heathen in behalf of the Christians, says: 'We who once hated and murdered one another, we who would not enjoy the hearth in common with strangers, on account of the difference of our customs, nor live in common with them, since the appearance of Christ; we pray for our enemies; we seek to persuade those who hate us unjustly, that they may direct their lives according to the glorious doctrines of Christ, and may share with us the joyful hope of enjoying the same privileges from God the Lord of all things.'"

A CHRISTIAN widow in London saw with great alarm, her only child taken dangerously ill. As the illness increased she became almost distracted, from a dread of losing the child; at length it became so extremely ill, and so convulsed, that she kneeled down by the bed, deeply affected, and in prayer said, "Now, Lord, thy will be done." From that hour the child began to recover, till health was perfectly restored.

THE EDITOR'S HEALTH.

THE following, from one who has been very much with the family of our afflicted brother, assisting them in their efforts to relieve and restore the sufferer, will give our readers a more correct idea of the real condition of the Editor throughout his illness than has been afforded them:

HAVING been much with Br. Storrs since the beginning of his present illness and especially during the past eight days, every night of which I have been with him, assisting his dear family to minister to his comfort, I feel like informing the many interested ones more minutely as to his condition.

Between four and five weeks ago he was taken with a hard, rending cough, and we tried different methods to make him perspire, his skin being dry and burning, but all to no purpose. Then his family employed a physician who was very attentive, and did all in his power, but Br. S. kept going down. About two weeks ago the doctor felt uneasy about him, and desired his family to call in more skill, for their own and his satisfaction. One week ago to day a second doctor came, examined him, and said his lungs were much diseased, and that he could not get well. Not satisfied yet, we brought a third one. Dr. E. P. Miller of 41 West 26th St., N. Y. He also examined him, but pronounced much more favorably.

The family desired Dr. M. to take the case in hand. He told them his skin was congested, dry, and entirely inactive, and he needed to have it brought into a proper condition so as to bring the blood to the surface, open the pores, and relieve him in that way. Dr. M. was very unwilling to take the case as he lived so far off, and it would consume so much of his time every day, about four hours, and would of course be expensive to the family. Still he took it. The first two or three days there was a decided improvement, and all were hopeful, but about the middle of the week, he had a slight chill two or three times, and at other times was very hot. He was also very restless, and extremely tired. Two mornings he said he did not think he could live through another such night. Yesterday afternoon he felt his work on earth was done, and gave Br. L. C. Thorne some messages and directions about his affairs. The Dr. came in the evening and worked over him from one to two hours, as usual, and said he was nearing a change. He slept very sweetly last night and felt comfortable in the morning. To-day he has been comfortable and quiet all day, and has been moist with free perspiration, the first time since he was taken sick. His pulse has uniformly been very full and quick, varying from one hundred to one hundred and twenty. He has had no appetite whatever, from the first, still some of his symptoms are decidedly favorable this evening, but we do not want to hope too much.

I ought to have said that his disease has been bronchial affection and he has had a hard cough all through, although it is not nearly so bad as it has been. Throughout his sufferings, he has felt perfect submission to the will of God, and one time said, "I am afraid the brethren and sisters will pray for me unconditionally." Perfect harmony with the will of God is his only desire. This morning he sent his love to some and said "tell them to stablish their hearts, for the coming of the Lord draws nigh. We believe it is drawing nigh."

Thus we leave him again this evening in the hands of our kind Father, knowing all will be well, still, like our blessed master, we say Father if it be possible let this cup of death pass from Br. Storrs; nevertheless not our will but Thine be done.

BROOKLYN, Nov. 4, 1870.

TUESDAY, A. M.—There has been little change since the above was written. He did not rest so well Sunday night, in consequence of which his symptoms were yesterday not so encouraging. Last night he rested quite as well as any night since the commencement of his illness, and this forenoon, as we go to press, he is quite comfortable. L. C. T.

EUROPEAN NEWS.

THE past week has been a stirring one throughout Europe. The contending forces in France have been vigorously prosecuting their work of carnage, while the great activity in all diplomatic circles has kept every court upon the tip-toe of excitement.

Some heavy battles have been fought, but thus far no important change in the positions occupied by the two armies has taken place. The army of the Loire commenced an advance movement on the morning of the 1st inst., and a pretty severe battle was fought, lasting until nightfall, when the Prussians retired with, it is said, heavy loss, that of the French being much less. Accounts of operations in this department during that and the succeeding day are somewhat conflicting, both sides claiming victories. It is not unlikely that while some divisions of the French were successful, others met with reverses, and failed. Garibaldi's command was attacked by the Prussians on the 30th ult., but after some hours fighting the latter were repulsed.

A dispatch dated Berlin, Dec. 2, states that Gen. Von Der Tann, who, it will be remembered, was defeated by the French, a few days ago, has defeated that part of the army of the Loire directly opposed to him, after several successive battles west of Orleans and Tours. The same dispatch states that nearly the whole of the French forces are concentrated between Blois and Tours. While these events have been transpiring at the south of Paris, others of even greater importance have occurred in the immediate vicinity of the, apparently, doomed capital. Formidable sorties have been made, but, aside from driving the besiegers from some of their more advanced positions, little was accomplished except destruction of life, all the attempts ending in discomfiture. The following dispatch was sent by King William to the Queen:

"The Sixth Corps yesterday repulsed a sortie of the French near L'Hay, on the south of Paris. Over 100 French prisoners were taken, and several hundred dead and wounded were left on the field. The French also made sorties on the positions of the Wurtembergers and Saxons at Bonneuil, Champigny, and Villiers, to the east and south-east of Paris. The positions were taken by the French, but were subsequently retaken by the Prussians. At the same time sorties were made at the north and west, and at St. Denis against the Fourth Corps and the Guard.

"The French were repulsed and driven back behind their works in all cases."

The French have relied upon being able to form a junction between Gen. Ducrot, of the Paris defence, with his army of something over one hundred thousand men, and the army of the Loire, but all attempts to accomplish this having failed, it is difficult to see how Paris can much longer stand. Capitulation, with or without bombardment, seems inevitable.

A New York city journal, daily, publishes the following dispatch: "The Prince Moskowa, at Cassel, states that the alleged agreement between Napoleon and the King of Prussia, as to a peace after the conquest of Paris never existed or was ever contemplated." If this be true, it is strongly indicative that the claim that Bismarck is and has been intriguing to effect the re-establishment of the Napoleonic dynasty is without foundation. It now seems probable that the threatened rupture between England and Russia will be averted, latest advices confirming the report respecting a conference of the various powers to consider and, if possible, arrange points of dispute.

Cable dispatches of to-day, Monday, are to the effect that most of the powers have signified their willingness to meet in Congress. It is also reported that the sorties about Paris resulted in the capturing and holding of positions from which the Prussians say the French must be dislodged at any cost. The crisis seems imminent. ADVANTAGE OF WELL-DIRECTED EFFORTS.

IT sometimes happens that efforts to spread truth are characterized by too much of a spirit of contention, of noisy strife, of desire for triumph in debate; by too little of a showing forth of the power of truth by lives adorned and beautified with all the Christian graces. Religious reformers may succeed through mere intellectual force, in introducing many to a knowledge of gospel truth, but their labors will be rewarded with far greater success if their lives are marked by clear evidence of attainment unto that high degree of Christian perfection to which the truth is believed to be largely instrumental in enabling the possessors and lovers of it to reach.

Every person who labors to spread long-neglected gospel truth among fellow-christians should prayerfully and diligently strive to excel, in Christian faithfulness, those lovers of Jesus whom we seek to bless by bringing them to a knowledge of the truth. There are many devoted souls who cannot be persuaded by any consideration of simple theological reform, to search the record in order to ascertain whether what they believe, so far as they believe any thing in a positive degree, is sustained by Scripture testimony. They are perfectly satisfied to tread the path their fathers trod, and to reject everything which formed no part of their fathers' faith, and yet, let those very people come in contact with those who afford evidence of greater spiritual development than themselves have experienced, and let them be assured that the marked freedom of spiritual growth is produced by the sanctifying power of the truths they regard suspiciously, and more will have been accomplished in the direction of inducing in them a love for and acceptance of the truths we so much prize, than can be done in long years of mere intellectual effort, or effort of any kind which does not strictly and unquestionably comport with that true and deep religious experience which must mark the lives of all who zealously keep their faces directed toward an attainment unto Christian perfection.

Every lover of Jesus who is thus consistent can and will preach the truth effectively. They are enabled to appeal not alone to the intellectual perceptions, but also to the more delicate and sensitive spiritual faculties for apprehending divine truth, which not only sway the intellectual, but, centering deep down in the heart, touch the well-springs of faith and love, and induce more earnest yearnings after ought that may tend to promote growth of spirituality. Thus shall we be richly blessed in our efforts to lead others to a more perfect knowledge of divine truth, and thus shall we more effectually glorify God, and exalt the precious name of the Lord Jesus Christ, our resurrection and our life. Many an earnest and pure-minded Christian of great promise, possessing well-ripened and keen powers of intellect, but failing to understand self, and trusting too much to mental force, and hence too little to those powers which proceed from an entire consecration of all we have and are to Christ, has well-nigh labored in vain, and, perhaps, what is worse, has brought reproach upon the cause he has espoused.

If the practice of every Christian virtue is essential to success in winning professing Christians to the truth, it is surely no less so in turning sinners to repentance. The impenitent are more quick to discern shortcomings and inconsistencies in those who seek to turn them from the evil of their ways than are professed followers of Christ to apprehend them in one another, and they are, moreover, far more likely to judge uncharitably. Hence the greater necessity, if it be possible for necessity to be greater, for a constant and prayerful watchfulness over self, and an earnest striving to more and more perfectly robe ourselves in the bright and precious garment of holiness. This garment cannot be put on and off at will, as an outward vesture, but must be worn every day, and hour, and moment, and always growing brighter and brighter. Better, far better, that one never open his mouth in behalf of gospel truth, than to open it in ought of other than the power of the Spirit of truth. If this Spirit dwell in us, and enlighten us, and guide us, we shall become ensamples to all them that profess to believe the truth; and then shall we bring many unto Christ.

As soldiers of the cross, we must learn to skilfully wield that weapon of all weapons, the sword of the Spirit. And this, to be effectual, must be wielded by thoroughly consecrated hands. Careful shall we be to adopt only fruitful means of service if we keep always in view the fact that the time is not far off when "they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars forever and ever." God help us all so to labor. L. C. T.

WANDERING THOUGHTS.

THE existence of "Wandering Thoughts," as they are popularly designated, constitutes one striking feature in the action of mind, which it is useful to understand, for our own satisfaction, as well as for the comfort of others. There is a confused tendency in the mind to wander from the subject of meditation,—a tendency especially observed by pious men, during their hallowed exercises. They feel their minds liable to shift to another topic, or, in other words, foreign ideas thrust themselves on their notice, and the contrast between these and the selected topics of reflection, along with all exemplary fear of sin attracts the attention, and excites many painful emotions.

The leading and characteristic element in these ideas is, they are involuntary. The result of self-reflection is, they come unsought, and in many cases remain unasked, at least when no conscious effort is made to retain them. Were the mind only capable of voluntary thought, it might wander just as we know it does, still it then would be intentional aberration, and not such as is experienced and lamented in its present constitution and mode of action. So far are these specific thoughts from being intentionally conceived, that the complaint is, they spring into being independent of the will, and, for a long time, cannot be ejected or forgotten. If the will had full authority over them, they would never be admitted, or rather, considering our ignorance of the next idea that will appear, we should affirm, their entrance and exit would be almost simultaneous.

Now, it may be said, are not the greater number of thoughts involuntary? Yes, we admit they are. When walking abroad, or musing at home, the mind generally receives silent permission to roam where it pleases; we have formed no purpose to think on any particular subject, and, of course, are in our thoughts entirely guided by associations, or ideas excited by present sensations. In these circumstances, we are not, however, irresponsible, nor are we free from danger; the thoughts may be foolish, absurd,—they may be even positively sinful. They have undoubtedly entered the mind not by express command, so to speak, but we have permitted the mind to enter into circumstances where they have been formed or suggested, which could certainly have been avoided. Might we not, for example, have restrained ourselves, and directed our faculties to useful, at least innocent subjects, or immediately have withdrawn them from vain and criminal contemplations? If, in the course of these lawless excursions, evil passions and desires happen to be kindled, by their objects being painted on the imagination, it is demonstrably certain, that we are accountable for their present activity, and every item of resulting conduct.

Wandering thoughts, directly so called, are quite a different character, as they enter in totally different circumstances; they occur, not when the mind is luxuriating at ease, on the contrary, they come when it is actively engaged;—not when efforts are employed to avoid them, but when there is a resolution to have all the faculties and emotions absorbed, if possible, by one theme; not merely when it is purposely occupied with moral and religious subjects, but on any one that may engage our attention.

To cast some light on this perplexing subject, let us, in the meantime, consider the spontaneous action of the mental faculties and emotions.

The human mind has not unfrequently been compared to an engine, over which we have perfect control, with more apparent than real truth and propriety. No doubt, we can set the mind agoing, in other words, choose to think on any particular subject, but we are conscious that it often begins of its own accord, and that we can seldom or never bring it to rest when we please. Certain feelings unexpectedly come into existence, certain faculties start into action, we cannot tell how or why; and instantly to subdue these emotions, or change the topic of thought, is completely beyond our power. Let the occasion be most solemn, these internal movements, nevertheless, take place, and we are compelled to attend to them, even though at the expense, for a time, of nobler thoughts and feelings. Were we to consult general experience, we would soon find ample and curious illustration of this singular fact in our constitution. The predominant faculty and passion would, in all likelihood, be most commonly specific, as furnishing examples of involuntary action. On a sudden, the mind was filled with a craving for music, and strange notes were heard within—or for calculation, and figures entered, forthwith, into the various combinations—or places, long since visited came back in all their original freshness—or scenes of surpassing loveliness and grandeur were wrought by the imagination—or fantastic and ludicrous exhibitions presented themselves, causing a momentary irrepressible smile to play on the countenance—or some passion arose in all its energy and absorbed the thinking powers, and obliged them for a while to minister to existence and gratification. We are persuaded these experiences are more common than is generally supposed, or perhaps admitted, and it is high time they should be openly and frankly confessed. They will be more common, especially with those who are of a nervous and sanguine temperament, these being most subject to mental activity and excitement.

A very singular and striking example of the unwilled activity of the faculties, in seen in the phenomena of dreaming. During the hours of sleep it frequently happens that thoughts and emotions are vividly excited—thoughts solid and futile, serious and comical, emotions fierce and revengeful, gentle and compassionate. Who has not had such recollections, as he awoke to consciousness during the watches of the night, or at the morning dawn? Need we bring back to any the reminiscences of those days, when they lay in the burning arms of a fever, and scenes and sounds horrible beyond description, occupied, oppressed, nay, even tortured their faculties.

Such are a few instances of spontaneous or unwilled activity; but how they take place, is a difficult inquiry. Sometimes the associating principle may furnish an explanation, but not always. There seems to be some unknown influence of the blood, perhaps also some unknown electric influence, upon the brain, exciting a part, and leaving the rest of that vital organ in a quiescent state. That, at least, both the quantity, quality, and rate of motion in the blood, has an influence on the mind, is a truth fast gaining upon public conviction. Let us glance at some of its more prominent effects. Fainting, that image of death, is occasioned, at any rate attended, by the descent of the blood from the brain, when thought and consciousness cease till it returns. The use of powerful stimulants is well known not merely to excite the sentiments and propensities of our common nature, but to give an impulse, and often a wonderful elevation, to thought and imagination, as when opium is employed. During these moments, the pulse beats with increased speed, and, of course, the blood is propelled through the body with unusual velocity. Moreover, the very act of voluntary thinking and feeling, causes it, in an augmented stream, to enter the brain; for parts of this organ have been seen to expand and subside, with the commencement and cessation of thought and emotion. From these facts, we gather evidence, that the mind by night and by day is often forced, by some internal influence, into the different states of which we know it to be susceptible. Whether it is by the blood that these involuntary movements are produced, it may be difficult exactly to determine, though there is great probability that in the majority of instances, it is the existing physical cause. Account for the facts as you may, their existence cannot be denied, and every one can judge, if ever, how often, and in what forms they are presented to himself.

When these spontaneous movements take place, the thoughts will wander, or leave the topic of present meditation. It may be solemn and awfully momentous, but from it we are imperiously attracted, and some time may elapse before we can renew former contemplations. These revolutions will occur in spite of every exertion we vainly employ to the contrary.

"HOPE."

"And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself even as he is pure."—1 John iii. 3.

JOHN is speaking of a particular hope on this occasion, and its effect upon those who possess it. He describes it as purifying in its effect upon the individual who possesses it. What, then, is this hope of which John speaks, and which is so beneficial to the individual who has it? John describes it as the hope of seeing Jesus when he comes, and of being like him. In order to see him we must be the sons of God: "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us, that we should be called the sons of God: therefore the world knoweth us not. Beloved, now are we the sons of God; and it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure."

John gives us a sure test to be governed by. It is not so much the knowledge and belief in the coming of Christ, as what is the living effect of such belief on the individual possessing it. Does it purify the heart and life of the person? Does it cause him to live nearer to God than do those who are devoid of such belief? John says "he that hath this hope purifieth himself." "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed on us, that we (poor sinners of the flesh) should be called the sons of God." Yes and this is not all there is; something still better is in reserve for us. We shall not only be called the sons of God, we shall see him (Jesus) and we shall see him as he is, the Son of God. Then we shall not only be called sons of God, we shall be, like him, the sons of God. What does he do, who, as John says, has this hope of seeing Jesus as he is, and being made like him? exalt himself? No; He that exalteth himself shall be abased. Do they speak evil one of another? No: He that humbleth himself shall be exalted. Yes, when the Lord comes all God's children shall see Jesus as he is, and shall be exalted to be like him. Therefore every one who hath this hope purifieth himself, even as he—(Christ) is pure. Here is a true criterion to judge by. If we see the influence of the belief of the coming of Christ exerted upon the lives of those who profess such faith, to make them more pure, more godly, more like Christ, we may be assured that such faith is genuine. But on the other hand it matters not how loud some pray and cry come Lord; come quickly; if it has no purifying effect upon their lives, and does not make them better men and women—it is not performing its work, for John does not say it ought to make them purify themselves, and become better, but he says "every man that hath this hope purifieth himself even as he is pure." There is no guess work in this matter. It ought to make them better. Every man that hath this hope does purify himself.

May we each and every one examine ourselves according to the rule which John the beloved disciple has given us, and so may we be prepared to behold the King in his glory.

THE PROPHET THAT WAS TO COME.

BY WM. WOOD.

"Elias truly shall first come and restore all things."—Matt. xvii. 11.

As this passage of Scripture (Christ's own words), has caused much perplexity to the students of prophecy, I present a few thoughts of my own, being at variance somewhat from others who have written upon the subject, yet apparently in harmony with the sacred record. The first query that arises in the mind is, who was Elias? We answer, in the language of our Saviour, "For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John, and if ye will receive it, this is Elias which was for to come."—Matt. xi. 13, 14. Again: "But I say unto you, that Elias is come already; and they knew him not, but have done unto him whatsoever they listed. Then the disciples understood that he spake unto them of John the Baptist."—Matt. xvii. 12, 13. It is evident from the foregoing testimony, that John the Baptist is here alluded to, and is in some manner connected with the Elijah in the Old Testament.

In Mal. iv. 5, 6 we have a prophecy relating to our subject, which reads, "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord. And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers, lest I come and smite the earth with a curse." It was about four hundred years from this since God had sent the Jews a prophet, or made to them any direct revelation. Malachi was the last, and with him the Old Testament revelation closed. As the advent of the Messiah was about to take place new instructions were needed, consequently God opened a way whereby he could commune with his people, not only in regard to our Saviour, but to announce the birth of his forerunner, and what things he was to accomplish.

The first communication found, subsequent to Malachi, is the announcement of the angel to Zacharias, not only in regard to the birth of a son, but that that son would be the instrument used to fulfil what was spoken by the prophet in his fourth and last chapter. We understand from Malachi that Elijah the prophet would come before the great and notable day of the Lord, (which day I believe to be the breaking up and overthrowing of the whole Jewish polity). "And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers." About four hundred years after, while engaged in his priestly office, there appeared unto him an angel, who said, "fear not, Zachariah, for thy prayer is heard, and thy wife Elizabeth shall bear thee a son, and thou shalt call his name John. For he shall be great in the sight of the Lord, . . . and many of the children of Israel shall he turn to the Lord their God. And he shall go before him (the Lord their God) in the spirit and power of Elias, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the disobedient to the wisdom of the just." It is evident from this testimony that Elijah, the prophet, who was literally translated to heaven, could not be the person, as many believe, to fulfil this prophecy, for it was completed in John the Baptist, who came in the spirit and power of Elias; with the same zeal, perseverance and intrepidity of that courageous and undaunted servant of the Most High God. Jesus saith, Elias will restore all things. This is the point of perplexity. In reading the history of the Elijah of the Old Testament, we do not find that his mission was to restore all things at that or any future time, and there is no intimation of his appearing in person prior to the second coming of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The transfiguration on the mount, Moses and Elijah seeming to be present, was evidently a visionary state, showing, not a miniature resemblance of (to us) a future coming kingdom, but the superiority of the life-giving gospel, with those under its benign influence, to the carnal ordinances of Judaism, with its worshippers under the Mosaic economy. Therefore the brilliancy and splendor of the manifestation, as presented to the three disciples, Peter, James and John. The mission of John the Baptist, who came in the spirit and power of Elijah, was not to restore but to prepare all things. When asked, who art thou? he confessed, and denied not; but confessed I am not the Christ. And they asked him, what then? Art thou Elias? And he saith, I am not. Here we perceive that in person he was not Elijah, but he saith, "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness:" "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make his paths straight." This was the sum and substance of the prophecy made concerning him. Isa. xl. 3. John was the harbinger, herald or messenger who came in the spirit, not the person, of Elijah, to prepare the way, or restore all things by placing them in order, showing the need of repentance, that the axe was now laid at the root of the tree, and by this means bring the people into a proper state or condition for the advent of their Messiah. The word restore in our text is used in the sense of prepare. It is so rendered by Murdock, in his Mark ix. 12, which is the parallel passage to Matt. xvii. 11. The coming of Elijah was literally expected by the Jews as a token or sign of the near approach and reign of their Messiah. In this they were disappointed. We find by experience and close investigation of God's holy word, that the same spirit and power manifested in John the Baptist, has again been unfolded by and through the preaching, in these latter days, of the second coming of Jesus Christ. Not Elijah in person, as has been anticipated, but in the fearless and persevering spirit of God's servants, as they proclaim throughout the land that Jesus is coming. These faithful ones have been the heralds or messengers to prepare (not restore) the way of his second advent, and by the blessing of God we find they have not labored in vain.

Dear brethren and sisters, we are nearing home; and when that glorious resurrection morn shall dawn upon the world, when the hope of the Christian shall have become a reality, then, O yes, then will the loud shout of praise and thanksgiving ascend, for deliverance is come. It will be the jubilee of the universe. Death will be swallowed up in victory. O death where is thy sting: O grave where is thy victory?

It will be remembered there was an article in the last number on the same subject as the above. It is proper to state that this was received before that one was published.

GLORIFY GOD.

BY C. R. AND O. A. PERCY.

REMEMBER the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit?"—John xv. 8. When surveying the boundless ocean of covenant mercy, every wave chiming, "God is love!" does the thought never present itself, "What can I do for this great Being who hath done so much for me?" Recompense, we cannot! No more can our purest services add to His underived glory, than the tiny drop of water to the boundless ocean. Yet, wondrous thought! From this worthless heart of mine there may flow a spirit of love and gratitude which he who loves the broken and contrite heart will not despise.

"Herein is my heavenly Father glorified, that ye bear much fruit." The inquiry comes, Are we fruit-bearers in our Lord's vineyard? Are we seeking to make life one grand act of consecration to his glory? We may be unable to exhibit much fruit in the eyes of the world. Our circumstances and position in life may forbid our pointing to any splendid services, or any great work in the cause of God. It matters not. It is often those fruits that are unseen and unknown to man, ripening in seclusion, that He values most. The quiet, meek, lowly walk, patience and submission, gentleness and humility, trusting ourself unreservedly in his hands, willing to be led by him even in darkness, even saying, Not my will, but Thy will. The unselfish spirit; the meekly bearing of an injury, the true spirit of kindness, these are some of the many "fruits" which our Father loves, and by which he is glorified. Perchance it may be with us the season of trial, the chamber of protracted sickness, the time of bereavement, some furnace seven times heated. Herein we may greatly glorify our God. Never is our heavenly Father more glorified by his children on earth than when, in the midst of these furnace-fires, he listens to the gentle breathings of confiding faith and love. Every sigh, every groan is heard, "Let him do what seemeth good to me." Yes, in this we can do more than angels can. They can only glorify God with the crown; ours is with the cross and the prospect of the crown together. If he be dealing severely with us, he, as the great husbandman, is pruning his vines, lopping the boughs, stripping off the luxuriant branches, and digging about us. "He purgeth it that it may bring forth more fruit," and "herein is our Father glorified!"

Be it ours to lie passive in his hands, saying, in unmurmuring resignation, Father, glorify thy name. Let me know no will but thine. Angels possess no higher honor and privilege than glorifying the God before whom they cast their crowns. How blessed to be able thus to claim brotherhood with them; nay more, with our Saviour himself in the theme of his own words, "I have glorified thee on earth."

NEW HAVEN, CONN., Nov., 1870.

SOLOMON.

SOLOMON is one of the most interesting and extraordinary characters mentioned in the sacred Scriptures. The advice which this prince received from his father David, a short time before his decease, is very remarkable; and doubtless made a deep impression on his mind: "Thou, Solomon, my son, know thou the God of thy father: and serve him with a perfect heart, and with a willing mind: for the Lord searcheth all hearts. If thou seek him he will be found of thee; but if thou forsake him, he will cast thee off forever."

This king having made a great and solemn offering to God, soon after his accession to the throne, the Lord was well pleased with his piety and zeal; and desired him to "ask what he should give him." Humbled under the sense of the goodness of God to him, and of his incapacity to govern so numerous a people, he declared that "he was but a little child;" and, instead of riches and honor, and length of days, he desired that God would bestow upon him wisdom and knowledge, that he might prudently and happily rule the nation over which he had placed him. This choice was so much approved by the Almighty, that he gave him a wise and understanding heart, and added riches and honor to the gift.

Solomon was directed by God to build him a temple at Jerusalem, and this order he faithfully executed. The prayer which he made at the dedication of this grand edifice, breathes the most devout and humble disposition, and the most ardent desire for the real happiness of his people. One can scarcely ever peruse it, without feeling a degree of the same pious ardor, which pervaded and animated the breast of the royal supplicant, on that solemn occasion. At this moment, he shone in his highest lustre: nor can we conceive any thing upon earth more dignified and majestic, than his deportment on the dedication of this sacred structure. We are compelled to revere the character of the monarch, who with such uncommon zeal, stood before his nobles, his princes, and his people, as a preacher of righteousness, and as a priest of the most high God.

This illustrious prince, however, at one period of his life, so far mistook the source of true happiness, as to flatter himself with the hope of great enjoyments from the world. He sought for and obtained all the means of pleasure; but found himself, in the end, greatly disappointed. The result of this search and experiment, he gives us, in these memorable lines: "I said to my heart, I will prove thee with mirth: therefore enjoy pleasure: and, behold! this also is vanity. I made great works, built houses, planted vineyards, made gardens and orchards, and planted trees in them of all kinds of fruit. I procured servants and maidens: I gathered silver and gold, and the peculiar treasure of kings. I obtained men and women singers, and the delights of the sons of men, as musical instruments, and those of all sorts. So I was great, and increased more than all that were before me in Jerusalem; and whatever my eyes desired, I kept not from them: I withheld not my heart from any joy. Then I looked on the works which my hands had wrought; and, behold! all was vanity and vexation of spirit."

After this full persuasion, that real happiness was not to be found in sensual pleasure or worldly honors, he concludes with solemnly recommending piety and virtue, as the great objects for which we were brought into being; and which will not only yield the best enjoyment of life, but will support us in that day, when we must make up our final account. "Fear God, and keep his commandments. This is the whole duty of man. For God will bring every work into judgment, whether it be good or whether it be evil."

"When we reflect," says Dr. Blain, "on the character of him who delivered these sentiments, we cannot but admit that they deserve a serious and attentive examination. For they are not the declarations of a pedant, who, from an obscure retirement, declaims against pleasures which he never knew. They are not the invectives of a discontented man, who takes revenge upon the world by satirizing those enjoyments which he sought in vain to obtain. They are the conclusions of a great and prosperous prince, who had once given full scope to his desires: who was thoroughly acquainted with life in its most flattering scenes; and who now, reviewing all that he had enjoyed, delivers to us the result of long experience and tried wisdom."—Selected by H. LETTERS AND EXTRACTS.

FROM RANDOLPH E. LADD.

DEAR FRIENDS: I have just perused Br. Grim's article, recommending the publishing of the HERALD semi-monthly, until Br. Storrs' restoration, and as a prudential measure for preserving the valuable life and services of Br. Thorne. I most heartily endorse it and trust it will be done. We can much better be deprived of the weekly visits of our paper for a short time, than to spare these laborers from among us. Let us pray for Br. Storrs. Let us each and all go to the throne of grace and pour out supplication to God that the issue of this case may fully glorify Him, whether by the continued living and labor of our Bro. in the cause of God, or, if by his removal from among us, that we may have perfect resignation to His will. We cannot see clearly how we can spare this hero from the walls, but our Elder Brother knows it all, and will show us the "hidings of his power" if we are fully united, by living faith, to Him. I know by blessed experience, the power and efficacy of the prayer of faith. I believe "it can save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up" if Christ is more honored and glorified thereby. For nearly two years I have been sustained, held up, and carried along by this power and am gradually and surely, it seems to me, recovering the health and mental vigor which I so suddenly, and almost fatally lost.

Let us also remember other dear saints of God. Let prayer ascend with faith, hope and love from every heart, and it will be heard and answered. I believe it. I feel it in my heart of hearts. O, for the Spirit's refining fire, to go through the whole "body of Christ," and draw us upward and outward from all else, to hold communion at Jesus' feet. "Thanks be to God who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. Therefore, my beloved brethren, be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord."

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., Nov. 28, 1870.

FROM MRS. J. A. GOODRICH.

DEARLY BELOVED PILGRIMS: May grace mercy and peace be and abide with you forever. May we all hold fast the confidence and rejoicing of the hope firm unto the end, which now seems just upon us. Then we shall rejoice with exceeding joy if we, by faith in Christ, are partakers of his nature in this state of probation. The fulfillment of the prophetic word tells us that Jesus is soon to perfect his saints. What a blessed thought, that then we shall see him as he is and be made like him, and die no more. O praise the good Lord for salvation full and free through Jesus. He alone is our righteousness and salvation. Just such poor unworthy worms of the dust as we, are commanded to come boldly unto the throne of grace that we may have help in every time of need. He has promised that if we will draw near to Him, he will draw near to us. Here we experience adoption into the family of the living God where we truly have life more abundantly, and joy in the Holy Ghost. How many blessed promises we have to sustain us in our journey through this vale of tears. He has said, fear thou not, for I am with thee; be not dismayed for I am thy God, I will strengthen thee, yea I will help thee, yea I will uphold thee with the right hand of my righteousness. I know He will do it for He is faithful. Our hearts should be filled with love and gratitude to Him for the wonderful plan of salvation through the death and resurrection of Christ our LIFE-GIVER. O how blessed is the heavenly foretaste of a life where is fulness of joy and pleasures forevermore. Thank his dear name forever and evermore, is the language of my heart as I take up the dear HERALD and read from week to week the precious letters from the saints scattered abroad. It rejoices my heart and I feel to-day to praise the Lord. May the Lord bless all the afflicted ones, and help them to say thy will be done. That we may be faithful to the end and obtain eternal life, is my prayer.

NEW BRITAIN, Nov. 1870.

FROM A. L. HOUGHTON.

DEAR FRIENDS: I prize the paper very much, and its weekly visits are hailed with joy. As I read the letters from the brethren and sisters, it seems as though we are conversing with each other. Dear brethren and sisters, let us send up our united petitions to God that he will see fit to heal the Editor, so that he may soon be able to go into the great field of labor. Let us also ask God to strengthen the Assistant Editor. Your brother in Christ.

SOUTH ADAMS, Nov. 1870.

FROM MARIA W. WEAVER.

DEAR PILGRIMS: How sad many of God's little flock have been made by the sickness of our beloved Editor. How gladly would the brethren and sisters do something to restore him, if in their power. Yet what consolation is derived from the thought that "our Father" and our "Heavenly High Priest" are his intimate Friends, and fully able to drive away all diseases. We will calmly trust him in the hands of a loving God.

Again, what a blessing it is to us to have help from Br. Thorne, in this time of need. It must be something of a task for him to take the whole responsibility of publishing the paper. Truly it belongs to the scattered ones to send in their contributions at this time, lest both our Editors be prostrated. We can all frame up excuses. Many times I think what I write is so simple and unedifying that I will never send another article for publication. Then I think, it is not to instruct our abler ones that I write, but to comfort and encourage some of God's little ones. The Master knows best about these things, and will say, I hope, "She has done what she could."

How blessed it will be to get home. Here we have trials and cares, sickness and pain, but there all will be well with us forever. No more watching and weeping by the bedside of loved ones; no more sorrowing over the dead; no more lonely feelings stealing over us, as we sit in our deserted homes, thinking of our tender lambs that are laying in the dark tomb. O, who can know the mother's feelings as she wakes out of her restless slumbers, and finds her precious babe by her side no more! What a joyful hope the resurrection affords to all such afflicted ones. "Wherefore, comfort one another with these words:" saith the apostle.

Signs thicken, that should make us lift up our heads and rejoice. Soon our Lord and LIFE-GIVER will be here, and when he comes he will make the earth to blossom like a rose.

In the beautiful words of the poet:

"Lift your glad voices, he cometh to reign;
Sound out the tidings o'er earth and o'er main;
Sing, for the bright one that slept in the manger
Comes, and the earth that once followed the stranger,
In rich adorning,
Hails the glad morning,
Blossoms to Eden and welcomes her King."

WENDELL DEPOT, MASS. NOV. 1870.

FROM ELD. J. LEWIS.

BRO. THORNE: May the good Lord bless Br. Storrs, and restore him to health and strength, and thus enable him to pursue his labors in the cause of truth till the Lord comes. You are occupying an important position. May the Lord help you to withstand our enemies. Thus far your pen has been guided in wisdom, much to the joy and satisfaction of the readers of the only paper in all christendom that propagates the true sayings of God. It grows better and better. May all that contribute to its columns be guided by the Holy Spirit.

Our daily prayer is that the kingdom of this world may become the kingdom of our Lord and of his Christ, so that sickness and death may be no more. We are glad and rejoiced to know that God, in answer to prayer, has raised up several of our beloved brethren, some of whom we have not seen in the flesh, but we love them sincerely. We return thanks to Bro. Wolcott for favors received. May the blessings of God attend him and preserve him. Praised be the name of our heavenly Father for his goodness unto us. Whatever betide, He will provide for us.

GRAFTON, ILL., Nov. 1870.

Note.

WE send you a package of tracts. Let the people both hear and read, that the name of the Lord may be the more exalted.

FROM W. H. H. M'ALLISTER.

BR. THORNE: How sad it seems not to address this letter to BR. STORRS, to know that he is laid upon a bed of sickness and perhaps ——, but my pen refuses to write the word. I pray an all-merciful heavenly Father that this may not be. Not that he is not fully prepared for the future life; not that he has not filled up the measure of his days with deeds of the highest usefulness to his fellow-men; but that we need his friendly counsel, his encouraging example, and his vigorous pen yet longer in our little band. But God's will be done, hard as it may be to say it. The Judge of all the earth will do right. Here we must rest; from this firm trust nothing must move us. God will do just right, and if our dear BR. STORRS' life work is done, we should not repine if he is taken away. No, we should rather console ourselves with the Christian's hope, and none more sure of attaining it than he. Let us imitate his example, and strive to emulate his whole life. I pray that his life may be spared; that he may be restored to his wonted health and usefulness. In this prayer all our friends scattered over the country are joining.

But, friends, let us not faint if our shepherd is removed. Men serve their purpose and are removed, but truth is eternal, and God will raise up friends to sustain it. We must be the more faithful to the truth committed to our charge. Let us be true in our lives, so that we too may be "accounted worthy to obtain that world and the resurrection of the dead."

ST. ALBANS, Dec., 1870.

FROM POLLY G. PITTS.

BRN. STORRS AND THORNE: I hope the Lord will restore Br. Storrs to health again. O may the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, the great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do his will, working in you that which is well pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ. And may He blot out as a thick cloud all our transgressions, heal all of our diseases, fill our vessels with oil, help us to trim our lamps, gird our loins with truth and keep us ready, like unto men that wait for their Lord. Then when he shall appear, we may be glad with exceeding joy. "The just by faith shall live again."

FREDERICKSBURG, IOWA, Nov. 1870.

FROM J. L. BOYD.

DEAR EDITORS: Since the Campmeeting at Springfield closed, I have been looking in vain, each transpiring week, for the interchange of views, in the columns of the HERALD OF LIFE, of the members of the "Life and Advent Union," on the subject of locating the spot for the Campmeeting, which was resolved by that body, should be held next year. The committee appointed have not (with the exception of Bro. Day, who cannot look further south than Springfield,) suggested, nor reported any thing definite. And there has been but one response in this direction—a voice in favor of Bethlehem, Pa.

I confess, I am surprised, and disappointed, that there has been so little canvassing on the important question of location.

I have understood, that a majority of the Committee lean to the policy of holding it at Springfield. For my part, I must think, it would be an unwise conclusion for us to meet there.

As I intimated, at our meeting, I am willing to meet our brethren anywhere, north, south, east or west of Springfield, or even there, if it is finally so decided; but must think, as I now repeat, it would be unwise in policy, and prolific of harm, to do so.

In conclusion, I do entreat that our brethren, in all sections of other states than Massachusetts, will express their views respecting the advantages and disadvantages of their localities. Submitted in Christian hope and love.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Nov. 1870.

FROM J. M. FIKE.

BRN. STORRS AND THORNE: I must say the HERALD is growing better every week, as we approach the end. Surely the time is at hand when God will set up the fifth kingdom upon the earth, to take the place of all other kingdoms, under the glorious and magnificent reign of Jesus, the Life-giver. All hail! the time.

WATERLOO, IOWA, Nov., 1870.

PLACE TO LOSE SELF.—A person who had long practised many austerities, without finding any comfort or change of heart, was once complaining to the Bishop of Alst of his state. "Alas," said he, "self-will and self-righteousness follow me everywhere. Only tell me when you think I shall learn to leave self. Will it be by study, or prayer, or good works?" "I think," replied the bishop, "that the place where you lose self will be where you find your Saviour."

REV. JOHN NEWTON one day mentioned at his table the death of a lady. A young woman who sat opposite immediately said, "O sir, how did she die?" The venerable man replied, "There is a more important question than that, my dear, which you should have asked first." "Sir," said she, what question can be more important than "How did she die?" "How did she live?" was Mr. Newton's answer.

A GOOD RULE.—A lady asked the Rev. John Newton, what was the best rule for female dress and behavior. "Madam," said he, "so dress and so conduct yourself, that persons who have been in your company shall not recollect what you had on." This will generally be the case where singularity of dress is avoided, and when intelligence of mind and gentleness of manners are cultivated.

OBITUARY.

PARK.—Fell asleep in Jesus, Nov. 9, at 7 1-2 o'clock, P. M., Sarah Ann, wife of Auley M. Park, of Philadelphia, aged 66 years.

Sister Park needs no written eulogy. Wherever she was known she was greatly beloved. She visited the widow and the fatherless in their affliction, and there are many such who call her blessed. She fed the hungry, clothed the naked, visited the sick, and administered to many of the wants of the poor, and multitudes of such mourn her loss. She was an affectionate wife, a faithful mother, a cheerful companion, a true friend, an excellent counsellor, an ardent lover of Christ and his word, and waited for his return from heaven. She grew constantly in grace and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, and willingly suffered reproach from the enemies of the blessed hope.

Several weeks before her decease, she met with a severe accident—a fall—by which she was badly bruised, and an arm broken, but was rapidly recovering, when a sudden stroke of paralysis prostrated her once more, and, after four days, she breathed her last without a struggle. A beloved companion and children, and a large circle of friends mourn for her but not as those who have no hope, for we believe that Jesus died and rose again: even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him. The funeral services were conducted by Elder Hook assisted by Elder Taylor. F. H. BURBANK.

The Unbroken Slumber.

Yes, I shall rest! Some coming day,
When blossoms in the winds are dancing,
And children at their mirthful play,
Heed not the mournful crowd advancing,
Up through the long and busy street
They'll bear me to my last retreat.

Or else—it matters not—may rave
The storms and blasts of winter weather,
Above the narrow, new-made grave
Where care and I lie down together.
Enough, that I should know it not,
Beneath, in the dark, narrow spot.

For I shall sleep! As sweet a sleep
As ever graced a child reposing,
Awaits me in the cell so deep,
Where I, my weary eyelids closing,
At length shall lay me down to rest,
Heedless of clods above my breast.

Asleep! How deep will be that rest,
Free from life's fever moving wildly,
That when is past the earth's unrest,
Its bosom shall receive me mildly;
For not one dream of earth shall come
To invade the slumber of that home.

O deep repose! O slumber blest!
O night of peace! No storm, no sorrow,
No heavy stirring of the breast,
To meet another weary morrow!
I shall heed neither night nor dawn,
But still, with folded hands, sleep on.

Sleep on, though just above my head
Prowl sin and misery's haggard faces!
For the deep slumber of the dead
All sense of human woe erases,
Palsies the heart and cures the brain
Of every thought of outward pain.

Armies above my head may tramp!
They'll not disturb one rigid muscle!
I shall not heed their iron stamp,
More than a leaf's complaining rustle;
Nay, were the world convened to break
My leaden sleep, I should not wake.

And yet, methinks, if steps of those
I'd known and loved on earth were round me,
'Twould tame the might of my repose,
Shiver the iron cords that bound me,
Save that I know this cannot be,
For death disowns all sympathy!

Well, be it so! since I should yearn,
Anxiously watch for their appearing,
Chiding each lingering, late return,
And ever sad and ever fearing,
Living life's drama o'er again.
Its tragedy of hope and pain.

Then mourn not, friends, when ye may lay
The parent earth above my ashes:
Think what a rest awaits my clay,
And smooth the mound with tearless lashes.
Glad that the resting form within,
Has done at length with care and sin.

Think that with me the strife is o'er,
Life's stormy, struggling battle ended,
Rejoice that I have gained the shore
To which, though weak, my footsteps tended;
Breathe the blest hope above the sod,
And leave me to my rest with God.

The Punishment of the Wicked.—No. 5.

BY JOEL A. SIMONDS.

Having shown that the punishment of the wicked in the law was death, and that the punishment under the gospel is also to return to dust; that the general tenor of the Bible teaches the same thing, and by positive and implied testimony, that those who believe not the Son will not be raised up at the last day; and by the judgment of the dead, that none but such as are found worthy of a resurrection, will attain unto it, and that all who are not worthy will remain dead; that this punishment, death—"thou shalt surely die," is final, and when it is once reached it will never be repeated.

I will now answer a few objections to this view.

The Second Death.

It is claimed that no one can be subject to the second death unless he has been raised from the first death. Every author may explain his own terms. The expression "second death" is used only in the book of Revelation. Now, suppose we were to ask the Revelator what he means by "second death" and he should answer in this way, "Death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. This is the second death." Would you understand that it means to die a second time? Did death and hell die a second time? Had they been raised from the dead? Had they ever been alive? Did any one die at all in this transaction? Then the "second death," of this book, does not mean to die a second time. To die a second time is a second death, but it is not the second death of this book.

Again, take another example. The living wicked shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death.—Rev. xxi. 18. What does the second death mean here? To have their part in the lake of fire, this is the second death. It is the same whether applied to death and hell, or to the living wicked. In neither case does it mean to die a second time. If, to cast death and hell into the lake of fire is the second death, then to cast the beast, the false prophet, the devil, the wicked dead, and the living wicked, into the lake of fire must also be the second death. This same thing is affirmed of them all. The beast and the false prophet, were both cast alive into the lake of fire, burning with brimstone. The devil was cast into the lake of fire and brimstone. Death and hell were cast into the lake of fire. The wicked dead, whose names were not found written in the book of life were cast into the lake of fire, and the living wicked had their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death. In this list of names, that which is called the second death is affirmed of them all. Then all of them were hurt of the second death, it had power over them all. If, as is claimed, no one can be hurt of the second death unless he has died once and has been raised from the dead, then the beast, the false prophet, the devil, death and hell, and the living wicked—must all have died once, and have been raised from the dead, for they were all cast into the lake of fire—which is the second death. But as this will not be claimed by any, we insist that the second death of revelation does not mean to die a second time, and that it cannot be of any force in proof of the resurrection of wicked men.

The unjust reserved unto the day of judgment to be punished.

This objection is urged from 2 Pet. ii. 9. The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished.

In the New Testament, the coming of the Lord, and the day of judgment are spoken of as events that might occur in that generation. The Saviour said, Be ye like unto men that wait for their Lord, when he will return from the wedding, that they may be ready to meet him. Be ye therefore ready also, for in such an hour as ye think not the Son of man cometh. Paul said: The day of the Lord so cometh as a thief in the night, and he also says that when it comes, we which are alive and remain shall be changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, and be caught up to meet the Lord in the air. He prayed to God that his brethren might be preserved blameless unto the coming of the Lord. He also said that when the Lord comes he will take vengeance on them that know not God and obey not the Gospel; and will punish them with everlasting destruction. These motives were addressed to the living generation, as if the coming of the Lord, and the judgment day, were to occur in their life time. These motives and expectations have been urged upon every generation since that time. It is, then, to the living world that these motives are addressed, as events that will take place in the life time of those addressed. The Gospel is preached to the living world in view of a judgment day for the same living world.

Who, then, are the unjust who are reserved unto the day of judgment to be punished? They are the living wicked world. The judgment of the living wicked world in the time of Noah, and of the cities of the plain, in the time of Lot, were examples of judgment. None but the living were included in those judgments, so none but the living will be included in the judgment to which the unjust are reserved. As the judgment of the old world did not affect the generations that had passed away, so the day of judgment, referred to in this objection, will not affect those who have died. As the old world was reserved unto judgment by water, so the world that now is, is reserved unto fire against the day of judgment and perdition of ungodly men. The living world only will then be judged. When the Son of man shall come in his glory, then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory: and before him shall be gathered all nations: and he shall judge them. No resurrected wicked are here, none but those who have never died. This is the judgment to which the unjust world is reserved. God hath appointed a day in which he will judge the world in righteousness by that man whom he hath ordained. All the living nations are reserved unto this judgment, and no others. All who have died will come under the judgment of the dead.

What, then, will be done with the wicked of which Peter speaks who have died before the judgment? Let him answer the question himself. He says that such bring upon themselves swift destruction; that their judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not. That they will receive the reward of unrighteousness, and the latter end with them is worse than the beginning. He says it would have been better for them not to have known the holy commandment than to turn from it, but he further says they turned back as a dog to his own vomit again, and as a sow that was washed, to her wallowing in the mire. These are the conditions under which they were to live. What will be done with them finally? They shall utterly perish in their own corruption, as brute beasts perish. To them will be reserved the mist of darkness forever.—2 Pet. ii. Thus the objection falls out. The living unjust world that now is, is reserved unto the day of judgment to be punished, while those who die before the judgment takes place, will die like the beasts, to be remembered only in the judgment of the dead.

The resurrection both of the just and unjust.

Acts xxiv. 14, 15. That there shall be a resurrection of the dead, both of the just and the unjust.

As the 15th verse now stands, it seems to teach that the unjust will be raised from the dead. I think there must be some mistake in the rendering of it, as it is the only passage in all of Paul's writings, that seems to express or intimate any such thing, and it is only incidentally introduced in connection with the hope of the Pharisees. My reasons for believing that this passage is not correctly rendered are these, 1st, Paul worshipped the God of his fathers in a way which the Pharisees called heresy. Now if Paul agreed with the Pharisees in their doctrine of the resurrection, they were agreed on a very important point, and on account of which he was called in question that day.

2d, He said he was judged for the hope of the promise made of God to the fathers. In that promise, or those promises, there is nothing said nor intimated, about the resurrection of the unjust. Nothing from which any such thing can be implied. Paul has not told us how he got a hope of the resurrection of the unjust out of that promise, but he has told us how he got his hope from that promise, and how we may get ours from it. Paul never taught the resurrection of the unjust unless he did it in this passage. He did teach that the wicked are worthy of death; that the wages of sin is death; that the end of sin is death; that he that is dead is freed from sin; that the wicked reap corruption, that when they die they go to corruption; that it is appointed unto men to die once; that those only who have the Spirit of God dwelling in them will have their mortal bodies quickened; that they only who strive to attain unto the resurrection of the dead will attain unto it; and that those only who are worthy to put on incorruption will be raised from the dead. Paul taught all this and much more, but he never taught the resurrection of the wicked, unless he did it in this passage. We cannot think he would be likely to contradict himself and the other apostle on this point.

Dan. xii. 2. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall wake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. If this passage refers to the literally dead, it stands alone not only in the book of Daniel, but in the whole of the Old Testament. If those of whom it speaks are really dead, then they will be disposed of in the judgment of the dead. They will be judged while they are dead, and this passage shows what will be the award of this judgment. To the one class is awarded everlasting life, to the other shame and everlasting contempt. The word awake is simply a figure through which is conveyed to our minds the awards of this judgment. There is no life affirmed of the latter class.

John v. 28, 29. All that are in the graves shall hear his voice and come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of damnation. If this passage is speaking of those who are in literal graves, it stands alone among all the sayings of the Saviour if it refers to real graves then those who are in them are really dead and have been judged in the judgment of the dead. The language used in this passage is figurative, through which the award of this judgment of the dead is conveyed to our minds. To those who have done good the award is life, to those who have done evil the award is condemnation. There is no life affirmed of this class.

Rev. xx. 12, 15. And I saw the dead small and great stand before God, and the books were opened, and another book which is the book of life, and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books, according to their works. The next verse repeats what is in this. This seems to be a description of the judgment of the dead. It is manifestly figurative. "I saw the dead small and great stand before God." Did the dead really stand up before God? "And the books were opened, and another book which is the book of life." Do you think that real books were opened there? "And the dead were judged out of the things which were written in the books." Do you think the really dead were standing before God and judged? "And the sea gave up the dead which were in it." Do you think the sea did any thing in this matter? "And death and hell delivered up the dead that were in them." Did death and hell do this? "And death and hell were cast into the lake of fire." Was death and hell really there? Was there a literal lake of fire there? Were death and hell cast literally into the lake of fire? "And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire." Were they really dead who were judged, in the 12th verse, and who were not found written in the book of life. literally cast into the lake of fire, as death and hell were?

The dead were judged in this judgment while dead, and the awards were whosoever of the dead was not found written in the book of life was cast into the lake of fire, implying that whosoever was found written in the book of life, was awarded life.

We have now answered the leading objections which are urged against the doctrine, that the penalty of the law given to Adam is the whole, complete, and final description of the punishment of all the wicked, "Thou shalt surely die."

The Earth's Axis.

BY J. F. REDHEAD.

It has been assumed by some that the changes of the seasons which is produced by the axis of the earth being inclined to the plane of its orbit is one of the many causes which the fall of man has brought upon the earth: and that in the restitution it will be placed in its former position, and consequently it is presumed, the severity of the seasons will be greatly meliorated. The thought that winter will have any part in the restored earth, that nature will continue from year to year to drop her robe of verdure and rest in dormant sleep, until the returning spring with gentle ray of heat and light shall call forth from its deathlike state the verdant bud; to such minds seems altogether incompatible with the promise of restitution.

Dr. Dick, in his admirable work, "Celestial Scenery," makes the following remarks: "Although in the present constitution of our globe, there are many benign agencies which accompany the revolution of the seasons, and are essential to our happiness in the circumstances in which we now exist, yet it is by no means probable that the seasons as they now operate, formed a part of the original arrangements of our territorial system. Man was at first created in a state of innocence, and adorned with the image of his Maker: and the frame of nature, we may confidently suppose, was so arranged as to contribute in every respect both to his sensitive and intellectual enjoyment. But neither the horrors of winter, and its dreary aspect in northern climes, nor the scorching heats and appalling thunder-storms which are experienced in tropical climates, are congenial to the rank and circumstances of beings untainted with sin, and endowed with moral perfections . . . In the primeval state of the world it is not unlikely that the axis of the earth had a different direction from what it has at present, and that instead of scorching heats and piercing cold, and the gloom and desolation of winter, there was a more mild and gentle temperature, and something approaching what the poet calls a perpetual spring."

The above remarks are very beautiful and attractive, and at first appear so plausible that we are likely to adopt them immediately as being the most reasonable conclusions from our highest conceptions of restoration; but when we reason from the known laws of light and heat, and from the way in which the changing seasons are now produced, I think there is sufficient ground to believe that the axis of the earth will still retain its present position, and in consequence the seasons in the restored earth will be very much the same as they now exist. To produce an unchangeable temperature, the axis of the earth must be shifted until it becomes perpendicular to the plane of the earth's orbit. In that part of the earth's orbit, when the sun is directly over the equator, or at the "equinoxes," the earth is in the same position in regard to light and heat, as it would be were the axis in this position. This occurs about March 21 and September 23. But if the sun remained in this position, the direct and powerful rays of heat would pour from day to day, from year to year upon the equatorial regions, while in this latitude and northward and the corresponding southern latitudes, the rays falling obliquely would be insufficient to produce vegetable growth to sustain animal life, and all must die. Thus the now luxuriant and fruitful regions must become a barren waste, and the greater part of the earth would be uninhabitable to the animal and vegetable existence with which the earth, the air and the sea now teem. If we had no other evidence than that of the wisdom and beneficence of Jehovah, as displayed in the present position and motions of the earth, we could reasonably conclude that they have been thus ordered, not as a cause for man's transgression, but for the pleasure and enjoyment of the creatures He has been pleased to create, and whose existence He has made dependent thereon. Heat and cold will have no horror, either in feeling or appearance to beings endowed with immortality.

But the earth is not the only world, the axis of which is inclined to the plane of its orbit. It seems to be a prevailing law in the solar system: it extends to all the planets, the rotation of which has been accurately discovered. In some the inclination is greater, in some less than that of the earth. The seasons on the planet Mars are probably very similar to those on the earth. When viewed through telescopes of considerable power, brilliant white spots are seen alternately at the poles, probably produced by the accumulation of ice and snow during the long winters, as they are seen to disappear when summer advances upon the poles. Seeing this law extends to other worlds, it would be somewhat presumptuous to conjecture that it is the result of sin; that the inhabitants of other worlds have failed to keep the command given to develop virtue and loyalty, and have brought on the change of seasons as a curse in consequence.

But there is stronger evidence than that deduced from Nature's laws, that the position of the axis and the motions of the earth are fixed and will continue so forever. There is a promise of Jehovah concerning it. "While the earth remaineth, seed time and harvest, and cold and heat, summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease," Gen. viii. 22. This requires the motion of the earth round the sun, its revolution on its axis, and the inclination of its axis to the plane of its orbit.

Ship on Fire.

A few months ago the good ship "Sunbeam" sailed from Peru, loaded with saltpetre for Boston. She was staunch and tight, and had weathered many a gale round the stormy Horn. Saltpetre is a dangerous cargo, and the captain had given strict orders not to carry any light but a lantern into the hold. The mates understood it; the men understood it. Two weeks out, the sea was rough; but with wind and weather fair, the ship was running under full sail all right, "homeward bound, homeward bound!"

The captain went into the cabin, and was busy over the ship's reckoning, when a wild cry of "Fire! fire!" broke upon his ear. Fire! Frightful as the sound is on land, it is tenfold more so at sea. The captain sprang to the deck. Smoke and flame were pouring from the hold. "Down with the hatches!" It could not be done; the fire was master of the hatches. "To the pumps!" Alas, no; the fire was master of the pumps. "Clear away the boats!" Impossible; the fire had already caught them. How it was roaring, rushing, crackling, burning, searching, running up the masts, leaping on the spars, tearing through the sails, clearing out the sailors, while explosion after explosion burst from between decks. A fearful scene!

Can nothing be done to save life? The poor ship, nothing could save her; she is gone.

"Bring her to windward." There is no man at the wheel. Was he suffocated at his post? A brave fellow quick as lightning outside, crept by the chain plates to the poop, and put the helm aport. At that good moment a boat, burned from her tacklings, dropped into the sea at his feet, right side up. The sailor sprang into her, ablaze as she was, put out the fire, and pushed off.

The captain, seeing all hope gone, told his men to pray for God's help, and save themselves as they best could. The poor fellows leaped into the sea, though between fire and water there was little to choose. As he stood surveying the cruel scene, his little son by his side, with but one sailor left, scorched and suffocated, thoughts of the home he should never reach blinding his eyes with bitter tears, a yard fell into the rigging near them. There was hope. "Cut off the sail and launch her." The sailor pitched the spar overboard, and jumped in after her. Last left, the captain clasped his child, plunged into the sea, and seized the friendly spar. Another man made for it. Three men and a boy clinging for dear life to the half-burnt timber! It was a hard and fearful struggle to get away from the burning ship, which was fast settling in the water; nor had they hardly done so, before she exploded and sank in a great cloud of smoke, flame, and hissing steam.

The sea was rough, and the frail spar was hardly able to buoy them up; they were half buried in the waves; strength and hope were failing, when the sailor in the only boat saved paddled towards them, and pulled them in. Eight men more, buffeting the waters were picked up. Six men were missing, and never found.

Here was a half-burnt boat with twelve souls drifting on the wide ocean; a forlorn party. Nothing to eat, nothing to drink; no shelter, no chart, no compass; all that was left of the fine ship which an hour since was as likely to return from a prosperous voyage as ever before. "In twenty minutes," the captain said, "from the first cry of fire, she was gone."

Was the little boat long left to toss alone on the beating waves? No; a man on the masthead of a New Bedford whaler cruising in those seas saw the whiff of smoke, saw the flame, saw the ship go down; and did not the old whaler make all sail to the rescue? And did not the sailors thank God when they spied her topmasts in the horizon. and knew a friendly sail was bearing down towards them? I need not tell you how the generous whaler took care of the wrecked men, and landed them at the nearest port, whence they made their way to Boston.

Now, boys, you want to know how the ship caught fire? The second mate disobeyed the captain's orders, and took an open light into the hold. The fumes of a barrel of varnish ignited, and the consequence came fast enough. He thought, I suppose, like a great many foolish fellows counselled against danger, that he'd risk it. What a terrible risk to take! People older and better informed know best, and whatever they warn you against, depend upon it, it is best to mind them. There are risks which ought never to be run. H. C. K.

Quick Temper.

Don't fancy, young people, that because your quick temper causes you a good deal of trouble, that it is a thing of evil and only evil. Your quick temper, like all the rest of your qualities and powers, is a gift from your loving Creator. He gave it to you in love, it is good for you; it is part of your arms and equipments in the battle of life. You will have need of it before you are through with its conflicts. A quick temper is a bad master, but a good slave; when you let it get control of you it is your master, and leads you into a great deal of wrong. It takes possession of you like a little fiend, it flushes and bloats your face, it kindles your eyes, it scowls your brows, it gnashes your teeth, it clinches your hands in fists, it causes your tongue to hiss out hateful words that you would find it impossible to speak when you were your own natural self; it gets you into evil that perhaps a life time cannot undo.

But a quick temper is a good slave. Make it your slave; conquer it—hold it in obedience to your will and it will serve you well, and your own character will grow in nobleness and strength from the effort at conquest. The highest excellence of character comes from subduing evil and rising above it. If you have a good deal of the evil in your nature, you will make a great ascent when you get above it, and you will stand higher and be stronger—more virtuous than any one naturally amiable who has had no struggle and gained no victory.

We are apt to think that a meek person must be a spiritless, passive body, with no temptations to get angry. I do not think this is what God means by meekness, for Moses, the meekest man that ever lived, had, by nature, a quick temper. You remember how he once killed a man who was unjust to another, how he meddled in other people's quarrels, how he threw down and broke the tables of stone, on which God had just written the ten commandments. You remember, too, how he assumed, with the greatest arrogance, that he had brought the water out of the rock, and not God.

If you are troubled with a very ugly temper, you have a great field for conquest. Alexander the Great once wept because he had no more worlds to conquer. You will probably never be reduced to this extremity. You will have something to conquer if you live to be a hundred years old, but, day by day, with each victory, you shall enter upon your certain possessions.

The Bible says the meek shall inherit the earth, and I used to think this was very strange. I supposed that meek people meant spiritless people, and if they ever were going to inherit the earth it would be a long time before they came into their property. But I see it differently now. The meek—that is, those who have overcome themselves—are the royal natures; to them all things shall be in subjection. The earth is theirs, and God shall crown them kings and conquerors.—Little Corporal.

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should allow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is a desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it; and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

PHILOSOPHY OF THOUGHT:

IS THE EXISTENCE OF MIND EVIDENCE OF AN IMMORTAL SOUL-ENTITY IN MAN?

BY WM. H. SPENCER.

WE have always felt willing that the advocates of an immortal soul-entity in man should appeal to the various sciences for the support of their theory; but if they are compelled to draw their only arguments in support of such a notion from the sciences, in all fairness, then, they should not claim it to be of Bible origin, for the Scriptures nowhere give us any information about the existence of such an entity.

How often we are told that mind is not dependent upon this physical organism for its existence; that the existence of mind in man is conclusive evidence of a conscious immaterial entity, and as such an entity is not a property of matter, therefore it survives the dissolution of the body! If "mind is not dependent upon this material organism for its existence" will our immaterialistic brethren tell us how they will harmonize the various phenomena of thought and the various changes which occur to the human mind, during the brief space of human life, with the assumption of the independent existence of the mind?

(1.) We have read of a man who received a physical injury which affected his mind so as to render him unconscious for a number of years;—will our orthodox brethren say that the soul was unconscious during the continuance of that injury? If the mind can exist independent of the body, how can an injury to the body destroy the operation of the mind? If the mind is really the soul which survives the dissolution of the body, and if a physical injury can render the soul unconscious now, who can prove that it can exist in a conscious state separated from the body?

(2.) In the infant the mind is feeble and easily destroyed. How could this possibly occur if the mind is not dependent upon this material organism for its existence?

(3.) Sickness and every derangement of the physical system affects the mind, and in old age the mind again becomes feeble and childish. Does the soul become feeble by age; if so, may it not at some time cease to exist?

(4.) The mind often becomes deranged—man becomes insane, and is a subject for the mad-house; and this not unfrequently results from disease. If the mind can exist independent of the body, how could bodily disease derange the mind, transforming a human being into a madman? Can an immortal soul become crazy? If so, may it not continue insane throughout eternity; Where has God provided an abode for crazy ghost-men? If at the death of an insane man the soul becomes rational again, what a blessing death must be to a crazy man—a greater blessing than insane asylums?

(5.) If the mind is a soul-entity or a spirit-entity, as is claimed, then it follows by "inexorable logic" that wherever there is mind there is an immortal soul. We find mind developed in all grades of the animal kingdom, which no informed man will deny. This is proved from the fact that they are capable of voluntary motion, and exhibit, in a limited degree, the phenomena of mind. Therefore, if the immaterialistic theory is correct, animals in their various grades have immortal souls as well as the race of man; and if the soul can survive death in one instance, may it not in the other? Is heaven interspersed with the soul-entities of animals?

(6.) If the theory is correct that the mind is the soul, then it follows that one man has a greater soul than another; for if we are to measure the soul by intelligence, we find some brutes with more intelligence than some members of the human family;—does it not follow, therefore, that some brutes have a superior soul to some human beings, and that some races have a superior soul to others?

If they do not wish to accept these conclusions they must forsake their false premises, which only drags them deeper into the mire in attempting to defend. We hope, for the sake of consistency, they will no longer charge us with reducing man to the level with the brute creation, by the doctrine of "life only in Christ," in view of the foregoing conclusions from the immaterialistic theory.

We believe that science has fully demonstrated that all living creatures in the grand and extensive realm of nature are endowed with mind, and the variety of intelligence manifested among all such creatures depends entirely upon the existence and development of the organs composing the brain; and therefore, the greater intelligence or mind of some, results, not from a superior soul, but from a superior organism. Dr. Combe has remarked: "We cannot conceive of the existence of an intelligent being, who is not possessed of organs; and it has been found, by investigating the science of phreno-physiology, that where insanity exists, it invariably results from a diseased brain, and that too in a certain location of the head. Some of these organs may be thus affected, and not all of them, which results but in partial derangement." . . . "It has also been found that idiocy is universally produced by a mere deficiency of the brain in the frontal region of the head."

The reader is doubtless aware that the nature of thought is a subject which covers too vast a field to exhaust in a single newspaper article, and we cannot hope to do more than to establish a few principles of truth which may be expanded upon at leisure.

In speaking of the construction and relation of the five senses with the brain, a writer of much critical research remarks:

"The vessels connecting these external organs with the brain, are the nerves: these are possessed of chemical properties which give them a strong affinity for electricity; and it is this substance which they contain and conduct from one part of the system to the other. In proof of this, imbed a needle in a nerve, and it is immediately rendered magnetic, and will attract small portions of iron. Again: Part a nerve leading to any voluntary organ of the system, and the motion of the organ cannot be produced by the mind: then connect the two ends of the nerve by a metallic wire, conducting the fluid to the organ, and motion is restored, and the organ can again be moved by the will. That it is this substance by which the muscles are controlled by the mind, giving rise to motion, may be proved farther by grasping the negative and positive poles of a galvanic battery, when the limbs will be immediately drawn up by the contraction of the muscles. This being the only substance known, capable of producing such an effect when artificially applied, and the nerves the only vessel in the system that will conduct this substance, at least sufficiently to produce motion, it follows that it is the office of the nerves to conduct this fluid from the brain, their source, to accomplish all the important functions of life; and as it is the nerves which connect the external organs of sense with the brain, it follows, that it is by the agency of this substance through their channels, that all impressions, received externally, are conveyed to the mind."

Speaking of the sense of feeling, the same writer remarks:

"There is a nerve of sensation, as well as one of motion, contained in every fibre of the muscles which cover the whole surface of the body; constituting so perfect a covering of the entire system that the skin cannot be pierced anywhere, even with the finest needle, without feeling; and we cannot feel without touching or piercing a nerve of sensation. When any one of these nerves is thus affected, it communicates the fact to the brain as before, that something is felt: this produces a vibration of the organs of the brain, resulting in a conclusion as to what is felt."

Again he says: "We will now consider the manner by which the mind comes in contact with foreign matter. It is evident that it can thus come in contact with it. If it could not then no substance whatever could be moved from its position by the powers of man; neither indeed could he move his own limbs. It is, however, as certain that this contact cannot be direct. The mind being located in the head, its peculiar empire, which is composed of a collection of corporeal organs animated with the magnetic forces, hence it is not possible for it to vacate its imperial throne. These facts prove that there must be an agent adapted to this mental arrangement, that is susceptible of being put in motion by the power of the will, or that may be dispatched by its decision for the accomplishment of all its purposes. It has already been proved that the nerves contain and conduct the magnetic fluid; and as the convolutions of the brain are formed by an expansion of nervous matter, or a collection of capillary nerves, it follows that it is the nervo-vital fluid which is the agent of the mind: coming as it does in contact with the mental organs, it stands ready at any moment to do its master's bidding. That substance is peculiarly appropriated to such an office: being the most subtle in the universe, it would be the easiest put in motion, all others being too gross for such a purpose. Its motion is also the most rapid of any other substance known, carrying communications hundreds of miles in so short a space of time that it cannot be computed. How beautifully, therefore, is it adapted to carry on the operation of thought, which requires no more time than that required for electricity to travel any distance! Its adaptation for this purpose may be further seen from the fact of its being the most powerful substance in existence: there is nothing invulnerable to its stroke, after having been extremely thrown out of balance. It is in fact the attractive and repellant forces which roll the worlds, and compel them to preserve their respective orbits."

"This contact between mind and foreign matter is through a concatenation of nerves, fibres, muscles, tendons and bones, constituting the indirect medium between it and the most gross matter in being. Electricity coming in direct contact with the mind forms the first link in this chain; the nerves containing and conducting this fluid, is the second approximating foreign matter; each fibre of the muscle containing a pair of nerves, one of motion and sensation, constitutes the third link; the tendons by which the muscle is attached to the bone, forms the fifth, and the foreign substance, the sixth link in this chain; each one, from the mind down to gross matter, of a more coarse structure than the preceding. The mind receives an impression, through one of the senses, from some external object, that some foreign substance ought to be removed: after the conclusion is formed, and the mind has decided that the object must be accomplished, the will immediately dispatches its agent, charging the nerves of motion with a sufficient quantity of the vital fluid to perform the action. This substance, according to its nature, contracts the muscle; this contracts the muscle; this contraction raises the arm, and the arm moves the foreign matter. In this manner, although the mind is so grand and magnificent a piece of mechanism, yet it is capable of coming in contact with the grossest substances surrounding us, and of using them for any desirable purpose. We see, therefore, that this whole mental operation is the result of natural and physical laws, and stands upon as philosophical a basis as that of any other science; and that there is no more necessity here, in this mental arrangement and action, for an immaterial soul, than there is for its agency in the growth of a plant or tree; and if possessed, it would be a superfluity, an unnecessary appendix: nothing for it to accomplish as a servant or a dictator."

These views can hardly fail to commend themselves to every reasoning mind as sound, philosophical, and in entire harmony with the Scriptural testimony regarding the nature of mind. We will make one more extract from the same author. He says:

"The sciences of chemistry and of physiology not only furnish no proof of the existence and possession of a soul-entity by our race, but, by their combined principles, in connection with the light afforded by the science of magnetic action, offer conclusive arguments against the theory, accounting satisfactorily for all the complicated phenomena exhibited by man, of mind and motion, upon philosophical principles; and the united voice of all these philosophers who have ever distinguished themselves by their discoveries in these several sciences, is an unqualified acknowledgment that neither of these sciences knows any thing of the existence of such a soul, and all that can be known about it must be gathered from revelation."

Turning to the pages of revelation we seek in vain for any evidence of the existence of any entity which survives the dissolution of the body. Bishop Tillotson says: "The immortality of the soul is supposed or taken for granted, rather than expressly revealed in the Bible." The declaration of Archbishop Whately that "no such doctrine is revealed in the Word of God," has never yet been overthrown, and never can be. The glorious doctrine of life future and eternal only through Jesus Christ, is the grand beacon light of the Scriptures.

FREEDOM—LIBERTY.

BY A. G. M..

No words have been more used, perhaps more misused than these. To him who observes and inquires, who sees in things that are a relationship to things that have been or are to be, this making up and individualizing going on in the more advanced communities of the world presents a subject of weighty import.

What is the tendency of that process of individualization or growth of free thought and action which, about the time of Luther, became so decided, and has progressed to the present? How is this tendency to liberty related to what revelation shows shall be the future of this world? Things never happen. The past and present are always a preparation for the future. For what future does the present seem to be a preparation?

This subject cannot be viewed as purely religious, nor from a political or civil standpoint, for religious freedom always tends to civil freedom, and, on the other hand, civil freedom always tends to religious freedom. True, one part of a man's nature or powers may be bound and another part free, but the tendency is always toward an equilibrium. A free mind is likely to produce free action, just as freedom of action is likely to produce, ultimately, freedom of thought.

What, then, does this progressive liberty-loving spirit that pervades the more advanced communities suggest as to the future? Many have seen, many think they now see a millennium approaching just behind this liberation of thought and action. "Republican institutions" have been the watch-word of half the world, the supposed highway that should lead away from all oppression, and end only in universal peace. The experience of the past ten years in our own country ought to shake the faith of the most sanguine; nor can it be doubted that similar causes will produce similar effects in the future. So long as outward force is necessary to protect and restrain men, a perfect society is impossible. That this restraint is enforced by the representatives elected by the people does not alter the fact that all outward restraint implies that men are disposed to evil, that injustice and crime prevail. The best society, a perfect society must be one in which there shall be no government of external force. The only perfect government or perfect society would be where there should be no government at all, except such as should result from each individual perceiving what is right. Hence wise men have said, that government is best which the people feel least; and the converse of this is equally true, that the society is best which needs least governing.

Again: National freedom is but the aggregate or result of individual freedom; and individual freedom in its true and best sense, is not something that can be given to men from without. Freedom is not like a house planned and erected by an architect, but like a plant it grows, and it grows within the man. Men do right because the spirit within is in unison with the laws of God. The seed of all freedom is truth—as clearly so as if the greatest Law-giver of the world had not said, "The truth shall make you free."

The individualization and liberty-loving spirit would seem to be a "day of preparation" for some new manifestation of truth. Not in science, for here progress has been almost a miracle, but such a manifestation as shall prepare men for that higher government, the power of which lies chiefly in the wisdom and goodness of him who rules. For some such government men are looking now. Multitudes think it can be found in governments similar to our own. Yet a representative government is but an artifice made necessary because experience has shown that individual rulers are too ignorant to rule wisely, or too wicked to rule justly. All the "checks and balances" of government are but admissions that men are ignorant and dishonest.

Whether it be true or otherwise, that Christ shall come to bring peace into the world, all feel the need of such a government. Such a feeling exhibits itself everywhere. It is the vital element of every reform. Men are groping for truth, and each mistakes his own dim torch for the glorious light of the Sun of Righteousness. What we see around us would seem to be the felt necessity for more truth, the preparation of humanity for the reception of better things. While we do not see that the mass of mankind in civilized lands have made great progress in moral and religious truth, we do see that there is a wonderful looking away from old things and consequent preparation for new. May we not hope that though the Ruler come unexpectedly the world shall, in a measure, be prepared to receive his government? May we not hope that having witnessed the failure of their own plans, and having learned that while human nature remains what it now is, they cannot introduce righteousness and peace into the world, men will be ready to receive Him who shall rule the world in righteousness?

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Dec., 1870.

THROUGH FAITH.

BY JACOB GRIM.

"For by grace are ye saved through faith, and that not of yourselves; it is the gift of God."—Eph. ii. 8.

THE above text has been the occasion of many discourses, and among many of our good Methodist brethren it has caused controversies. I recollect, many years ago, James Brown, the author of the "Rational System of English Grammar," in one of his lectures, had this text under consideration, and made the following remark: "A Methodist clergyman came to me and said, 'Mr. Brown, I will give you five dollars if you will give me the true meaning of this (the above) text.'" Mr. Brown remarked, "I am no theologian, but if you wish to know what is the sense reading of the text, I can and will give it to you. The text is implenary, to make it plenary it would read thus, "For by grace (or favor) are ye saved, through the door which is faith; and that favor, or salvation, is not of yourselves; it is the gift of God." The minister replied, "I do not believe it. The gift spoken of in the text is faith." Many, even to this day, believe the same thing.

I informed Mr. Brown how I viewed the text, and gave him my theological opinion of it, the same as is held by the life believers, and read it thus: "By God's favor have ye 'life' through the door which is faith; and this life is not in yourselves: it is the gift of God." He remarked: "That is good sense as well as good theology." Paul makes this matter of faith very plain when he says, "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (have life).—Rom. x. 9. "For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, even so them also which sleep in Jesus will God bring with him" (from the dead).—1 Thess. iv. 14.

Now this doctrine of God giving a man faith may do very well for some who believe in predestination, or fatalism, but the apostle gives us to understand the plan is of God; through his own will has he adopted the plan of salvation. The future life is all of favor on the part of God. He has devised the plan and offered it freely to mankind. He has made it known through his Son, and revealed it unto us, through his word. The act of faith is our own; it is the door through which God has made this life accessible. The apostle says, "if thou wilt believe in thy heart." There is more in this simple expression than appears upon the casual reading of it. Jesus once said, "if ye love me," (show your love) "keep my commandments." Belief and faith are looked upon as synonymous terms, and if you look in your dictionary, under the word faith, you will find the definition, "Belief in any thing revealed." Look at the word belief and you will find, "faith in any thing that is told you." But we apprehend Bible faith requires more than belief. Jesus said, devils believed and trembled. My understanding of Bible faith is more than belief.

I will endeavor to illustrate what I understand by this saving faith, through which we have life. A building is on fire; the stairway is enveloped in flames; all means of escape, in that way, is cut off; there are two children in the upper part of the house; the father appears on the outside of the building, and one of the children comes to the window; the father raises his arms and cries aloud, "Mary! jump in my arms, and I will save you." She says, "Father, I believe you, but I am afraid; go bring a ladder." The other child now comes forward. The father cries out to the little one, "Jump, my child, and I will catch you." The child, with child-like confidence, jumps into its father's arms and is saved, while the former, waiting for the ladder, by which to descend, is severely burned. Mary lacked confidence in her father's ability, therefore, though believing, she had not faith. The younger child, with full confidence in her father, exercised faith which was saving in its effect. So we, in order to attain unto eternal life, must exercise that confidence in God which will make our belief lay hold on the plan that God has provided, and accept it upon the condition which God has laid down in his word. "He that hath the Son hath life, and he that hath not the Son hath not life."

PHILADELPHIA, Dec., 1870.

IF you have an enemy, act kindly to him and make him your friend. You may not win him over at once, but try again. Let one kindness be followed by another until you have accomplished your object. Little by little wonderful things are completed.

DR. JOHNSON, giving advice to an intimate friend, said: "Above all, accustom your children constantly to tell the truth, without varying in any circumstance." A lady present, emphatically exclaimed, "Nay, this is too much; for a little variation in narrative must happen a thousand times a day, if one is not perpetually watching." "Well, madam," replied the doctor, "and you ought to be perpetually watching. It is more from carelessness about truth, than from intentional lying, that there is so much falsehood in the world."

A MARTYR was asked, whether he did not love his wife and children, who stood weeping by him. "Love them!" said he, "yes, if all the world were gold, and at my disposal, I would give it all for the satisfaction of living with them, though it were in prison; yet, in comparison with Christ, I love them not."

MR. PHILIP HENRY, one of the non-conformist ministers, when silenced from preaching, by the act of uniformity, took comfort himself, and administered comfort to others, from the passage, "Let mine outcasts dwell with thee, Moab." "God's people," he observed, "may be an outcast people, cast out of men's love, their synagogues, their country; but God will own his people when men cast them out; they are outcasts, but they are his, and some way or other he will provide a dwelling for them." Shortly before his death, the same pious person observed that though many of the ejected ministers were brought very low, had many children, were greatly harassed by persecution, and their friends generally poor and unable to support them; yet, in all his acquaintance, he never knew, nor could remember to have heard of any non-conformist minister in prison for debt.

RESISTING NOT EVIL.

SAID General P. of Virginia, "When I was a young man I went to hear Mr. Lee preach at —— meeting-house. There was a very large crowd in attendance, and a great many could not get into the house. Among others I got near the door, and being fond of show and frolic, I indulged in some indiscretion, for which Mr. Lee mildly but plainly reproved me. In an instant all the bad feelings of my heart were aroused. I felt insulted, and felt that my whole family were disgraced. I retired from the crowd to brood over, and meditate revenge. It was not long before I resolved to whip him before he left the ground. I kept the resolution to myself, and watched with eager intensity of resentment, the opportunity to put it in execution. But the congregation was dismissed and dispersed, and I saw nothing of the preacher.

"How he escaped me I could never learn. But I nursed my wrath to keep it warm; and cherished the determination to put it into execution the first time I saw Mr. Lee, although long years should intervene. Gradually, however, my feelings subsided; and in the lapse of a few years the whole affair faded away from my mind. Thirteen years passed over me, and the impetuosity of youth had been softened down by sober manhood. I was standing upon the down-hill of life!

"On a beautiful morning in the early spring, being from home on business, I saw, a few hundred yards before me, an elderly looking man jogging slowly along in a single gig. As soon as I saw him, it struck me, that's Jesse Lee. The name, the man, the sight of him, recalled all my recollections of the insult, and all my purposes of resentment. I strove to banish them all from my mind; but the more I thought the warmer I became. My resolution stared me in the face; and something whispered coward in my heart if I failed to fulfil it. My mind was in perfect tumult, and my passion waxed strong. I determined to execute my resolution to the utmost; and full of rage I spurred my horse, and was soon at the side of the man that I felt of all others I hated most. I accosted him rather rudely with the question 'Are you not a Methodist preacher?' 'I pass for one,' was the reply, and in a manner that struck me as very meek. 'Ain't your name Jesse Lee?' 'Yes: that is my name.' 'Do you recollect preaching in the year —— at —— meeting-house?' 'Yes: very well.' 'Well, do you recollect reproving a young man for some misbehavior?' After a short pause for recollection, he replied, 'I do.' 'Well,' said I, 'I am that young man; and I determined I would whip you for it the first time I saw you. I have never seen you from that day to this; and now I intend to carry out my purpose.'

"As soon as I had finished speaking, the old man stopped his horse, and looking me full in the face, said, 'You are a younger man than I am. You are strong and active; and I am old and feeble. I have no doubt but, if I were disposed to fight, you could whip me very easily; and it would be useless for me to resist. But as a man of God I must not strive! So as you are determined to whip me, if you will just wait, I will get out of my gig, and get down on my knees, and you may whip me as long as you please.' 'Never,' said the old general, 'was I so suddenly and powerfully affected. I was completely overcome. I trembled from head to foot. I would have given my estate if I had never mentioned the subject. I felt sick at heart; ashamed, mortified and degraded. I struck my spurs into my horse, and dashed along the road with the speed of a madman. I am now old: full of evil have been the days of the years of my life, yet I am not without hope in God. I have made my peace with Him who is the Judge of the quick and dead; and I hope yet to see the good man of God with feelings very different from those with which I met him last.'"

CHALMER'S REGRET.

DR. CHALMERS, on his return from England, a few years ago, lodged in the house of a nobleman, not far distant from Peebles. The doctor was known to excel in conversation, as well as in the pulpit. He was the life of the discourse in the circle of friends at the nobleman's fire-side. The subject was pauperism—its causes and cure. Among the gentlemen present, there was a venerable old Highland chieftain, who kept his eyes fastened on Dr. C., and listened with intense interest to his communications. The conversation was kept up to a late hour. When the company broke up, they were shown up-stairs into their apartments. There was a lobby of considerable length, and the doors of the bed-chambers opened on the right and left. The apartment of Dr. C. was directly opposite to that of the old chieftain, who had already retired with his attendant. As the doctor was undressing himself, he heard an unusual noise in the chieftain's room; the noise was succeeded by a heavy groan! He hastened into the apartment, which was in a few minutes filled with the company, who all rushed in to the relief of the old gentleman. It was a melancholy sight which met their eyes. The venerable white-headed chief had fallen into the arms of his attendant in an apoplexy. He breathed for a few moments and expired. Dr. C. stood in silence, with both hands stretched out, and bending over the deceased. He was the very picture of distress. He was the first to break silence. "Never in my life," said he, in a tremulous voice, "did I see, or did I feel, before this moment, the meaning of that text, 'Preach the word: be instant in season, and out season: reprove, rebuke, exhort, with all long-suffering and doctrine.' Had I known that my venerable friend was within a few minutes of eternity, I would not have dwelt on that subject which formed the topic of this evening's conversation. I would have addressed myself earnestly to him. I would have preached unto him and you Christ Jesus, and him crucified. I would have urged him and you, with all the earnestness befitting the subject, to prepare for eternity. You would have thought it, and you would have pronounced it, out of season. But ah! it would have been in season, both as it respected him, and as it respects you."

TIME OF CHRIST'S BIRTH.

BY H. M. BRYANT.

IN the article headed "Those Computations," published a few weeks since, the writer terms the idea of Christ's being born five years before the Christian era, an unsettled problem. As he puts the question it would indeed be an "enigma." The claim is not that Christ was born five years before himself, but that he was born in the fifth year before the Christian era, as commonly accepted, commenced. Our common A. D. was not established until the sixth century, hence there may be a mistake in the arrangement. He asks, "Will some brother inform me how Christ could be born five years before himself?" That, I, for one, am unable to do; but I think it can be demonstrated from Bible and history that our Lord was born in the fifth year before the commencement called Anno Domini.

Notice Matt. ii. 19. There it is plainly stated that Christ was born in the days of Herod, the king. This much is admitted by J. P. S., to have been learned by him, and it will give us a starting point. "Usher's Chronology" places the event four years before our common A. D., as you will notice by referring to the note at the head of the chapter. Now if we can give evidence to substantiate Usher's statement, and prove that Herod died before our common A. D. begins, the light that is sought will be given, and the "enigma" solved.

Josephus informs us that by the interest of Anthony, Herod was appointed king by the Roman Senate in the one hundred and eighty-fourth olympiad, which synchronizes with B. C. 41, Antiq. 14, 16. 4. He also adds that Herod reigned thirty-seven years from this appointment. Antiq. 17, 8, 1. As his reign commenced forty-one years before Christ, or our common A. D., if we subtract the thirty-seven years of his reign from the forty-one, it gives us the year four before our A. D., as the time of his death. Josephus also gives astronomical computations to establish the death of Herod. Of these Dr. Hales remarks: "Such a critical conformity of astronomical and historical evidence furnished by an author the most competent to procure genuine information, establishes both, and decides that Herod's death was not later than B. C. 4. Christ's birth, therefore, could not have been earlier than B. C., 6, nor later than B. C. 5."

There are several other methods by which we may arrive at the same results, as regards the death of Herod. By referring to Luke iii., we find that Christ was baptized at about the age of thirty, and that it was in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar. Luke iii. 1, 23. By reference to Usher again, he will perceive that he (Usher) places the fifteenth of Tiberius, A. D. 26. Tiberius succeeded Augustus. The reign of Augustus Cæsar is dated from the battle of Actium, B. C. 31. He reigned forty-four years, which brings us to A. D. 14 as the time of his death. Tiberius was associated with Augustus nearly three years, or from A. D. 11 until A. D. 14, in which year Augustus died. Now as we have given the full number of years that Augustus reigned, we must deduct the time that Tiberius reigned jointly with him, as we shall make use of the same time twice. Observe, Christ was thirty years old in the fifteenth of Tiberius' joint reign, but the twelfth year of his sole reign, hence 14 years for Augustus and 12 years for Tiberius gives us the common A. D. 26, and if, as Luke affirms, Christ was at that time thirty years old, it gives us before the common A. D. 5, for the time of his birth.

NORTHWOOD NARROWS, N. H., Dec., 1870.

A KING, walking out one morning, met a lad at the stable door, and asked him, "Well, boy, what do you do? what do they pay you now?" "I help in the stable," replied the lad, "but I have nothing except victuals and clothes." "Be content," replied the king, "I have no more." All that the richest possess beyond food, raiment and habitation, they have but the keeping, or the disposing, not the present enjoyment of. A plough-boy, who thinks and feels correctly, has enough to make him contented: and if a king have a discontented spirit, he will find some plea for indulging it.

THE HERALD OF LIFE.

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 14, 1870.

No Immortality nor future life, except in Jesus Christ alone, and by a resurrection at the last day if dead, or a change if alive..

RESPONSIBILITIES.

The Editor holds himself responsible for none of the sentiments of Correspondents. The Editor's articles do not all appear under what is called the "Editorial Head." Any articles without a signature, or which are not credited to another source, the Editor is responsible for, without saying whether he wrote them or not, he leaves the reader to judge of their authorship. Let these things be kept in mind in reading the Herald of Life, and the praise or blame will rest where it ought.

THE EDITOR'S HEALTH.

IT will be remembered that we were permitted last week to report an improvement. This has been to some extent so. He has had some drawbacks but, on the whole, is believed to be better than last week.

He is still unable to take more than a trifling amount of nourishment; and this fact is of itself, of course, a great obstacle in the way of any thing like rapid recovery even should everything else work favorably. He generally rests much better at night than he was able to do previous to the last ten days. Notwithstanding what has been said of the Editor, we hear from numbers of his friends and sympathizers who have evidently failed to appreciate the extreme critical condition in which he has long lain. Though better than he was, he is still so weak that the attending physician has, within the past ten days, prohibited his seeing any one but the family, and requests that even they have nothing more to say to him than is necessary to properly add to his comfort.

If, by the blessing of the Lord, recovery is finally attained, it must of necessity be but slowly reached. Under the most favorable circumstances that can reasonably be hoped for, he will hardly be able to perform much, if any labor this winter. But let us all hope for the best. L. C. T.

THE IMPENITENT DEAD.

"Women received their dead raised to life again: and others were tortured, not accepting deliverance; that they might obtain a better resurrection."—Heb. xi. 35.

THIS is another of the texts which a seeker after truth thinks antagonizes with the view of no future life for those who die in impenitence. Many there are, of course, who regard the text the same, or similarly.

We need not here repeat, in detail, what must be very apparent to all who read the discourse of Paul, of which the text is a part. He is endeavoring to impress upon the mind of the Hebrews the necessity for a free and uniform exercise of faith. In order the better to enlighten them, he places before them many notable instances, from the creation of the world, down to the final invasion of Canaan, of the wonderful efficacy of faith in God's promises. He reminds them of extraordinary achievements that have been accomplished by certain champions of faith in entering upon undertakings which they would not, without great exercise of faith, have presumed to attempt. Myriads of such instances there are on record, and Paul enumerates many of them, especially such as, being the experience of some of their own people, the Hebrews were familiar with.

"Women," he says, "received their dead raised to life again." This is a manifest reference to the restoring to life, by the Prophet Elijah, of the son of the widow of Sarepta, at whose house he was sojourning, during the famine, and the raising of the son of the Shunamite, by Elisha. In the first case the exercise of faith was most likely all on the part of the prophet, the woman having even accused him of being the cause of the child's death. In the latter case, however, the woman's faith was such that she would not be put off. To what kind of life did these women receive their dead? To a life of frailty, mortality and suffering. They were just as much subject to death after they were raised to life as they were before they died; and they were equally subject to all the ills of life. "By faith these women received their dead raised to life." But, says the apostle, on the other hand, "others were tortured, not accepting deliverance; that they might obtain a better resurrection."

Whoever these "others" were, of whom Paul speaks, it is evident both from the text itself, and the subject-matter of the whole discourse, that they were tortured on account of their religion; and because they would not, as a condition of freedom and security, renounce their faith in God and His promises, they were tortured and put to death. They rejected the terms of immunity from suffering and death, and chose to endure whatever might be inflicted, and die any death rather than sacrifice their hope of being raised from the dead to immortality, and thus sought to secure a resurrection which will be infinitely "better" than that which they experienced whom the women received to life. The contrast, in the text, is between the glorious resurrection to eternal life which they who died in faith expected, and such a resurrection as the children, spoken of, received at the hands of the prophets. A better resurrection is the former, most truly! Some critics take the ground that as those who suffered torture, to the extent which Paul states, were condemned to death, their recanting would have insured them deliverance, and this deliverance would be so strongly analagous to a resurrection as to justify its being regarded as such, but that they—the tortured ones—did not accept the proffered deliverance, preferring to die in the faith, and so secure a "better resurrection." This is, of course, far-fetched—labored, and we have no sympathy with it whatever but we mention it simply to show that some even of the, so-called, orthodox critics are willing to adopt so far-fetched an idea of resurrection to put in contrast with Paul's "better" one, rather than jeopardize their reputation for ability by taking the ground that Paul alludes here to a resurrection of ungodly people. To our mind, it is plain that the "better resurrection" is in antithesis with the resurrection spoken of in the beginning of the verse.

Paul, in the expression "others were tortured, not accepting deliverance," manifestly has reference to some particular instance of trial of faith. Drs. Lange, Clark, and other commentators express the opinion that reference is made to the martyrdom of Eleazer, and of the seven brothers, together with their mother, spoken of in 2 Macc. vi. and vii. Another commentator says, "Most expositors understand the author of this epistle as alluding in this passage to the fortitude which the Jews displayed under the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes when many were put to death in severe tortures because they would not renounce their religion." In 2 Macc., as above stated, we find a partial account of that persecution. Eleazer would neither eat the swine's flesh offered him under the direction of Antiochus, nor, as urged to do by his friends, pretend to eat it, consequently he was put to death. When the seven brothers were subjected to the same test, they also refused to eat, and said, "we are ready to die, rather than transgress the laws of our fathers." One of these brothers, being in the last agonies of torture, was offered release upon condition of renunciation, but he refused it, saying to the king, "Thou like a fury takest us out of this present life, but the King of the world shall raise us up, who have died for his laws, unto everlasting life." Another, under the same circumstances, said to the king: "It is good, being put to death by men, to look for hope from God to be raised up again by Him: as for thee, thou shalt have no resurrection to life."

True, these testimonies are recorded in what are termed unauthentic Scriptures, but as they are given in connection with the events which it is fair to presume Paul referred to, and which many Bible scholars believe he referred to, they weigh not a little on the side of the conclusion that the "better resurrection" which they who would not accept deliverance expected to "obtain," was put by the apostle in contrast with the resurrection of the children which Elijah and Elisha brought back to life.

Thus the text, it seems to us, not only neither teaches nor implies a resurrection of the wicked dead, but cannot by any reasonable construction be made to seem to teach it. If we will only each and all say to our preconceived opinions, "Rest you here, while I roam though and feed upon the 'green pastures' of revelation," then truth will shine out so clearly and light up our minds so brightly we shall feel to render uninterrupted praise to God for His great goodness and for His all-pervading, ever-enduring love. May each one say, let it be ours so to do. L. C. T.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

WE have now sent the paper about three months to many subscribers who have paid nothing on the present volume. Some of these have communicated with us, saying they desire the paper continued, and they will pay soon. Others we have heard nothing from, and we are, therefore, in doubt whether to continue sending the paper to them or not. We do not, in any instance, desire to send so much as a single number to any person who does not longer want it, and we cannot help thinking it is a very small matter for all who are in arrears to do one of three things, viz., inform us, if they do not want it; or, send in without delay, the price of subscription, if they do want it; or, if they want it and cannot just yet pay for it, write to that effect.

We do not like to send papers, not knowing whether they are received and read, or whether they are left to find their way into the P. O. waste basket. As there is no weekly religious paper in the country, that we are aware of, that contains so much reading matter as this, or furnishes so much Scripture truth, we cannot but feel that our subscribers ought to respond promptly whenever their subscription expires. Many, no doubt, who would be unwilling to do without it, postpone remitting until a more convenient time, when they can, in fact, just as well remit at one time as at another, if they would only make up their mind to do it. Do these consider how cheap a paper they are provided with? Although it is necessary for us, our Editorial labors being added to those of our own private business, to closely apply ourself every day and every evening, in order to get the paper regularly issued during our Editor's illness, we will be marvellously encouraged in our work if all who are in arrears but are able to pay, will do so.

We take this occasion, too, to suggest to all our readers the eminent usefulness of an earnest effort to increase circulation. We venture to say that if due interest be taken by each friend of the paper, an average of at least one new subscriber to every present one will very soon be obtained. There are comparatively few subscribers who cannot, if they set about it, secure a new one, many can do more. Shall we not make the trial? Success depends upon all acting, and at once, for if it is postponed it will be neglected altogether. It is difficult to perceive how we can employ a little time—it will require little, or expend some effort to better purpose.

Many, indeed, there are who can well afford, in addition to getting one or more new subscribers, to pay for and send a copy to some friend who will promise to read it. These efforts should not be confined in the direction of professors of religion. We believe it would be productive of far more good to have every new subscriber obtained from among those who make no profession of religion. We should then be able not only to lead to truth but to Christ as well. "They that turn many to righteousness" shall shine "as the stars forever." If the order of our trial in this matter be, first prayer, then earnest, persistent effort, success will surely follow much to the glory of God and His dear Son, and to our own peace and comfort and unspeakable joy. Friends, let us try, in right good earnestness, and see what will be the result. L. C. T.

FOREIGN NEWS.

THE past week has been one of less military activity in France than was the preceding one, active operations being confined principally to the department of the Loire, and to the vicinity of Havre.

The French Army of the Loire, it turns out, as was intimated last week, met with severe reverses and is now in retreat, the Prussians pursuing. All attempts to succor Paris have failed, and the co-operating army has, of necessity, been materially weakened. Berlin dispatches, of the 9th instant, say: "A dispatch from King William to Queen Augusta confirms the report that 10,000 prisoners, 77 cannon, and four gunboats were captured at Orleans. Von Tiveston has carried Gidy, Janvey, and Prinis by storm, and Manteuffel occupied Rouen after victorious encounters." No attempt has been made by the Parisian army, since the 3d instant, to break through the investing lines. Gen. Von Moltke, in communicating with Trochu, probably suggesting a capitulation of Paris, speaks of the "rout of the Army of the Loire."

Havre seems also to be doomed. A dispatch from London dated Dec. 9, says, "Many Englishmen are returning here from Havre. They report that the Germans were marching on the city, and were hourly expected to invest it." Another dispatch, dated Havre, Dec. 7, says, "The Prussians are advancing on the city. The French gave them battle a few miles distant. The losses were about equal."

Rejoicings over the recent brilliant victories are said to be general in the larger cities throughout Prussia, and the end of the war is regarded as nigh. Stung, however, by their heavy losses in the recent engagements about Paris, the German people urge the bombardment of the city in order to hasten its surrender. An appeal to the King to that effect is being talked of. French officers, prisoners in Prussia, are represented as strongly opposed to a restoration of the Bonapartes.

The proposed conference respecting the Eastern question will probably take place. A message from London dated Dec. 10, says, "A newspaper telegram, dated in Berlin on the 7th instant, and published in this city, states that the official invitations for the appointment of government representatives to a conference on the Eastern question in London are about to be dispatched to the various courts. A peaceable settlement of this question, therefore, is not improbable. It is, however believed by many in England, that Russia is securing large quantities of arms from the United States.

The cable news of to-day, Monday, are to the effect that Gambetta, the French Minister of War, has asked for an armistice to enable the National Assembly to be elected. He admits, if the dispatch is reliable, that there is no longer hope of successfully prosecuting the struggle. He declines the responsibility of either further struggles or peace proposals. The complete failure of the sorties, and the total defeat of the Army of the Loire have rendered it certain that Paris can expect no aid from the Provinces. The fall of Paris, in some shape, must soon occur. L. C. T.

TRUE PRAYER.

WOULD you see true prayer—would you know what prayer really is? Step into this Egyptian palace where Benjamin stands bound—his amazing and trembling brothers grouped around the lad. Judah advances. He bows himself before Joseph. His heart is full. His lip trembles. The tear glistens in his manly eye; and now, with tenderness thrilling in every tone, he pours forth his plea of surpassing pathos: "Oh, my lord, let thy servant, I pray thee, speak a word in my lord's ears, and let not thine anger burn against thy servant: my lord asked his servants, saying, have ye a father or a brother? And we said unto my lord, We have a father, an old man, and a child of his old age, a little one; and his brother is dead; and he alone is left of his mother, and his father loveth him." Thus he goes on; and every sentence goes like a knife into Joseph's heart. And then he closes and crowns his appeal with this most brave and generous proposal: "Now therefore, I pray thee, let thy servant abide instead of the lad, as bondsman to my lord; for how shall I go to my father, and the lad not with me, lest I see the evil that shall come upon my father." Joseph's heart, which has been swelling with emotion, is now ready to burst. He can stand it no longer; nor any wonder. This is prayer; and could we bring such earnestness to Jesus, oh how would his tender, much more tender heart, melt like wax before it. Did we approach him with the fervor that glowed and burnt in Judah's speech: did we plead for our own souls or those of others, with such tears, in such tones, as Judah's when he plead for Benjamin, how would a divine brother discover himself to us?

Now turn from that Egyptian to his Hebrew palace. There also is prayer. Two women stand before King Solomon. In the darkness of the night, one has crept with noiseless step to her neighbor's bed, and while the mother slept, and the babe slept in her bosom, softly, cautiously, she steals the living child, and leaves her own cold, dead infant in its place. They carry the dispute to Solomon—each claiming the living, and each repudiating the dead. With a skill that earned him his world-wide fame, the wise monarch summons nature as a witness. Horrible to hear, he orders the living child to be divided. The sword is raised—another moment, and each mother gets a quivering half—another moment, and interference comes too late. One stands calm, firm, collected, looking on with a cruel eye. With a bound that carries her to his feet, and a shriek that rings wild and high all over the palace, the other—the true mother—clasps her hands in agony, and cries, "Oh, my lord, give her the living child, in no wise slay it." That is prayer. That cry, that spring, that look of anguish—all these proclaim the mother—how different from the cold, callous, unimpassioned frame in which, alas, the best too often present themselves at the throne of grace, as if, when we are seeking pardon, it were a matter of supreme indifference, whether our prayers were or were not answered. Oh, how should we pray that God would help us to pray, and touch our icy lips with a live coal from off the altar.—DR. GUTHRIE.

REFORMATIONS IN RELIGION.

WE have seen that corruptions of christianity have existed, from the days of the Apostles, downwards; and that these inspired teachers warned men to be on their guard against this danger. They exhort us to "take heed to our selves," on account of deceitful teachers," and to "prove all things, and hold fast that which is right." Christians, then, are evidently bound to be carefully watchful against any corruption of the "simplicity of the Gospel." And whenever they shall find that any unscriptural doctrines or practices have crept in, it is their duty to exert themselves for the correction of the evil. And, accordingly, it appears that almost every one of the corruptions which have prevailed in Christian Churches, was opposed, more or less, at its first introduction. Yet, on the whole, this opposition was, for many centuries, so far ineffectual, that the religion of the greater part of the Christian world degenerated more and more from its original purity.

It is not our design to give an account of the various attempts made (with or without success) to resist the introduction of corruptions, or to drive them out. It will be sufficient to point out:

I. What are the principal hindrances that have stood in the way of a successful opposition to errors and abuses, and of needful reformations.

II. What are the faults that reformers are chiefly liable to, and against which, consequently, men ought to be especially on their guard.

[I.] There are three mistakes frequently committed by Christians, each of which has contributed to prevent successful opposition to corruption, and correction of them.

(1.) Some have attached too much importance to matters not essential, and have contended too earnestly about them.

(2.) Others—and sometimes, indeed, even the very same persons have acquiesced in very serious corruptions, through a mistaken anxiety for what they consider Christian Unity and concord.

(3.) A third cause, tending to the same effects, is a mistaken dread of innovations. Those who are on their guard only against sudden corruptions, and overlook such as creep in silently and gradually, will be disposed to resist as innovations, what are, in truth, restorations; and to maintain what are, in reality, very great and mischievous innovations.

(1.) When men are once engaged in a contest on any question, their eagerness is apt to increase as the debate goes on; and they often come to regard some matter that is really of very small consequence, as if it were of the greatest. Thus, their attention is often drawn off from things far more important. For example, there have been fierce controversies among Christians about the proper time for celebrating the festival of Easter. And this is one of the many cases in which the attempt to unite all Christians under the government of one single community on earth, has led to discord instead of concord. For, it is necessary that in any one Church, the times for celebrating religious festivals, should be fixed by authority; however unimportant it may be what shall be the time fixed. But two or more independent Churches may differ in this, and in several other non-essential points, without hostility and strife. Such questions, however, immediately become a source of strife, as soon as it is thought necessary to unite these Churches into one. And the same may be said of that most bitter dissension which arose between the Eastern and Western Churches as to the use of leavened or unleavened bread at the Lord's Supper. And at the very time when these controversies about such comparatively insignificant points were raging with the utmost fury, the unscriptural practice of applying to the Virgin and other saints as mediators (besides many other superstitions), was spreading widely among Christians.

So also, in later times, and even in our own day, there have been vehement debates on the question, whether a clergyman should preach in a black dress or a white one. And the attention of many persons has thus been called off from the far more important question as to the soundness of the doctrine preached. While occupied about the color of a vestment, they have overlooked the serious corruptions of the faith introduced by such as were "teaching for doctrines the commandments of men."

And, again, the schism of the Donatists, which gave rise to one of the most furious contentions that ever existed among Christians, originated merely in a question as to the regularity of the appointment of a certain bishop. These persons having taken up that notion respecting "apostolical succession" which has been noticed in a former part of this Dissertation, they would not allow that the ministers ordained by the bishop whose succession they disputed, were ordained at all; or that any whom these baptized were really Christians, etc. And while this fierce contest lasted, which was nearly two centuries (from the fourth to the sixth), men's attention was drawn off by it from essential points; and various corruptions were allowed to spread unchecked and unnoticed. Moreover, one effect of such contests is, that many men are apt to become, at length, so weary of strife, as to be ready to purchase peace at any price, and to acquiesce in various abuses and errors in important points, rather than run the risk of exciting any controversy.

Now we ought certainly to prefer peace and Christian concord to everything except the essentials of Gospel-truth and pure worship. But these must not be given up even for the sake of peace.

For, religious agreement is not that Christian concord which it is so important to aim t, unless it be agreement in the genuine Religion of the Gospel. There may be an agreement in error as well as in truth.

But, vehement and long-continued disputes about matters of minor importance which are not worth so much contention will often drive men into the opposite extreme, and make them ready to consent to any thing for the sake of peace and unity.

(2.) And thus they are led to commit the second of those mistakes above adverted to, and to resist all correction of abuses for fear of unsettling men's minds, disturbing the peace of the Church, and violating its Unity.

And this is especially the case when men have adopted that view of Christian Unity which represents it as consisting in having one community on earth, to which all Christians belong, or ought to belong, and to whose government all are bound to submit.

It is true. the same kind of feeling may influence the members of any Church, even one which does not claim to be "the universal church." For, men are undoubtedly bound to be very careful not to "cause divisions" hastily, or on slight grounds. Whatever Christians they find themselves belonging to, they are bound to give no occasion of any schism—any unfriendly separation from it, unless they are fully convinced on deliberate reflection that its doctrines or practices are at variance, in essential points, with Scripture, and that there is no reasonable hope of reform. But, on the other hand, if the rulers of any Church, force a part of its members to separate from it, by maintaining what is really thus unscriptural (and of this the All-Wise God alone can be the infallible judge,) the guilt of the schism lies with those rulers.

The questions however, what is or is not Scriptural? and what points are essential? are to be very carefully and candidly considered, under a sense of awful responsibility to God; and are questions on which different men often come to different conclusions.

And hence, while some are guilty of hastily causing divisions on wrong grounds, or insufficient grounds (as if each man were free to consult his own fancy or convenience in such matters,) others sometimes fall into the opposite extreme. For there are persons who will bring themselves to acquiesce in something which they perceive to be fundamentally wrong, for fear of being guilty of causing a schism.

Now this latter fault, men are much more liable to, who consider "the true Church" to be, necessarily, one community under a single government on earth. For all Christ's promises being made to his Church, they feel that a separation from that community which they regard as the Catholic Church, would be to renounce the Gospel Covenant. And thence they are led to infer, either that Christ allows this Church to depart in important points from the written Word, or else what plainly appear to be departures from it, are somehow reconcilable with it. They would, perhaps, be glad if the governors of their Church could be prevailed on to remedy such and such an abuse. But if these resolve, in compliance with the wish of the majority, to retain it, such persons consider that they have only to submit, rather than forfeit (as they imagine) all their Christian hopes at once. They oppose or question the decisions of the Church which they regard as the divinely appointed Authority and Guide for all Christians in whatever pertains to religion, they consider as a rebellion against Christ. And thus they in time force themselves to believe their Church infallible—to assent to and uphold the grossest corruptions—and to resist all attempts at correction.

This mistake as to the nature of Christian unity is one which could hardly arise in the days of the Apostles. For they manifestly founded many distinct Churches, agreeing indeed in Faith, but quite independent of each other, and having no common Head on Earth. And the Bishops which they appointed for the government of most (if not all) of these Churches, differed as much from the Bishops of later times, as a Sovereign prince does from a colonial governor. Each was the Head Presbyter, to whom was intrusted the chief power in an entire Church.

It was indeed allowable and desirable that delegates from these several Churches should assemble, from time to time, to hold a Council, (or, as it is called in political affairs, a Congress,) for the purpose of conferring together on religious questions, and concerting measures for putting down false doctrines and abuses. This did not necessarily destroy the independence of the Churches; any more than Sovereign-States surrender their independence when they send ambassadors to a Congress to deliberate concerning a treaty. But ambitious men, when they obtained a majority in any of these Councils, naturally encouraged the notion that the minority were bound to submit to their decisions, whether they would or no. This, so far, tended to combine all these Churches into one. And when the chief part of the Roman Empire became Christian, the Emperors always sought to favor this combination, in order that they might the more easily and more completely control it.

And that this worldly policy of theirs had a principal share in the uniting of the several distinct Christian communities into one, is plain from the circumstance that it was not Jerusalem—the earliest Church, and from which all others were offsets—but Rome, the political Capital of the Empire, that came to be regarded as the seat of government, and centre of the Universal Church.

There is not, indeed, any rule laid down by divine authority, as to what is to be the greatest extent of a single Church. It cannot, therefore, be said that there is in Scripture any direct prohibition of Christians all over the world uniting themselves into single community. But the example left us by the Apostles, in founding many distinct Churches, independent of that of Jerusalem, and of each other, shows that they did not consider a very extensive Church as either a necessary or a desirable thing. And the inconvenience is so manifest and so great, of placing under one Church-government men of different nations, far distant from each other, and differing in language and customs, that we may be sure no such thing would ever have been thought of, except either for reasons of worldly policy, or else from a misconception of the character of Christ's kingdom. The ruler of a great empire, containing many provinces, may naturally wish that all his subjects should be members of the same Church and are likely to be tempted by ambition to extend that church as widely as possible. Those, again, who make the mistake obove alluded to, respecting the true meaning of christian-unity, will readily enter into these views. And some will be likely to fancy that the governors of a single Church comprehending all Christians, will be likely to prevent such errors as might spring up in some out of a multitude of independent Churches, and thus preserve the purity of Gospel truth. But this is to suppose that the governors of the universal Church are to be infallible. Else, it is plain that they may fall into error as easily as the governors of a smaller Church, and may employ their extensive power in maintaining and spreading such error. And, accordingly, all who contend for a Universal Church, in the sense of a single community under one government on earth, always lay claim,—more or less distinctly,—to infallibility as belonging to that Church.

But as no such infallibility can be proved, or does exist, the result has been that all attempts to give universal dominion to a single Church have increased the difficulty of checking and of correcting corruptions.

For example—one great abuse, and that the parent of many others, the keeping of the Scriptures and of the public Service in a dead language, was doubtless much favored by the great extent of a single Church. The abuse was not one that originated in very early times. For it was not caused by men's having from the first a superstitious dread of any attempt to translate the Scriptures at all, and consequently leaving them in the original Hebrew and Greek. On the contrary, they were translated into Latin, when that was the prevailing language, on purpose that they might be accessible to the people. And afterwards, when Latin gradually ceased to be spoken in the Provinces, and at length, Rome itself, the Latin Bible and Prayer-Books continued in use after they had ceased to be understood by the mass of the people. No one could point out the precise time when a new translation first became necessary; because the change of Latin into Italian, Spanish, etc., was gradual. And men had a sort of superstitious veneration for the language which they and their fathers had been accustomed to hear employed in divine Service.

And this is evidently an error which it served the purpose of an ambitious Church to keep up. All over the world, as far as the dominion of that Church extended, the Priests had a language of their own, not understood by the common people, in which alone the Sacred Books could be studied. And thus the People could know little or nothing of their Religion, except just what these Priests chose to tell them.

Is Christ's Kingdom Literal or Spiritual?

BY EDWARD MASON.

I presume most of the brethren admit that there is to be a literal, personal reign of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who comes to be glorified in his saints, and to be admired by all that believe in that day, or during his reign. Are all to see him? Certainly not; only those who look for him. To them shall he appear, and they are the ones to manifest his power and glory to the unbelieving world. The proof of this I gather from the works he performed at the first advent, and from the power he gave to his chosen or twelve apostles, as also to the "seventy," whom he appointed, and sent into every city and place whither he himself would come, that there will be a harvest in the end of this world, or age, just as there was one established at the end of the Jewish age, and that kingdom was announced to be the kingdam of God. Jesus said to the unbelieving Jews, "but if I cast out devils by the Spirit of God, then the kingdom of God is come unto you."—Matt. xii. 28. "And this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world for a witness unto all nations, and then shall the end come."—Matt. xxiv. 14. A multitude of other passages of the same import I might quote to prove that the kingdom was offered to the Jews and rejected; therefore he said on a certain occasion, the kingdom shall be taken from you and given to a nation bringing forth the fruits in its season. Unto us who believe in Jesus it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom, and understand the teachings of our Lord and Master, but unto the unbelieving he spake in parables, that seeing they might not perceive, and hearing they might not understand, that the sayings of the prophets might be fulfilled in them.

How I rejoice that I live in this age of wonders, to witness the rapidity with which the Scriptures are being fulfilled. How different from the former views entertained by many of us, and by many still. For the return of Jesus we wait and watch.

Baltimore, Md., Nov., 1870.

Read and be not Offended.

As we have read about our duty to preachers of the Gospel, I ask to lay before you some of the trials peculiar to the wives of such servants. The writer of this article has been intimate with the families of scores of our preachers, and has had ample opportunity to know their trials. We will not make a point of her husband's absence from home, leaving her to train his boisterous boys, and manage affairs in general; that is nothing more than a tin-pedlar's wife, for instance, goes through, and savors not of sacrifice, in particular, for any woman would keep house alone to let her husband travel to make money. But when one travels and returns with empty pockets—his time spent in doing good to others, and returns to find rent, wood, hay, flour, clothes, and everything a family needs, to be paid for in something more passable than Gospel truth, why, then is a chance to know where the spirit of sacrifice reigns.

But there are so many ignorant, puffed up men leaving their families, with a conceit that the Lord calls them, while their families almost beg here and there because the "laborer" fails to receive "his hire," and they are such useless workmen, too, I don't wonder some of the churches begin to doubt the Lord's having made any such "call to preach" in any man's ears.

It is no man's duty to gad through the country unless the Lord is with him. To those whom he called at the first the promise was made, "Lo! I am with you always." He also promised to supply their needs. Now if the Lord doesn't do that, be assured, my brother, he is perfectly willing you should "go a fishing," or make tent, part of the time, at least.

Again: there are some who preach only on Sundays, working with their hands through the week. Sickness and adverse circumstances have brought them into straight places. They do their best, but still are unable to be thoroughly comfortable. I know many such whose labors in the Gospel are acknowledged as blessed of the Lord. Good is done through their Sunday labors. These are the most severely tried of any class of preachers. If they haven't but two white shirts, both in the wash, and a call comes to leave home, what then? It is said, "A man that works might have more clothes, if he wasn't shiftless." O yes, and when his wealthy brothers hear him preach they think, "He doesn't need any material help—he works and can provide for himself."

A case that occurred only last week is so appropriate here I write it out. A feeble sister woke at the midnight hour, suffering from lameness, caused by not having sufficiently warm clothing, and while meditating upon the possibility of herself and little ones being obliged to pass, thinly clad, a cold winter, she thought of the "storehouse" that had in times past supplied her needs. She knocked at the door, made her wants known, believed her Father would help her, and went to sleep.

A day or two afterward the mail brought a letter to her from a sister, who had never written her before, and on the first page were these inquiries: "Are you in want? Have you warm clothing for winter? Have you a shawl, or a cloak?" O blessed be the Lord for his tender care over his helpless creatures! Who that has been obliged to go to him in time of need, and has found him ever ready to bless, can doubt his care and love? I would honor and praise his holy name for what I know of his goodness in this one particular. Yet he is altogether good.

And now, brethren and sisters, believers in Life through Christ alone, let me say a few words to you, and I am done. Out of regard to my sensitiveness, excuse me for not signing my name, for the first time, in the Herald. It almost seems like being ashamed of the cross, yet for various reasons I think it best.

Have you ever thought that stored away in your closets and chests are out-grown suits, various articles of clothing, affording only hiding-places for spiders and moths, which would make many a poor but industrious family happy and comfortable? Have you considered that there are opportunities to benefit God's poor besides with money? Do you know that a box or barrel of clothes, that could be made over for children, would be received by some of your fellow-laborers as answers to their prayers, and God thus get more honored by you? You can't tell all the most needy ones by their writings or preaching. Those who have most faith in God beg in their closets, and write cheerfully for the papers. They don't make a practice of displaying their poverty. The most destitute preacher, if he be earnest, can't be known by his talk at the close of his sermons. He doesn't say much of the "sacrifice" he makes to preach the Gospel. He feels modest about that, for he compares it with the sacrifice of Christ, and concludes that his "afflictions" are "light."

But God has heard his cries, when with all his endeavors he still needed help. I have myself seen some of them shed tears at home, then cries to God were heard, then blessings received.

Some such live in Massachusetts, some in New York, may be. No need to send all your gifts "down South," for instance. When you pray for the dear, scattered flock, ask the Lord if any are in want, or if the feeble ones are provided with "warm clothing for winter." The Lord will direct you whom to confer your gifts upon. May we strive to give, if but a "cup of cold water," to the needy ones, and God will bless.

Notes of a Learner on Truth.

BY F. A. F.

There is probably no proverb in common use, the truth of which is oftener and more strikingly illustrated than that "consistency is a jewel;" and nowhere does this jewel shine with greater lustre than when manifested by man in considering the eternal truths of God.

Few there are among inquiring minds who, in pretence at least, do not anxiously desire to be possessed of truth and to have their store of knowledge, free of error; and further, this same class of individuals, when occasion so requires, are profuse in their acknowledgments of ignorance in respect to much that is yet to be unfolded—may be willing even to confess it quite probable that some which they hold to as truth may be error. But how far does the conduct of the great body of truth-seekers—not of an erring few—accord with the profession and acknowledgments we have mentioned? The question needs no answer. The history of every new idea, is one continued series of conflicts with this kind of truth-lovers. It is in the face of every device which their inventive genius can produce, that it rises to the light and sheds its benign influence upon the minds and hearts of men.

There seems to be in man, as a part of his very nature, such a strong spirit of conservatism, as to cause him to almost involuntarily shrink from any thing which bears a resemblance to originality. No doubt this element of human character is calculated to guard him, in a measure, from the attacks of error, and hence is entitled to respect; but, like every other virtue, its abuse renders it ridiculous. A new idea is presented—of course it is incorrect, if it were otherwise why have not we or our fathers thought of it before, and immediately the mind commences its work of rummaging the resources of the past and present to discover some means of showing its absurdity; and as a rule it is not until compelled by argument to see something of the base upon which it rests, that a willingness to listen is manifested. And yet all the while they have been very anxious to discover truth, and grow in knowledge!

It is in this trait in our character, that we are to find an explanation of that otherwise unaccountable neglect and sometimes persecution of men who are so far ahead of the masses. But so it has ever been, and when we inquire for the reason for such conduct, we are informed in an indifferent tone "they have some strange notions," always forgetting that around every thing new there necessarily hovers an air of strangeness for a time. Admitting, however, that some of their theories have been weighed and found wanting, thsi is, to say the least, an unsatisfactory reason for not availing ourselves of their talents to speed us on in the way of truth. Nay, as well might we reject many kinds of food for bodily nourishment, because it needs a certain amount of discrimination for its proper use. Such reasoning befits babes in understanding, not men. "Prove all things," accept the good, reject the bad—this is the motto of wisdom. No doubt this spirit of opposition to new trains of thought has always existed to a greater or less extent, and that the cause of truth has prospered notwithstanding, but this certainly does not justify us in continuing in ignorance. The past centuries of experience which have been committed to our trust, ought not to prove an unfruitful volume. When we call to mind the example of the noble Luther and his associates, how he arrayed himself against the doctrines which had been questioned for centuries and yet he proved to be correct, it ought to make us cautious in our treatment of the arguments of those who call in question doctrines, which we have held from infancy, and assign the latter fact as evidence of their correctness.

The age of the ore which contains the precious metal, is no evidence of its purity. Lost in the desire to separate the dross from the gold, the workman has no reverence for its age. He subjects the whole mass to the purifying fire, and cares little how soon the process of separation is accomplished, if it be complete. And thus should it be with the brain. The golden truth is always hindered in its mission of usefulness by the presence of any amount of the dross of error, and no effort to separate it should be despised. Much less should it be so, where the act of casting off the adipose matter of the brain is succeeded by an influx of new and tried material, for what does not promote the development of the intellect is a positive hindrance. When the husbandman lops off the dead and unsightly branches of the vine, he renders its life and strength more manifest, and in addition he makes way for that which will yield him constant fruit.

All truth, wherever found, is a revelation of God, and is worthy of our notice and earnest consideration, as unfolding to finite minds the wisdom, power, and goodness of the infinite God.

Letters and Extracts.

From Eld. R. V. Lyon.

Dear Editors: I am very sorry for the sickness of Br. Storrs. I know how to feel for him, having been myself laid aside a good deal during the past few years. This is a great trial to those who practice activity in life. But all is well that ends well.

The cause of Bible truth is gaining ground in some places. In Northern New York we have strong friends. I found in that locality some who were brought into the truth by reading my own works, since I was there two years ago. In my last mission I was absent five Sundays, and preached and talked much. I immersed eight "into the name of Jesus" our Life-giver, "for the remission of sins." I obtained one new subscriber for the Herald.

When at the Springfield camp-meeting, I was astounded while hearing a discourse from the public stand, from these words, "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, to-day; and forever."

I have come to the conclusion to send all the preachers whose post-office address is given in the "Crisis," a work which I have lately published, "Jesus of Nazareth: His Offices and Character, as Revealed to us in the Bible." The expense will be about $24. Now if any of my brethren wish to aid in this work, they have the opportunity.

Yours, in Christ.

Suspension Bridge, N. Y., Dec., 1870.

Br. Storrs: Having heard through the Herald, of your severe illness, I cannot refrain from expressing a word of sympathy. But there is nothing so comforting and cheering to the dear afflicted ones as the precious promises of God. How blessed are we in believing those promises when we arrive to that condition of mind in which we can truly say, in all things, "Not my will, but thine be done."

God is able to heal; and it is written, the prayer of faith shall save the sick. I am glad there are some who can and do have this healing faith. Many prayers are offered in your behalf. The Lord will do as seemeth good in his sight.

Long Point, Ill., Dec., 1870.

From Wm. H. Spence.

Br. Thorne: We thank God from the depth of our heart that our last paper was able to bring to us the good and happy news that our dear old veteran, and tried soldier, Br. Storrs, the humble yet bold servant of Christ, still lives. Blessed be the name of the ever-living and true God. We desire in humility and love, to increase in gratitude to God for this and all His goodness to us. May it please our heavenly Father to take us all, unworthy as we are, under His arm of protection, and keep us in patient waiting and watching for Christ. To Him let us give all the glory, now, then and forever.

The Force of Truth.

A gentleman was once asked in company, what led him to embrace the truths of the gospel, which formerly he was known to have neglected and despised! He said, "My call and conversion to God, my Saviour, were produced by very singular means; a person put into my hands 'Paine's Age of Reason.' I read it with attention, and was much struck with the strong and ridiculous representation he made of many passages in the Bible. I confess, to my shame, I had never read the Bible through; but from what I remember to have heard at church, and accidentally on other occasions, I could not persuade myself that Paine's report was quite exact, or that the Bible was quite so absurd as he represented. I resolved, therefore, that I would read the Bible regularly through, and compare the passages when I had done so, that I might give the Bible fair play. I accordingly set myself to the task, and as I advanced, I was struck with the majesty which spoke, the awfulness of the truths contained in it, and the strong evidence of its divine origin, which increased with every page, so that I finished my inquiry with the fullest satisfaction of the truth as it is in Jesus, and my heart was penetrated with a sense of obligation I had never felt before. I resolved henceforth to take the sacred word for my guide, and to be a faithful follower of the Son of God."

Vulgar Language.

There is as much connection between the words and the thoughts as there is between the thoughts and the actions. The latter are not only the expression of the former, but they have a power to leave the stain of corruption upon the heart. A young man who allows himself to use one vulgar or profane word has not only shown that there is a foul spot upon his mind, but by the utterance of that word he extends that spot and inflames it, till, by indulgence, it will pollute and ruin him. Be careful of your words and of your thoughts.

If you can control the tongue that no improper words are pronounced by it, you will soon be able to control the mind and save it from corruption. You extinguished the fire by smothering it, or by preventing bad thoughts from bursting into language. Never utter a word anywhere which you would be ashamed to speak in the presence of the most refined female or the most religious man. Try this practice a little while, and you will soon have command of yourself.—Sel.

Two gardeners, who were neighbors, had their crops of early peas killed with frost; one of them came to condole with the other on this misfortune. "Ah!" cried he, "how unfortunate we have been, neighbor! Do you know I have done nothing but fret ever since. But you seem to have a fine healthy crop coming up already; what are these?" "These!" cried the other gardener, "why these are what I sowed immediately after my loss." "What! coming up already?" cried the fretter. "Yes; while you were fretting, I was working." "What! don't you fret when you have a loss?" "Yes; but I always put it off until after I have repaired the mischief." "Why then you have no need to fret at all." "True," replied the industrious gardener; "and that's the very reason."

Diogenes being at Olympia, saw at the celebrated festival some young men of Rhodes, arrayed most magnificently. Smiling, he exclaimed, "This is pride." Afterward meeting with some Lacedemonians in a mean and sordid dress, he said, "And this is also pride."

Pride is found at the same opposite extremes in dress at the present day.

Mr. Burkitt observes in his journal, that some persons would never have had a particular share in his prayers, but for the injuries they had done him.

Our salvation does not depend upon our having right notions about the devil, but right feelings a bout God.—F. W. Robertson.

SLEEP.

OF all the thoughts of God that are
Borne inward unto souls afar,
Along the Psalmist's music deep,—
Now tell me if that any is
For gift or grace surpassing this.—
"He giveth his beloved sleep?"

What would we give to our beloved?
The hero's heart, to be unmoved,—
The poet's star-tuned harp to sweep,—
The senate's shout to patriot vows,—
The monarch's crown, to light the brows?
"He giveth his beloved sleep!"

What do we give to our beloved?
A little faith, all undisproved,—
A little dust to overweep,—
And bitter memories, to make
The whole earth blasted for our sake!"
"He giveth his beloved sleep!"

"Sleep soft, beloved!" we sometimes say,
But have no tune to charm away
Sad dreams, that through the eyelids creep.
But never doleful dream again
Shall break the happy slumber, when
"He giveth his beloved sleep!"

O earth, so full of dreary noises!
O men, with wailing in your voices!
O delved gold, the wailer's heap!
O strife, O curse, that o'er it fall!
God makes a silence through you all,
And "giveth his beloved sleep!"

His dews drop mutely on the hill,
His cloud above it saileth still;
Though on its slope men toil and reap,
More softly than the dew is shed,
Or cloud is floated overhead,
"He giveth his beloved sleep."

Yea, men may wonder, while they scan
A living, thinking, feeling man
In such a rest his heart to keep;
But angels say,—and through the word
I ween their blessed smile is heard,—
"He giveth his beloved sleep!"

For me, my heart, that erst did go
Most like a tired child at a show,
That sees through tears the juggler's leap,
Would now its weary vision close,—
Would, child-like, on his love repose,
"Who giveth his beloved sleep!"

And friends!—dear friends!—when it shall be
That this low breath is gone from me,
And round my bier ye come to weep,
Let one, most loving of you all,
Say, "Not a tear must o'er her fall,—
'He giveth his beloved sleep!'"

MRS. BROWNING.

THE SEEDS OF THINGS.

BY J. B. COOK.

THE tract herewith noticed gives the points plainly, so that they can be met, and the truth made more clear to some. We do not justly give nor take offence while truth is our aim and God is held supreme. J. B. C.

"THE MEDIATORIAL KINGDOM OF CHRIST,"

ALAS, ABOUT TO END, SHORT OF "SALVATION."

The tract with this heading takes away "the mediatorial kingdom" as the writer terms it, at the very point where it must, as revealed, attain its royal triumph over the earth.—Dan. vii. 14; Rev. v. 9, xi. 15, xvii. 14, xx. 5–7; Ps. lxxii. 11; Isa. lix. 20–60, 12; Luke xix. 12–15; Matt. xix. 28; Heb. i. 2–8. Then, God carries out his then unaccomplished purpose. Thus mediation is made to end short of "victory," short of "salvation." The heirship and dominion of Christ, and his titles of Judge, Captain of Salvation, Restorer and Deliverer, are annulled at the precise point where they become essential to fulfil the gospel plan. The grand features of this tract are all that I can now notice.

1st, The throne and king, "of which God says nothing within the vail," it locates there in utter disregard of God's order to the contrary. "The tabernacle and throne of David," it takes up from the dust and desolation of centuries, and thrusts them in at the right hand of God—on high! Nay more, to hurry up the Gospel plan, and hasten it clear through in this age, it makes Christ's "all power in heaven and earth" co-ordinate and sub-ordinate to Roman rule in this world, and only concurrent with that of God's providence above. Thus it makes the kingdom of Christ "of none effect by its tradition." In such case of course God will adopt other measures to "take away the sin of the world."

It sees that Christ was to be "King in Salem—Jerusalem," but ignores all Bible and all history which shows that that sacred city, has been "trodden down of the Gentiles," till now,—over eighteen hundred years. Again: The Messiah must be "King of righteousness—King of peace." Yet this cannot be "within the vail," where no such king or kingdom could enter; hence, as there has been "no king save Cæsar," the Roman, to rule "this world (or age—the limit it sets to the mediatorial kingdom) it follows that all the Gospel denoted by such terms and titles of our Lord comes to nought.

Furthermore, as the entire cause of Christ, in this age, has been contemporaneous with Rome, and as Christ and his saints have been the martyred subjects to Rome the whole "gospel of the kingdom," if it could end as this tract teaches, is but a stupendous pretence. By consequence, Christ should "withdraw" as it argues, leaving the Almighty to adopt some more effective measure.

2d, Christ is to be a Priest forever after the order of Melchisedek. He shall be a Priest on his throne—which carries this priestly office and service into the coming kingdom. That is the only possible sphere of this royal priesthood—this mediatorial kingdom, with His saints in resurrection life.—Rev. xx. 5–7. "He shall be a priest forever, eis aiona, into the age—to come."—Heb. ii. 5; v. 6; vi. 20; vii. 17–21. Hence he is "the same forever—eis aionas! (plural, for ages—not eternities.)

The promised seed is Christ, and all in Christ as his bride, who shall not fail nor be discouraged till he "set judgment in the earth." He shall bring forth judgment unto victory. They that are with Him are the called, the chosen and faithful, (in overcoming the ten kings.—Rev. xvii. 14).—Matt. xii. 20; Gen. xxii. 18; Gal. iii. 16–19; Luke xix. 12–19; 1 Cor. xii. 12. This blessed "seed shall possess the gate," hold the place of power, and "bless the nations."—Ps. lxxii. 16–20; Luke i. 69–73; Rom. xv. 8–13.

Thus "the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms—the Gospel, Jesus, and his apostles teach this primal and all-pervading truth. Then the great sabbatism. Heb. iv. 1–9—The times of refreshing from the (then returned) presence of the Lord—the times of Restitution of all things spoken, Acts iii. 19–21; and all that is said of the age and ages to come fall in to confirm and crown and consummate the glorious Gospel and temple of the Most High. Amen. But our author ignores all such abounding Scripture, and writes as if his present argument could set the boundary of divine mercy. Hence he insists on closing up the whole gospel of the grace of God, in this iron—Roman age.

Surely "the seventh day—the day of Christ—the rest and restitution" cannot be crowded back into the sixth day; nor can death and the devil dominate and destroy, in the mediatorial kingdom, or kingdom of Christ.

It is hard to conceive of a more fatal misapprehension, short of an entire rejection of the sacred oracles, because the proper coming,—the crowning coming is yet to come. In about nine cases out of ten Christ's coming applies to his second coming unto salvation. Hence this coming is to insure and open, and inaugurate this "age—world—kingdom in Zion—life and glory—to come." They are all forever, eis aiona, unto the age, and on into the ages to come." But beside all noted above, this writer, to avoid any occasion for the Redeemer yet coming to Zion, as promised, hoists it up, in imagination, into heaven;—yet it is by some strange oversight, still in its old place being plowed as a field.—Micah iii. 12; Matt. xxiii. 37. This may suffice to show the utter disorder to which he has, in theory, brought himself and the cause of Christ. He undermines his own hope and loses his life amid the falling lumber of his own logic, because both are in Christ and only, eis aiona, forever. Both are only commensurate with the Melchisedek priesthood of Christ. Hence, if his argument avail at all to end the mediatorial kingdom at the close of this groaning, dying age, then it avails also to end his hope and portion in rayless night. He will give old Adam, sin and satan their full time and world-wide dominion, but the Redeemer's reign in the power of his promised redemption, he hides away from the face of the earth as if ashamed of it. To crown these departures from the gospel, he proceeds to mount the dome of God's great temple of truth, and take Christ, "the head stone," quite out and away. As Judge, Restorer, King and Deliverer, Christ is theorized out at the time that his royal power in redemption must begin to avail.—Psa. cx; Rom. xi. 26; Acts xvii. 31. He reverses the whole, and puts Jehovah in the place of adonay, Psa. cx. 5; has the Messiah (David's Lord, adonai), withdraw, and then Jehovah drinks of the brook and is refreshed, as only the Lord Christ can be presumed to be.

The merit of our brother lies in stating his points plainly; while others cover them, as if to avoid correction. If they will come to the light, in my humble opinion, we may aid each other to apprehend them. God judges and saves, but only BY Christ.—Acts xvii. 31; Rom. v. 10; John vi. 40; xiv. 19; xvii. 18–23; 1 John, v. 11. The day of the Lord is "the day of Christ"—as 1000 years. Zion was the site of David's throne, the throne of the Lord. Mount Moriah (not Zion, as the tract has it) was the site of the temple.—2 Chron. iii. 1.

Yes, whatever may become of God's covenant oath; or of the honor of our Lord, the Messiah; or his mediatorial kingdom and commission to bless and to save; he would cut it all short, and small enough to suit his pattern. But to give his culminating idea of Divine promise, and Christ's kingdom, in fulfilling it, he theorizes it so far out of the gospel that he leaves it nowhere on earth, nor, as we have noted, of any avail in heaven.

Christ abideth forever—eis aiona. He that eateth of this bread shall live forever—eis aiona.—John vi. 51–58; xii. 34. This is the certain and well ascertained "age to come." About fifty times this forever gives the range and sphere of the coming glory and kingdom of Christ and his saints. Hence, this author's derangement of the Gospel of Christ would involve himself and us and the promised glory in one overwhelming failure, at the end of this evil age. To what end? I answer, to rid the gospel of the only occasion for "the glory to be revealed." It is only when "God shall build up Zion that he will appear in this glory."—Psa. ci. 13, 21, and Christ is the arch-type of the mercy seat, the radiant centre of this glory of God, in which he will be revealed on "the throne of his glory." Matt. xix. 28; 1 John, ii. 2; Rom. iii. 25. This writer, it seems, has yet to learn that the great Preacher often teaches this age-world, to come.—Matt. xii. 32; Mark. x. 30; Luke xviii. 30. The term for age, world, forever, occurs one hundred times and is often of unmistakable import. It denotes a dispensation, as the Mosaic, Christian, or the coming "day of Christ" in his kingdom. Thence on, "the ages to come" open up their loftier cycle of "seven times seven," if God so please.

3d, Christ came not to destroy the law, or the prophets; but to fulfil.—Matt. v. 17. However, this tract unwitingly makes the terrible mistake of teaching not only the destruction of "the law and the prophets," but of the Gospel too. They all embrace and demand "the Sabbath, the Jubilee, the Deliverance."

The geography of "the temple on Mount Moriah" gave it an absolute distinction and separation from the "throne in Zion." The king and the priest had each their separate place and special service. But in this tract the geography, history, typical and dispensational truth involved, are put in endless confusion. Our High Priest has gone, like Moses in the mount, (the Priest within the veil) to God. He is "at the right hand of God," as the grand executor of divine mercy. As such, his coming mediatorial kingdom and judgment, through the great and appearing day—as 1000 years—belong to the gospel plan. "The called, the chosen and the faithful" of this age will join him, as kings and priests, to reign, judge and triumph with him. Rev. xvii. 14; xix. 14; Psa. cx. 3. "The desolation of many generations" will be restored: "the sanctuary cleansed," Dan. viii., and the new covenant established over Israel. Then his "sanctuary shall be in the midst of them forevermore."—Ezek. xxxvii. 28. The throne and tabernacle of David will be re-built, and Zion—Salem—be "the city of the Great King."—Psa. xviii. 2.

My notice is, of necessity, too brief to note verbal mistakes. The grand points are all that I proposed to set forth in the light that, by contrast, the truth may be more apparent. Many devout people do not see the second advent at all, and they are left to grope in the dark, as to a large part of the gospel. So, many will argue away "the age to come," though it is the only time for "the mediatorial kingdom." They "can't see how it can be." Of course not. "The entrance of thy word giveth light."—Psa. cxix.

To my feeble capacity the second advent is incomparably more glorious and Godlike with the gospel of the kingdom to come in the full measure of its grace, as well as glory, in full view. So far as the gospel is shorn of the kingdom, so far as Christ is "enjoined" in filling out God's loving will, by restoring, reigning and blessing, as promised, we derogate or destroy the divine good will. "Only believe," then the true light shineth.

THE GLORY OF GOD.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

"But as truly as I live all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord."—Num. xiv. 21.

THIS text is often quoted by that portion of the religious world who believe in a millennium this side the personal advent of Christ, as proof of the world's conversion. A correct understanding of the expression "the glory of the Lord" will, we think, dissipate this idea, of the text under consideration.

Let us look for the general use, in the Old Testament Scriptures, of this term. The children of Israel looked toward the wilderness, and behold, the glory of the Lord appeared in the cloud.—Ex. xvi. 10. "And the glory of the Lord appeared unto all the people . . . . which when the people saw they shouted and fell on their faces."—Lev. ix. 23. "And the glory of the Lord appeared in the tabernacle of the congregation, before all the children of Israel."—Num. xiv. 10. "And the earth shined with his glory."—Ezek. x. 4. "And the court was full of the brightness of the Lord's glory."—Ezek. xliii. 2. "His glory covered the heavens. And his brightness was as the light."—Hab. iii. 3, 4. From the above, and numerous other texts that might be quoted, it must be very evident that the primary signification of the term "glory of the Lord" is a shining effulgence, like unto light. And when, therefore, this oath-bound promise shall be fulfilled, a visible manifestation of God's resplendent presence will fill this entire planet. Something vastly more sublime is comprehended in this text than merely making all of Adam's children to become Christians, even if such a work was contemplated in the divine economy. It will be nothing short of the accomplishment of the prediction of the prophet of Patmos, wherein describing the ushering in of the grand restitution he says, "And I heard a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold the tabernacle of God is with men, and He will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God. Permit us to say, the above quotation is like all others used as evidence of a world's conversion. Neither it or them have the most remote reference to that subject. Neither does the Bible even hint at any such contemplated result of the preaching of the gospel of Christ. God's plan is, "He that believeth, and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned."—Mark xvi. 16.

But there is an unanswerable argument against applying this Scripture to prove a conversion of the world, from the consideration that conversion does not make men immortal, and no mortal being has ever been able to even look on the glory of the Lord, unless he was first especially prepared of God for such manifestation. Take the case of the Jews. When Moses came down from Mount Sinai he was obliged to put a vail over his face to hide what little of glory reflected from it, before the Jews could look on him. See 2 Chron. vii. 1–3. And the glory of the Lord filled the house. And the priests could not enter into the house of the Lord, because the glory of the Lord filled the Lord's house. In Ezek. i. 26–28, and ch. ii. 1, 2, there is a detailed account of a vision of glory seen by the Prophet, and the effect of the sight of the glory upon him. In this account we are informed that he could not bear the glory, and he was obliged to hide his face; and not until a special bestowment of the spirit of God was granted him was he able to listen to the instructions of the heavenly messenger.

Again, in Dan. x. 4–21 we have a most thrilling description of a vision of glory seen by the great historic Prophet. Hear Daniel's description of the effect produced by this vision, both on himself and others. And I Daniel alone saw the vision: for the men that were with me saw not the vision; but a great quaking fell upon them, so that they fled to hide themselves, v. 7. And there remained no strength in me: for my comeliness was turned in me into corruption, and I retained no strength. v. 8.

The soldiers that watched around the sepulchre of Jesus, when they saw the glory of the angel of the Lord, "did shake, and became as dead men." See Mat. xxviii. 4. Lastly: When the beloved John saw a vision of Christ in his glory, on the isle of Patmos, he "fell at his feet as dead."—Rev. i. 9–17. As in the case of Ezekiel, and Daniel, it was necessary that God prepare him, and especially strengthen him, before he could even listen to the message sent him from the Lord.

Now for an application of our subject on other points. Those who believe in a resurrection to life of all mankind,—claim that such resurrection must take place in order that all men may be "judged." Some of this class of "believers" say that this resurrection (of all men) takes place when Christ comes; others claim that the wicked portion of the human family are raised one thousand years after he comes. Hold which view they may, their theory is, in the light of the facts brought out above, subject to an insurmountable difficulty. When Christ comes, he comes in the glory of his Father (Matt. xvi. 27), in his own glory; (Matt. xxv. 31) and in the glory of all the holy angels, Mark viii. 38, Matt. xvi. 27, ch. xxiv. 31, ch. xxv. 31. The saved ones are all to be made glorious like Christ. 2d. Thess. ii. 14. Whereunto he called you by one gospel, to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ.—Phil. iii. 21. Who shall change our vile body, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body.

Now to suppose that men who have died enemies to God, can stand in the presence of all this glory long enough to pass through all the formula of an investigative judgment; when we remember that such men as Ezekiel, Daniel, and John could not look upon the glory of one angel, till God had given them a special preparation, borders on the absurd.

Again: It is assumed by others that, after the Kingdom of God is established, and Christ is reigning in his glory, mortal nations are coming up, to Jerusalem, "from year to year to worship the King, the Lord of Hosts, and to keep the feast of tabernacles."

Now if it was impossible for Jews in Moses' time to look on the face of Moses because he had borrowed just a little of the glory; and if God's ordained priests, under the old dispensation, could not enter because barely one house was filled with God's glory; and if Ezekiel, Daniel, John, and Paul were nearly killed by seeing only one angel, is it reasonable to suppose that when this entire earth shall be filled with the glory of God; when Christ shall reign in such glory as shall put out the light of the sun, and drive the moon's rays into utter obscurity. See Isaiah xxiv. 23; and "more than twelve legions of angels" shall be there with each, and the glory shown to Daniel, Ezekiel and John; and when the "great company which no man can number," all glorious like the Son of God,—"equal to the angels," shall "shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father."—Matt. xiii. 43, we repeat, is it reasonable to suppose that wicked, mortal will dwell, enjoy a probation age, and attend to the old Jewish sacrificial worship in the presence of, and admind this perfect flood of "an eternal weight of glory?"

To our mind such a supposition is not well grounded. And if lack of confidence in such theories is evidence of "unbelief," and that we are "behind the light," we must be "unbelieving" still, and walk in what may seem to others to be darkness as to the "glorious age to come."

We are earnestly looking for the age to come, but that one for which we are looking will be one of eternally perfected glory, and immortality. God grant we may all be "accounted worthy to obtain that age," for all things in heaven, earth, and sea foretoken its speedy ushering in.

CHILDREN'S DEPARTMENT.

A KISS FOR A BLOW.

I ONCE lived in Boston, says Mr. Wright, and was one of the city school committee.

One day I visited one of the primary schools. There were about fifty children in it, between four and eight years old.

"Children," said I, "have any of you a question to ask to-day?"

"Please tell us," said a little boy, "what is meant by 'overcoming evil with good?'"

"I am glad," said I, "you have asked that question; for I love to talk to you about peace, and show you how to settle all difficulties without fighting." I went on, and tried to show what the precept meant, and how to apply it, and carry it out. I was trying to think of something to make it plain to the children, when the following incident occurred.

A boy about seven, and his sister about five years old, sat near me. As I was talking, George doubled up his fist, and struck his sister on her head, as unkind and cruel brothers often do. She was angry in a moment, and raised her hand to strike him back. The teacher saw her, and said, "Mary, you had better kiss your brother." Mary dropped her hand, and looked up at the teacher as if she did not fully understand her. She had never been taught to return good for evil. She thought if her brother struck her, she, of course, must strike him back. She had always been taught to act on this savage maxim, as most children are. Her teacher looked very kindly at her, and at George, and said again, "My dear Mary, you had better kiss your brother. See how angry and unhappy he looks!" Mary looked at her brother. He looked very sullen and wretched. Soon her resentment was gone, and love for her brother returned to her heart. She threw both her arms about his neck, and kissed him! The poor boy was wholly unprepared for such a kind return for his blow. He could not endure the generous affection of his sister. It broke his heart, and he burst out crying. The gentle sister took the corner of her apron and wiped away his tears, and sought to comfort him, by saying with most endearing sweetness and generous affection, "Don't cry, George; you did not hurt me much." But he only cried the harder. No wonder. It was enough to make anybody cry.—Selected by H. R. T.

OVERCOME EVIL WITH GOOD.

A FRIEND of ours, living at the time near Red River, Arkansas, relates that one day an Indian, with whom he was friendly, came to him in a great rage against a certain planter, who had set his dogs on him. He declared he would kill him, or set fire to his buildings.

"Oh, no," said my friend, "that would not be right."

"What!" said the Indian, "not right to kill him when he set his dogs on me?"

"No," was the reply; "besides, what good would it do you to kill him?"

"I would have my revenge," said the Indian.

"That," said my friend, "would be nothing, and you would be guilty of murder, and be in constant danger and dread of punishment.

The Indian looked very thoughtful a short time; then said, "Well, what shall I do?"

"Why," said my friend, "do that man some good the very first opportunity, and you will find that sweeter than revenge; and it will bring you into no danger, but may bring you many blessings."

The Indian looked at him earnestly, and said, "You never told me a lie; I will try it, and find out if you lie to me now."

Several months passed on. My friend had forgotten the circumstance, when one day the Indian came to him with new blankets, overjoyed to see him.

"Ah," said he, "you told me true; it is no lie."

"Well, what is it?" said my friend,

"Why, you remember I was going to kill such a planter, and you told me not to, but to do him good. Well, some days ago that man was lost. He had wandered about in the woods until he was almost starved. I found him.

"'Now,' said I, 'I can easily kill him for setting his dogs on me;' but I remembered what you told me, and so I took him to my camp and fed him, and kept him over night, and the next day took him to his plantation. When just by it I said to him,—

"'There is your house; you see it; go.'

He was so glad, he shook me by the hand, and called me good Indian.

"'Yes,' said I; 'but you did not think me very good when you set your dogs on me.'

"'I set my dogs on you!' said the planter, turning pale at the thought of the hazard he had been in, from his knowledge of the Indian character.

"'Yes; you set your dogs on me at such a time, and I had to run for my life.'

"'I am sorry,' said the planter, 'and you have rendered me good for evil; come in.'

"So," continued the Indian, "he took me to his house, and told all his negroes to treat me well if I came there when he was not at home. And he gave me these fine blankets, and made me feel very happy. You told me no lie."

Here was sown a little good seed which bore its good fruit, and all because the Indian thought my friend "did not lie."

"He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him."—Selected.

"SIR," said a lad coming down on a wharf in Boston, and addressing a well-known merchant, "sir," have you any berth for me on your ship? I want to earn something."

"What can you do?" asked the gentleman.

"I can do my best to do whatever I am put to," answered the boy.

"What have you done?"

"I have sawed and split all mother's wood for nigh two years."

"What have you not done?" asked the gentleman; which was a queer sort of question.

"Well, sir," answered the boy, after a moment's pause, "I have not whispered in school for a whole year."

"That's enough," said the gentleman; "you may ship aboard this vessel, and I hope to see you master of her some day. A boy, who can master a wood pile and bridle his tongue, must be made of good stuff."

SIX SERMONS

ON THE INQUIRY—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on CHRIST THE LIFE GIVER, or the faith of the Gospel, by GEO. STORRS; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the original Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should allow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is o desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By GEO. STORRS. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 360 pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

IMMORTALITY. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by GEORGE STORRS. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on IMMORTALITY, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The REVIEWER followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.

GOD'S LOVE.

BY S. W. BISHOP.

"Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God."—John iii 1.

WHATEVER plan God has devised by which the children of a lost race are brought to sustain the relationship of "sons of God," that plan is the offspring of His infinite love. This plan is clearly stated, Heb. vii. 19. "For the law made nothing perfect, but the bringing in of a better hope did; by which we draw nigh unto God." In this Scripture two covenants are contrasted as respects the practical result of each to those to whom they are given. The new, or better covenant is that plan by which we are brought near to, or constituted the sons of God. Of this covenant Christ is both High Priest, and Mediator, see Heb. viii. 6. Therefore, the plan by which we are made to be sons of God is the plan of God through Jesus Christ our Lord.

As God has but one plan, through Christ, by whose agency He will ever change the condition of any member of the race, either morally, or physically, see Acts iv. 12; it logically follows from the clear statement of our text, that, as this plan was first laid through the love that God bears to the race, every act of God in carrying into effect this stupendous plan, will be a manifestation of his love; and the great consummation of this plan will be the climax of infinite love.

Any theory of redemption, through Christ, which charges God, virtually, with doing one act, in connection with that plan, contrary to this great quality, or attribute of love, must be unsound. That there was a clear necessity for devising a plan by which we may become the sons of God is apparent when we consider man's condition in his natural state. Paul, in addressing the Ephesians, declares that they were, previous to getting into Christ, by nature the children of wrath.—Eph. ii. 3.

God's "wrath" is only revealed in the penalty affixed to his law. That penalty is death. The race of Adam, following the condition of their head, are by nature, children of death. This being the case, that race can have no life connection with that God whose life is only divine, and therefore immortal, or unending. Consequently, Paul says of them, while in an unregenerate state, "at that time ye were without Christ, being strangers to the covenants of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world." This language is very emphatic. It teaches, first: That all unregenerate sons and daughters of the race are without Christ. It is with them as if there was no Christ: and as respects the great mission of Christ in the world, which mission concerns only the bringing of men out of death, they are just as wholly unaffected by it as if no such work or mission had been contemplated or undertaken. Second: Being strangers to the covenant of promise, whatever is promised in that covenant they can never receive, because they hold no relationship to that covenant whatever. That covenant as its one great promise, offers life from the dead to a race of men who by nature are children of corruption. Third: Unconverted men hold no relationship to God whatsoever. It is with them, so far as the plan of God is concerned, and so far as that future life is concerned which God proposes to give by that plan, as if there was no God.

This is man's highest condition in his natural state. O, what mortal tongue can tell, or mind fully comprehend, in all its infinite fulness, that love that has undertaken to bring from so low a condition the children of a race perishing "in their own corruption," to the exalted position of "sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty." Well may the poet sing,

"O, for this love let rocks and hills,
Their lasting silence break,
And all harmonious human tongues
Their Saviour's praises speak.

"Angels assist the mighty lays,
Strike all your harps of gold,
But when you've raised your highest notes,
His love will ne'er be told."

An eternity of years will only give sufficient time, and immortal perfection in our organism, can alone qualify us to know and sing and tell the great love wherewith God has loved us. But "in part" we may know it here, for "God is love: and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God and God in him."—1 John iv. 16. Just so far as in this present time we are made to be sons of God, we are thereby made to become partakers of, and to manifest that principle of divine love which is the only actuating principle in the Godhead, as respects man's redemption.

At this point we wish to try, by this plan of love, a theory held by a portion of our former religious associates. We are told that this plan, which, in its first conception, was dictated by the love of an infinite God, shall, in its grand consummation, result in bringing out of death millions of our fellow mortals, not to the joys of an endless life, but to the consternation of utter woe, and the horrors of death in a surging sea of liquid fire. Can such an act be any part of a plan of love? Does not the bare contemplation of it fill the mind with unutterable horror? What man in all the earth would claim that such an act, done by Him, was the result of the "shedding abroad in his heart, the love of God by the Holy Ghost?" If our feelings would revolt at the committal of such an act, done by ourselves, can it for a moment be supposed, that a God whose tender, divine love is infinite, like Himself—a God whose love, when compared with our highest attainment of love, is as a thousand oceans to the minutest particle of mist that floats up the mountain's side; can delight in a work like this? Nay verily. And assuredly he will not work a miracle of power to do an act that his love forbids.

It is a philosophical fact that our moral nature is always, in a greater or less degree, moulded into the image of our religious creed. Is it not true, on this hypothesis, that the practical effect of believing a proposition fraught with such tremendously horrible consequences is to nourish into more active life, the most unlovely propensities of our fallen nature? And can any real good, any exaltation of the mind, any change that makes us more like a loving Christ that assimilates us more into the moral image of that God who is love, be wrought in us—in any one, by persistently urging, as a motive why sinners should "repent and be converted," a resurrection to torture, woe, and a most horrible dying at the last? Is not love the very essence of our holy religion? Surely it is, for the beloved John declares that "He that loveth is born of God." Is it true that it is the legitimate result of merely working on man's animal fears by constantly urging on his consideration a prohibition, as a part of the divine plan, which, if true, nulifies the claim that that plan is one of love, to bring the sinner into this loving frame of mind? Does philosophy in religion become so unphilosophical that like begets unlike? So it doth not appear to us. We think that "the goodness of God leadeth men to repentance." And while we see the great practical evil that is being done by teachings that do virtually dishonor God, it is no wonder that in our earnest endeavors to refute error, and set the truth before the people, we should, by some, be supposed to be over zealous.

May God enable us still to be earnest in our efforts to push forward the work of reformation, and may we be more and more imbued with that principle of divine love that moved the God that made the world, to stoop from His high and holy place, to bring fallen creatures like us into a union with himself, and give us at least a future endless life. Then shall all our efforts be characterized by the loving spirit of our great pattern and Life-giver, and then shall we, recommend, more effectually, the great and glorious principles of truth entrusted to our keeping.

And we can well afford to be loving and kind while we remember how great is the favor granted unto us in making us privileged ones, for an unspeakable privilege it is to stand in the blazing light of truth as it is now shining on the pathway of the church. And this light is soon to merge in the dawning of an eternal day. God grant we may be ready to share in its unending bliss and glory.

TIME OF WEEPING.

"Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning. . . . They that sow in tears shall reap in joy."—Ps. xx. 5; cxxvi. 5.

LIFE is a conflict of forces—the weak against the strong, the bad against the good, the earthly and the sensual against the heavenly and the divine. It is the joy of existence to attempt and succeed—to contend and conquer. This is the law of nature, of providence and of grace. The body must waste away or it cannot grow; the mind must be wearied or it cannot rest. The new growth which gladdens the heart springs from the old decay which destroyed its hopes. The living generations have all come up from the dust of the dead, and the footsteps of life are everywhere followed by the hounding pursuit of death.

Every change gives signs of its coming; every substance betrays its hidden quality; every law is uniform in its conditions and consequences. The contradictions and paradoxes with which we seem to be surrounded are only parts of the divine harmony, which displays infinite variety in nature and infinite wisdom in Providence. Let it not seem strange that peace comes by conflict, and that surrender should be the condition of conquest in the spiritual life. The appearance is as little like the reality in the matter-of-fact world which we see, and a part of which we are.

The reddening clouds of the evening foretoken the fair weather of the morning. The fiery bolt that crashes through the sultry air of an autumn night is the harbinger of a clearer sky and a colder day. The mists that hide the sunrise among mountains give promise of a cloudless noon. The intense cold the severest winter's day is the last effort of the cruel past to lock the earth in fetters of eternal ice. To-morrow the crisping snow will soften in the breath of a more genial air, and the hazy skies will give signs of coming rain. In tropic climes the tornado that lashes the sea into madness, and the earthquake which drives its ploughshare through the solid globe, are announced by a breathless and awful calm.

The diamond is the most purely combustible substance in the whole kingdom of nature, and yet in a fire intense enough to inflame the earth the diamond would be the last to burn. The membranous coating of the convex surface of the eye is the only portion of the living frame which can feel the contact of light. And yet that fine network of nerves may be cut or rudely torn and feel no pain. It is insensible to any other force or substance save that which is so delicate that no balances can detect its weight and no other sense can discover its existence. The tones of the human voice, the outlines of the human face, the general movement of the human frame in walking, the personal characteristics of individuals are so much alike that we cannot describe the difference in words, and yet we seldom confound them with each other. Everywhere around us we see infinite variety under an aspect of perfect uniformity. Conflicting forces neutralize each other—discordant elements unite in harmony.

The riddle propounded by the strong man in the time of Israel's judges is solved and verified in the history of each successive day: Out of the eater still comes forth meat, and out of the strong still cometh forth sweetness. Out of the fetid and formless dunghill the delicate flower distils the sweetest perfume and builds up the perfection of beauty. The fallow field is enriched by years of neglect to bear a plentiful harvest. The volcano pours a fiery stream upon the fertile plain, and so relieves a wider district from the more wasteful destruction of the earthquake. The bow of promise spans the cloud which bears the thunder in its bosom.

All these are things of daily experience and personal observation in the common life of men in this world. And they prove conclusively that paradox and conflict and mystery do not belong exclusively to the realm of spiritual life or the higher walks of Christian faith. The material and moral world both came from the same creative Mind, and are in harmony with each other. Things seen and temporal shadow forth the reality, and surpassing glory of things unseen and eternal. The struggle and conflict of the spiritual life have their parallel in the travail of this groaning creation, and in the mystery which clothes the common things of daily experience and casts its shadow upon every path. The lessons of religious instruction, which make the highest demands upon faith and patience and submission, are confirmed and illustrated by a thousand analogies in things which we all see and trials that we all suffer.

The material and matter-of-fact mind has no right to put aside the high claims of spiritual truth on the plea that it stands too widely apart from the common walks of human experience and the common demands of human necessity. He who is most in earnest to lay hold on the crown of eternal life need not be surprised or disheartened because every step of advance toward the heavenly prize must cost effort and encounter opposition. The dumb earth which we tread, the voiceless seasons which visit us in perpetual round, the laws of growth and decay which govern all living things, the conditions of success and failure in all worldly schemes, illustrate the same truths which we are to believe, and the same principles which we are to obey, in setting our hopes and affections upon things unseen and eternal. The children of the world have only to become as wise in considering the wants and capacities of the spiritual nature as experience compels them to be in providing for the necessities of the animal, and they, too, will become children of the light. The whole theory and practice of the Christian life are as rational, consistent and applicable to man's higher being and destiny as the lessons of prudence and foresight by observing which men succeed in the world.

It is constantly maintained in the work of Christian instruction that it is good for men to tread a hard and humble path, to encounter difficulties, to experience disappointment, to suffer affliction. Faith grows by conflict with doubt, virtue gathers strength by resistance to temptation. The toil and travail through which the children of God pass in their journey to the heavenly rest are the chastisement of their peace. The life of the good soldier of Jesus Christ is but a battle and a march. For him there is no rest, no home till he gains the better country. His repose after conflict must be upon the field with his armor on. Success only increases the demand for effort and sacrifice. The spoils of victory supply new incentives to press on more vigorously in the ceaseless advance to meet the decisive struggle and the final foe. When at last presented faultless before the throne of glory with exceeding joy, he is clothed in robes which have been washed from the defilement of sin in the blood of the slain Lamb. Thus, all the way, pain is the price of pleasure, sacrifice is the condition of success.

Now, the man of the world who prides himself upon his ability to devise objections to spiritual truth, and who deems it a mark of intelligence to doubt, calls this a needless and unnatural process. He sees nothing but contradiction in the statement that the peace which passeth all understanding must be the growth of continual conflict. He demands to know why the rest of Heaven can be reached only through the toil and weariness of earth; why the harvest of joy can spring only from seed that has been watered with the sower's tears. In the last great day, when the circling seasons of time have completed their round, why shall the angels reapers shout their harvest-home over sheaves that have been saved as from the fire, and gathered from fields that have been sown in sorrow and ploughed in tears?

In answer to all such questions and complaints, we might say, The conditions of life and peace are ordained of God. He has full power and right to do as he will. We must comply with his conditions and live, or submit to the alternative ordinance of death. Men may say that the terms of salvation are arbitrary and irrational; they may think that self-denial and self-abasement and cross-bearing are poor preparations for the crown and glory of immortal life. Still, it is the part of a wise man to take the infinite gift of salvation upon such terms as the Infinite Giver chooses to impose.—Night-Scenes in the Bible.

IS THE LITERAL EARTH TO BE BURNED?

BY W. H. FORD.

"But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat; the earth also, and the works therein shall be burned up."—2 Pet. iii. 10.

THE question is, Does the Bible teach that this globe upon which we live is to be entirely consumed by fire? The general opinion is, that the first thing that Christ will do when he comes the second time, will be to uncap all the volcanoes and set the earth on fire, and that it will burn until there is nothing left but one huge pile of ashes; and some go so far as to say that even the ashes will burn up. We do not so understand the word of God.

In the investigation of this subject we have no pet theory to maintain. We have no ambitious designs to gratify; but our desire is to let the Bible settle the question; and after it has settled it to receive it as a fixed fact. We are not disposed to be so arrogant as some who say, "Well, if heaven is on earth, I do not want any part in it." Poor, depraved creatures, to speak so of God's works. I would simply say to all such, that God created this earth and pronounced it good; and it ill becomes us, mere worms of the dust, to find fault with God's works.

With perfect respect for the feelings of such, we say further, if they do not take something to completely eradicate all such principles, they need not be concerned where heaven is; for it was just such principles that swept from the garden of Eden all its beauty and grandeur, and brought disease and death upon the whole race of mankind.

God said, let us make man in our image, after our likeness, and let them have dominion over all the earth, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth.—Gen. i. 26. It must be apparent to every thinking mind that God offered to man an everlasting dominion of this whole earth on condition of his obedience; and in proof that his dominion would have been an everlasting dominion, God said, in case of disobedience, he should die. This language strongly implies that if he had not disobeyed he would not have died. But Adam having proved recreant to his trust, he forever forfeited his right to govern this earth as God's vice-gerent; and having thus forfeited his right to the earth, the next thing in the mind of the great Jehovah was, to send the Second Adam, which was done; and the dominion of the whole earth was offered to him on precisely the same terms that it was offered to Adam; that is, obedience. Did he succeed in obtaining the right to govern this earth? He did. Christ saith, All my Father's commandments have I kept. It is clear, then, that Christ has the right vested in him to govern this globe upon which we live; and God speaking through the inspired Psalmist, prophesied, hundreds of years before the birth of Christ, and said, Ask of me, and I shall give the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for thy possession.—Psa. ii. 8. He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.—Psa. lxxii. 8. And the kingdom and the dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom, under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High.—Dan. vii. 27. Thus it is according to Daniel's testimony that this dominion, that is to be given to saints of the Most High, is under the heavens, not above it, as most men think.

Again: After God had swept the earth with the besom of destruction, we find him making a covenant with his servant Abraham, which He calls an everlasting covenant. And the Lord said unto Abraham, Lift up now thine eyes and look from the place where thou art, northward and southward, eastward and westward, for all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed forever. Arise, walk through the land, in the length of it and in the breadth of it, for I will give it unto thee.—Gen. xiii. 14–17. And in chap. xvii. 7, 8, we find God making another promise to Abraham; and God said, I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee, in their generation for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee and thy seed after thee; and I will give unto thee and to thy seed after thee all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, and I will be their God.

We find by further reading, that this same promise was also made to Isaac and Jacob; and thus it is seen that God stands pledged, by his own immutability, to give unto Abraham and his seed after him, an everlasting possession in the land of Canaan.

The next question to settle is, Who is the seed referred to, that is to be associated with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, in their title to the dominion over the whole earth? We will call up Paul as a witness. We have his testimony in Gal. iii. 16. Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. He saith not, and to seeds as of many, but as of one, and to thy Seed, which is Christ. Then, to Abraham and to Christ were these glorious promises made. The 29th verse says, If ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed and heirs according to the promise. Did Abraham and his seed ever get the promise that was made to them? If there was no scriptural evidence concerning it, common sense would teach all honest inquirers that a mortal man could not inherit an everlasting possession, in a state of mortality; that would be enough to convince the candid that this everlasting possession was intended for them when they were put in possession of immortality.

But we have positive evidence that Abraham never got so much of that land as to set his foot upon. We will let the first martyr of our Lord and Saviour answer this important question.

And he gave him none inheritance in it, no not so much as to set his foot on; yet he promised that He would give it to him for a possession, and to his seed after him.—Acts vii. 5. And these all died in faith, not having received the promises.—Heb. xi. 13. Here, then, we have the stubborn fact that Abraham and his Seed (which is Christ) never got so much as to set their foot upon. Paul testified that they all died in faith, not having received the promises. Will the great Jehovah prove unfaithful to his word? Will He fail to perform the pledge that binds him to give to Abraham and to Christ, and to all that are Christ's, an everlasting possession in the land of Canaan? The very land that Abraham sojourned in, as a stranger? The very land that he beheld with his own eyes, and walked through in the length and breadth of it, and in fact all the land of Canaan, as was promised. Chap. xvii.

If this literal earth is burned up, then God's promises must evidently burn with it; and if God will forfeit his promises to Abraham and his own dear Son, what assurance have we that he will perform his pledge to us? What inducement have we to cheer our frail minds to contend with our evil natures? What incentive have we to induce us to bear the frowns and persecutions of a cold and apostate world? Simply none; even if God would make a new land of Canaan, and give it to Abraham, his promise would still fail, for it would not be the land that Abraham saw with his own eyes. It would not be the land that he walked on. It would not be the land that Jacob laid upon.—Gen. xxviii. 13.

But God will never burn up this earth. His promises and pledges will all be redeemed. He has said, "The earth abideth forever."—Eccl. i. 4. He will fulfil his promises to Abraham. As well may we attempt to remove the sun from the solar system, or stop the onward march of time, as try to break the pledge that binds God to give Abraham and his seed the promised inheritance. God will yet raise Abraham from the cold and silent slumbers of the tomb, and give him that immortal nature that will fit him to enjoy the everlasting inheritance which is now in store for him. God has said, He laid the foundation of the earth, that it never should be removed.—Psa. civ. 5. This testimony is regarded by some world-burners as of no weight: they must go to heaven. Yes,

"A charge to keep I have,
A God to glorify,
A never-dying soul to save,
And fit it for the sky."

They are determined to get up in the skies; to scale the walls of high heaven, regardless of the language of Jesus Christ, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth."—Matt. v. 5. They seem not to believe the great Jehovah, speaking through the inspired Psalmist, when He says, "The righteous shall inherit the land, and dwell therein forever."—Psa. xxxvii. 29. They reject the words of the wise man, when he says, The righteous shall never be removed; but the wicked shall not inhabit the earth.—Prov. x. 30.

TIPTON, MO., 1870.

I HAVE read, says Brooks, of a company of poor Christians, who were banished into some remote part; and one standing by seeing them pass along, said, that it was a very sad condition those poor people were in, to be thus hurried from the society of men and made companions with the beasts of the field. True, said another, it were a sad condition indeed if they were carried to a place where they should not find their God; but let them be of good cheer, God goes along with them, and will exhibit the comforts of his presence whithersoever they go. God's presence with his people is a spring that never fails.

THE PEARL OF GREAT PRICE.

SOME years ago a female of rank—a native of one of the islands in the Indian seas, having been married to a merchant of Aberdeen, who had visited her country, returned with him to Scotland. There she continued to live for some years, without religion of any kind; it is probable that formerly she had been a Buddhist, but she showed no appearance of devotion. Her time was spent upon her children, and her jewels, of both of which she seemed very fond. In playing with the one and adoring the other, her days were passed. Whilst thus engaged, she one day heard a rumbling noise in Union street, where she resided, and upon looking out of the window to see what it was, beheld merely some carts filled with blocks of granite passing through the street. Disappointed, she turned to an old Scotch nurse then in the room, and remarked what a poor country Scotland was, the hills of which produced nothing but great blocks of ugly stone.

In her country she intimated that from their hills they obtained gold, jewels, and precious stones. The old nurse could not for a moment allow her own country to be inferior to that of her mistress', and she replied that they had a treasure in Scotland which her mistress' country did not possess; we have, said she, the most precious of all treasures here, we have "the pearl of great price."

The heathen lady's ear was instantly caught by this expression. At once she declared, she must have that treasure, and was confident that her kind husband would not fail to buy it for her, let it cost indeed what it might, she would even part with all her other jewels, of which she was passionately fond, to obtain it. The old Scotch servant then intimated to her that it was not to be bought, but to be had freely, "without money, and without price." She gave her also to understand that the jewel of which she spoke was not intended as an ornament for the neck or ears, but as a blessing for the heart. The poor heathen then said, that was just what she wanted, for she was often very unhappy, when she thought of all her relations, whom she should never see again, and of her much loved though distant land; she said she often had an aching heart in spite of her children, and her comforts and her jewels. Her poor instructress then explained to her that this treasure was hid in the field of the Holy Scripture, and that it was to be found by diligently seeking for it. Upon hearing this, her mistress seemed resolved upon obtaining it; she immediately began to learn to read, although before this she had refused to be instructed. She applied herself earnestly to the task; at length she became able to read the Bible, and searched it diligently, until she found what she so greatly desired. In one word, she became a Christian, was a regular communicant at one of the churches in Aberdeen, and at length died a peaceful death, trusting in the merits of her Saviour.

There may be many of our readers, who although they have lived all their years in a Christian land, are still as utter strangers to the greatest of all its treasures as was this poor heathen. Surrounded by dear relations and children, possessed of many comforts and much earthly good, they may have been content to live all their years without savingly acquainting themselves with him, who is above all price, who is more precious than rubies! Dear reader! "Christ is the blessing for the heart!" If you are still a stranger to this blessing—to this "pearl of great price," O set earnestly to work to search for it.

The Use of Sorrow.

"What can it be?" asks the afflicted soul, in its bitterness. "I can see the use of joy; for we must have been made for that by a benevolent Creator, and the soul constantly longs for it. But sorrow is the negation of joy, the practical contradiction of existence, the dread of every rational and sensitive nature."

Such thoughts are natural, yea, we may say that they are inevitable. They spring from our instincts, if not from our reason. They are the earliest outcry of a smitten heart. Shall we err, if we even affirm that God expects them to rise up with power in the first experience of affliction? Such would appear to be the implication in the oft-quoted words: "Now no chastening for the present seemeth to be joyous, but grievous." God requires no impossibilities: he upbraids no one for not finding pleasure in an affliction. It would neither be an affliction, nor accomplish the purpose of an affliction, were it pleasurable. It must cause suffering in order to be a chastisement and a discipline. The first effect must be pain. The heart must quiver, the tears must flow: and at this God is neither surprised nor angry. He looks on in pity, not in censure. He himself likes not the process, save as it represents the result. It is the unpleasant part, as with all parents, of his dealing with his children. He would omit it, did a wise love allow. He calls it his "strange work," as though it were foreign to his nature to cause misery. Certainly, then, he does not chide us for feeling the rod. He expects us to groan and to weep.

But weeping blinds the eye for the time being. We do not see clearly through our tears. When anguish comes, we are too much absorbed in the present distress to think of much else. A chastening therefore seemeth to be only grievous. But there is our mistake; for God says: "Nevertheles afterward it yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness unto them who are exercised thereby." The use of sorrow is thus in its ultimate effect. Peace unexpectedly comes from it, as, in Samson's riddle, "out of the eater came forth meat." Some one of the poets tells us that afflictions are like mountains which, in the early morning, lie in the pilgrim's path, rocky, precipitous and almost impassable, and are crossed with sad and wearying toil, but which, at eventide, lie blue and beautiful on the distant horizon.

Sorrow is life's needed discipline. It checks an undue earthly ambition, reveals the unsatisfying nature and actual impotence of worldly gain, quickens conscience into new life, produces deep humility and self-abasement, develops a sense of dependence on God, brings the soul into filial submission, penitence and faith, and links it tenderly to all other sufferers. It is, perhaps, the most purifying and refining influence to which the soul is subjected, and matures a variety of important virtues which were but in germ before. That it is a moral necessity in the education of character for conflict with sin, would seem to be certified by the words respecting our Saviour: "Though he were a Son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered." And similarly it is affirmed that, as "the Captain of salvation," he was made "perfect through sufferings." And so we come to the precious truth that sorrow works purity, moral power, and confirmed peace, and that Christ himself was no exception to this spiritual rule; or as Baxter wrote:

Christ leads me through no darker rooms
Than He went through before;
No one into His kingdom comes,
But through His opened door.

Preach the Word—Paul to Timothy.

BY A. W. BLAKE.

We often sit in astonishment, in what we call at this day, churches, and listen to what is styled preaching the word. A beautiful passage of Scripture is read, with its context, said Scripture all aglow with divine light and glory, a world of truth therein contained; the redemption scheme, and God's love shining out so clear; man's lost condition, and his restoration made so plain we think the most simple ought to comprehend. But the truth is never reached by man's reasoning, and vain philosophy. As the door upon its hinges swings, men go and come, but are never made to comprehend God's holy, simple truth. Their minds remain as dark as night, and why? God's wisdom is not sought. Vain man prefers to preach human theology. God's honor is not acknowledged. All labor done seems just to get men into the church; whereas to get them into Christ; to have them born again; to have them become branches of Christ, the true vine; to have them clothed with Jesus' righteousness, and place them in his kingdom, the true church of the living God should be the great object.

Brethren, preach the word if God has called you. Shun man-made theology as you would a viper. God's truth surpasses it, and is as high above it as the heavens are above the earth, and only can enlighten men. Now, said Jesus, ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you.

The Editor's Health.

We are this week again enabled, through Sr. H. R., to lay before the many anxious friends of the Editor a more detailed account of his condition, and the symptoms of the case than can well be done by any person not much with him. There now seems substantial ground upon which to rest the hope of his final recovery. May our kind and loving Father grant it.

Sunday, P. M., Dec. 18.

Two weeks ago we gave a short history of Br. Storrs' sickness, and it may not be out of place to report again, at this time, as we know there are many anxious ones, and Br. L. C. T. has so much else on hand.

Br. Storrs is improving, although very slowly. If we mark the daily improvement it is little indeed, almost imperceptible, but when we look at him as he was three weeks ago, or even one week ago, we can mark a decided improvement. Three weeks ago his pulse was one hundred and twenty, and his respiration forty-six. His mouth and throat were so dry, so distressingly dry, that he could sleep but little, and many other symptoms were very discouraging. Now his pulse varies from ninety to one hundred, and his respiration is about thirty. He generally sleeps well, and don't cough at all at night. He still coughs and expectorates some during the day, but not nearly so much as he has done. He has very little appetite yet. The Dr. feeds him almost exclusively on milk. Three weeks ago his breathing was hard, and he moaned with every respiration; now his breathing seems quite free, and he lies perfectly quiet. He is tired, so long in bed, and longs to be busy again, still it is all submission to, and harmony with the will of God.

Dr. Miller says his only unfavorable symptoms now are his pulse and respiration keeping high, and little appetite, still all of these are much better than they were. He says the disease has gone down into the small bronchial tubes, and it is very obstinate, still it begins to yield.

Thus we leave him again this Sunday eve, feeling so thankful to the Lord that he is improving, for we know that all things work together for good to them that love God.

Br. Storrs has made God his trust, and has not shunned to declare truth, and now in his hour of sickness God is at his right hand, so he is not moved.

Monday, A. M.

Br. Storrs has not slept so well as usual, on account of a severe ear-ache. He has had it several days, but is, as usual, submissive. He said this morning, "I don't know why I have this, but suppose it is all necessary, all right." Thus in everything he quietly yields submission to the Lord. He is of course very weak and feeble. Has sat up only once in over six weeks, that was a little over an hour, and he was worse for it. Still our trust is in the Lord, and we hope he will yet recover. At present his ear aching seems to keep him back, still his general symptoms are much improved.

Helen Robertson.

Tuesday, A. M.—The improvement above noted is still maintained. The pain, spoken of, in the head, is less intense but not entirely removed.

As it has been customary to omit issuing the paper during what is called the holiday week, our friends wlll not receive the next number until after Jan. 1., at which time we hope to be able to report a still more marked improvement in the condition of the Editor.

Rightly Divide the Word.

How to prosecute to best advantage the work of disseminating truth; how to put the particular items of truth we wish to establish so clearly, so concisely, and with so much of practical bearing before the mind of readers and hearers, that its light and beauty and glory will not be obscured by obstacles and images of our own creation—born of mere fancy, must be the prayerful study of every earnest laborer in this department of the Lord's great field.

In seeking thus to present truth, a very important consideration, one which requires skilful handling, must be the order of presentation. To place before an inexperienced audience, for instance, what must by any stranger to given items of truth be regarded as an incongruous and bewildering mass, is an effort from which it is unreasonable to expect any good result. Every practical laborer has learned that arguments, to be effective, must be so simply and naturally arranged as to be easily grasped. In fact they must of their own force reach the mind. All parts of the great system of Gospel truth are not equally important at given times. We would not be understood as affirming unimportance of any, far from it, but in the progress of its development among the people some parts must claim precedence. When, therefore, we speak of one item of truth being more important than another, we mean not that superior importance inheres in it, but is temporarily imparted to it both by a precedence natural to progress and development, and by surrounding circumstances.

Thus we may all feel more than justified in making some points of truth more prominent than others in our endeavors to bring our fellow-beings to that more perfect knowledge of the Gospel to which we all feel God has led us. The subject of man's nature and destiny, together with such prominent attending subjects as the work of Christ at his first appearing, the nearness of his second coming and the deliverance then to be effected, etc. etc., are certainly possessed of an immediate value and importance that cannot be properly claimed in behalf of certain more advanced questions, it may be, which, by reason of being more advanced, may not unfairly be regarded, for the present, as secondary, or as "side issues." When we look abroad over christendom and contemplate the many errors that are held and nursed as sacred truth, and which, ever at work distilling their fatal poison, breathe a blighting curse wherever the blessed name of Jesus is mentioned or the story of redeeming love is told; when we see thousands upon thousands of well-meaning, Christ-loving men and women led by false teachers to the very brink of, and not a few over into that terrible and soul-cursing abyss, Spiritualism, the praise of which Christian writers are beginning to sing and Christian editors to publish; when we see the very doctrines which in the face of torture and death the faithful worthies of the early church proclaimed as the foundation of Christian hope denounced and trodden under foot, or treated with the almost equal contempt of silence, we are impelled to the conclusion that there exists a preeminent necessity for diligently pressing upon public attention those parts of gospel truth which are best calculated to dispel the darkness, and induce any thing like a proper appreciation of the character and love of God and his dear Son as revealed in the great work of redemption.

While we should not ourselves stop searching and learning, we ought not to forget that our mediums for reaching the public mind are designed not so much as means by which to possess ourselves of more truth as to spread so much of the blessed truth as we have among them that are in darkness. There is manifest danger of our becoming so enamored with the pursuit of truth as to overlook, somewhat, the duty of promulgating it to the world. Too many may imbibe the thought that their duty lies in the direction of exploring new fields. Let none be so eager to explore that they neglect their duty respecting that which God has revealed. If we, as a body, are true to the great trusts already committed to us, others will be added in due time. Running before we are sent, we might explore till death seizes us, and all to no purpose. It is to those who are faithful to present light that God unfolds more truth. It is the faithful that God leads by the hand.

And yet it is well, in proper spirit and to proper extent, to consider other subjects than those about which we are, as a body, agreed. To prohibit this altogether might close against us the avenue of approach to further truth, for we surely have not learned all yet. But a great hindrance to a judicious discussion of some of these questions is a proneness on the part of many affirmants to lug into the debate a vast amount of extraneous matter, thereby giving to the subject an appearance of ponderousness not its own, and, on the other hand, the expending of a great amount of effort in contending against imaginary difficulties. Take, for example, the subject of the "Age to Come," as it is called. Perfectly simple in itself, it is invested with unending intricacies through a fondness on the part of some of its votaries for identifying with it the mysticisms of their own unwarrantable speculations, and an overweening confidence in the soundness of those speculations. The simple question, concerning the "Age to Come," is "does the Bible reveal a time subsequent to the return of Christ, during which there will be nations existing in a state of mortality and probation?" For ourself we do not consider the question of such eminent importance, at the present, as we all believe attaches to certain other prominent Scripture topics, but that there is such a time revealed is clear to our mind, so clear we wonder sometimes how it is that so many of our fellow-laborers, whom we love and in whose companionship we delight not only do not see it but vigorously oppose it. Knowing, however, the inevitable tendency of the extravagances to which we have alluded to excite strong prejudice against the doctrine, we think we can hardly be too forbearing toward them that oppose.

We sometimes receive articles (and we meet with people, and read productions in other publications that propose to do the same) the writers of which undertake to go into the detail of the matter, telling all about the occupation of the saints, etc., etc. All this is just simply, it seems to us, an abuse of a glorious and interesting subject, and the effect of it, since opposers are thus induced to an aimless discussion of the extraneous matter rather than of the question itself, is to heap up a heterogeneous mass of bewildering disputation. We see not why this subject should not be examined calmly and moderately as well as any other, but there is, in addition to what we have already noticed, too often, on the part of the affirmative, an over-zealousness, and sometimes an over-confidence of statement that are painful to more stable yet earnest supporters of the position. Some there are who write about it as if it were thought by them to be of the utmost present importance. And yet we think that, in general, so far as this seems to be so it is a misrepresentation of their true feelings. We take the liberty of suggesting to such that in all our labors the subject should have its proper place, and that others should have their proper place.

But the difficulty is by no means all or chiefly on this side. Opposers of the view sometimes indulge in thrusts and offer arguments of a character such as they never would consent to make any other subject the object of, and mostly because incited by undue prejudice or aimed at visionary objections. One writer will argue that because some mortal beings have been stricken down as dead, overwhelmed by the presence of angels manifested in a superlative degree of glory, and because at one or two manifestations of Christ in exceeding glory, similar phenomena have occurred, therefore the existence of mortals in Christ's kingdom, where himself and angels will be, cannot be true; overlooking the fact that those were exceptional cases, and that it not only by no means follows that the presence of Christ or his angels always produced such effect, but that instances are named where no such result occurred. Another, properly claiming that prophecy is history written beforehand, quotes a prophecy, containing neither if nor but, respecting the kingdom and reign of Christ on earth, and which, it is a notorious fact, was not fulfilled at the first advent, and asks that proof be given that it refers to the second advent. "And the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David: and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there sball be no end."—Luke i. 32, 33. It is said of this prophecy, "Now that this refers to the second advent of Jesus I should like to have some proof." Since, containing neither if nor but, it is prophecy, and hence "history written before-hand," the mere fact that it was not fulfilled at the first advent ought to be considered sufficient proof that it refers to the second advent. There was absolutely nothing connected with Christ's first coming in humiliation that could possibly meet the terms of this prophecy. If a person adhere to the, so-called, orthodox idea that Christ's kingdom is a spiritual one only, and not a literal and material one, he can see a fulfilment of this prophecy in the first advent, otherwise not. A certain definition of prophecy becomes, just here, the first premise of a syllogism, viz:

Prophecy is history written beforehand;

This prophecy has not yet become a part of history;

Therefore this prophecy is not yet fulfilled.

This conclusion possesses the merit of being just the fact in the case. The first advent was not the time for Christ to assume his kingly office, else would not those prophecies (history written beforehand) which speak of his humiliation, suffering and death have been given. That was the time for the sacrificial work, the closing up of the Mosaic dispensation and the introduction of a higher. The disciples asked, "Lord wilt thou at this time restore the kingdom to Israel?" The reply was, "It is not for you to know" (that the Jews will not let me do it? No,) "the times or the seasons which the Father hath put in his power." Oh, then the Father had not "put" that time for the establishment of the kingdom. "A certain nobleman," it will be remembered, "went into a far country to receive for himself a kingdom and to return." And this was spoken before the rightful heir was killed. Jesus is in the "far country" now, and soon he will come, not as a "sacrifice" but a King. God was not in doubt, as to what would be the action of the Jews, when He gave those prophecies respecting Christ's humiliation. No, no; He just simply wrote that part of history beforehand. Neither was Jesus disappointed in the treatment he received; he knew prophecy too well.

We assume that none will claim there is to be two universal and everlasting kingdoms established on the earth. If the prophecy, Luke i. 32, 33, refers not to the second advent it certainly does to the first. If to the first, then it has been fulfilled, and the kingdom is established forever. Nebuchadnezzar saw, in a dream, a great image of a man. The head represented Babylon; the breast and arms, Medo-Persia, the belly and thighs, Greece; the legs, the Roman Empire; and the feet, ten kings that should arise out of the Roman Empire. The ten kings certainly did not exist in the time of Christ. Daniel says, "And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed . . . and it shall stand forever." Daniel's prophecy has not been fulfilled, but it certainly will be. Jesus, the head of the fifth, or stone kingdom, will soon appear, and then, his kingdom established, it will break in pieces all others, and will fill the whole earth. There cannot be two universal kingdoms, neither can there be conflict in prophecy, for it is all history written beforehand. There can exist no necessity for showing "that this kingdom was postponed for two thousand years." No postponement has occurred.

We have no intention to review, in this article, the arguments of any writer, the allusions we have made being incidental, and designed to illustrate what we have sought to show, viz., the necessity of confining discussions of this and other subjects to proper limits. If the scope of discussion of the subject of Age to Come can be confined within such limits, and the examination be conducted in moderation, we cannot deem it unwise to discuss it. While we do not wish to dictate, we are constrained to suggest that the glorious cause of truth in connection with which we labor, would be vastly better served by dropping the discussion of the subject altogether, than by giving the latitude which not a few are inclined to take.

The present European war may justly be ranked with the most destructive ones on record. The loss of life, and consequent suffering among the bereaved families; the maiming for life of almost countless thousands of young men, the flower of the land, to say nothing of the loss of more millions of money, by the destruction of property, than can ever be told, all combine to render it one of the saddest of modern times. Already it is ascertained that there are in Germany "upward of 25,000 widows and 120,000 fatherless children, in consequence of the losses in the Landwehr corps alone. The Landwehr is one class only of the German army. What an appalling result will be reached when the whole story of destruction of life in both France and Germany is told!

Affairs in Europe.

The past week having been one of such comparative quiet in Europe, we have little news to relate. A dispatch from Bordeaux, France, received in New York about the middle of last week, says: "The Government has been installed here. Vigorous measures have been decided upon, and large reenforcements are going forward to the Army of the Loire from all parts of the South of France."

Some points of minor importance have within the past few days been seized and occupied by the Prussian forces. Havre, which a week since, was menaced, is now thought to be out of danger, temporarily so, at least, the Prussian army, under Manteuffel, which then threatened it, having directed its attention to other points. Late dispatches, in fact, state that the Prussians have withdrawn from that part of the country. It has at times been daily expected that the bombardment of Paris would commence, but for some unexplained reason it has been delayed. A telegram from London, dated Dec. 17, says: "A dispatch received from Versailles to-day gives a new explanation of the delay in opening the bombardment of Paris by the Prussians. There is a lack of ammunition in the German army and the roads are so wet and heavy that none can be brought forward at present. The same cause has prevented the movement of heavy siege guns. It is probable that the fire will not be opened for a fortnight yet."

A Berlin paper, however, on the other hand, says: "The proposed bombardment of Paris has again been postponed, because such a course at present would be detrimental to military operations. The real object of the war and the interests of the army at this juncture are paramount considerations. Unquestionably, at the right moment, the Commander of the investing army will take such action as will fully insure immediate and future success." Thus matters stand; and while it is true that little of importance, seemingly, has been accomplished during the past few days, both parties are at work maturing plans for the future.

News from Odessa, Russia, are to the effect that the Czar has 300.000 men on the frontiers of Austria. While waiting for a peaceful acknowledgment of her claims, through the approaching conference, Russia is evidently preparing for war. Nor is England idle in the matter if it be true, as we see it stated, that she has given an order to one firm for 170,000,000 ball-cartridges; and that 1,500,000 are being made daily at the Royal Arsenal.

A London dispatch says: "An affray occurred on Tuesday last in front of St. Peter's, at Rome. The disorder, which at one time threatened to become a serious riot, was quieted by the interference of the Italian authorities." The cause of this difficulty is not stated, but the scene itself must be thought a rather strange one to be witnessed in the quiet shadow of St. Peter. It is stated that the entrance of King Victor Emanuel into Rome will take place Jan. 8th.

The Truth Shall Make You Free.

Debased and degraded as men have often become, there is yet something about a man which makes him, to a greater or less extent, feel the power of truth. Error itself, if it would prevail, must come in the guise of truth. Truth is real, and reality is ever stronger than fiction. Though truth is in itself stronger than error, it fails to govern men because it is not known, and when known has all the baser passions at war with it. Truth concerns more with things unseen and distant; error deals especially with the present. Yet a knowledge of truth, some truth, is alone able to make man free.

The freedom resulting from truth is not a freedom from conflict. Truth and error must be in conflict till error is overcome. If Paul fought the good fight; if the Prince of Peace brought discord into the world, and gave his life in the conflict with error, what can we expect but continued conflict? The freedom wherewith the truth makes free is a freedom of mind and spirit. It can exist in bonds and imprisonment. The Christian, driven into exile, hunted to the caverns of the mountains, seeking refuge in the dwelling of the wild beast, crossing the ocean to unknown lands, in imprisonment, starvation, and torture, is always free in spirit. He rejoices in tribulation, trusting to the Ruler of all things.

Nor does the truth make free from toil. The normal state of a human being is a state of activity. Muscles were made for motion, and mind was made for thought. To relieve either from the work to which it is adapted, would be to insure its destruction, or a weak and worthless existence. Freedom should never be confounded with laziness. The fields are all white for the harvest, and every one is called upon to be a reaper. But while the truth does not make free from labor and toil, it does direct all the active powers, whether physical, intellectual, or emotional to their appropriate work. A human being governed by error is like a machine with its parts so adjusted that nearly all its power is lost in friction; and even the work it does do is worthless. The truth does not stop the machine but readjusts it so that every wheel, and cog, and pinion moves in perfect harmony. The friction is removed, and its power is no longer lost in the machine itself, but is carried forward to do the work for which it was designed.

Neither does the truth make free from all sources of disquiet, but it so enlarges the view, so presents the relations of the present to the future, and of man to God, that all the discomforts of the present are counted as nothing in the comparison. The Christian lives by faith; he has not come into his possession, but having the Spirit of Christ, he has the guaranty that all things shall be his when Christ shall come again to receive him. For the excellency of eternal life in Christ, he counts all things but dross.

But the truth made known by Christ frees from the control of passions. The life of a Christian is a warfare, not always with the world without, often with the world within. The fiercest conflicts of human life are not always those seen by the world, but rather those waged against the ever uprising of evil passions and propensities seeking to control the mind and govern the conduct. It is doubtful if any man, of himself, ever gained the victory over himself. Here again is the invisible but ever-present power of the Master, that gives strength to overcome. The Christian lives not alone, he dwells with Christ. The Spirit of Christ becomes his spirit, and in the strength of that Spirit he can overcome all things. He, in a sense, becomes one with Christ, and not in his own strength, but through Christ he ceases to be a servant of sin.

More than all, the truth frees from death.

The question above all others which men have sought to answer, which, between hope and despair, men, all men in all ages and countries have sought to answer has been, "If a man die shall he live again?" The yearning for life has been intense and universal. Christ came and gave answer to this all-absorbing question. Whatever is committed to him, he has promised to raise up at the last day. Death is not prevented but nearly all its terror is taken away, when we reflect that it is but for a moment. Death is a dreamless sleep, watched by the Life-giver, who holds the lives of all his followers within himself, and loses nothing committed unto him. With such a watcher, who should fear to die! The valley may be dark, but the hills beyond are illuminated by celestial glory, and far, far beyond the reach of faith, beyond the utmost stretch of thought, there is a boundless expanse of whose glory our dim vision can catch no gleam. What the unending ages shall reveal, no finite mind can conceive. With hope of all that lies beyond, what is death! 'Tis not a night, 'tis not an hour of darkness, not a minute. 'Tis but a fleeting shadow seen, then gone forever. Yet who can believe! Who does not fear to grasp a truth so full of glory? Who does not shrink, and tremble ere he lays hold of such freedom as this? Who is not lost in amazement when he contemplates such surpassing gifts? Who would not seek such freedom?

THE young Spanish King takes great interest in the financial state of his kingdom, with a view to improving it. It is said he has announced his determination to give one half of the appanage of the crown, amounting to some $20,000,000, to the national treasury.

A Pointed Prayer.

THE following prayer is reported in a Cincinnati paper, as offered by Rev. Granville Mocdy, in Grace M. E. Church, Newport, soon after the declaration of war, by Napoleon:

"God of the nations, 'to whom belongeth the shields of the earth.' Thou hast styled Thyself 'the God of battles,' and hast promised to 'overturn and overturn and overturn until he shall come whose right it is to reign,' we devoutly invoke Thy blessing on our European brethren, struggling for the inalienable rights of man against the ambitious and unscrupulous Napoleon, who strode to arbitrary power over his broken vows, and seeks the perpetuation of despotism in the person of his son; and by the conquest of his Prussian neighbors, would seek the overthrow of Christianity in the disintegration of Protestant Prussia. Put a hook in his nose and lead him out with the workers of iniquity; and may the smoke of his torment ascend from the battle-fields of the Rhine; and may his discomfiture prove the disaster of Popery, of which he has been the chief support; and may his overthrow shake the dominions of the man of sin; and then may the wrath of man praise Thee, and the remainder of wrath do Thou restrain."

A pointed prayer truly. Well, the immediate author of all the bloodshed and misery that has recently existed in Europe, as a result of the present terribly destructive war, did get a hook put into his nose, and was led "out with the workers of iniquity." May he not be permitted to return.

The Age of Christ and the Length of his Ministry.

BY MARK E. GREEN.

IT may seem like presumption to the majority of the world to introduce any evidence against the orthodox belief on this subject, but I trust that there are those who are willing to receive evidence on this subject even if it should not emenate from some orthodox pen. Most historians merely echo some learned or great man who has gone before, therefore when we find a majority agreed on a point it is not conclusive evidence that they are right. Few follow Paul's maxim "prove all things, hold fast that which is good."

The views that I shall present on this subject have been forcibly impressed upon my mind for years. There has been no historical fact that has perplexed the ecclesiastical historian so much as this. The learned Dr. Jarvis, in his introduction to The History of the Church, says, "The birth and death of our Lord Jesus Christ are the centre around which all history moves. They furnish the key to civil as well as ecclesiastical history of man. How comes it to pass that the generality of ecclesiastical historians have left unnoticed the chronology of our Saviour's life, abandoned the subject in despair and pronounced it to be utterly impossible to ascertain the time of his birth or the year of his crucifixion?" After the testimony of such a learned man, of the so called, orthodox class, we may venture a few remarks on this point.

There is one point on this important subject that is settled by a thus saith the Lord. Christ came to be baptized in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar, at which time Jesus was about thirty years old. To establish the year of our A. D., when that occurred, historians have made the year that Rome was founded the basis of their argument. Upon this point Hales gives the extremes of 126 years, while Dr. Jarvis gives a period of eighty-six years. He figures them down to a period of five years from 753 to 748 B. C. The last of these periods is adopted by archbishop Ussher; 753 B. C. is the basis from which our A. D. is reckoned. To establish the year in which our Lord was thirty years old, the year when Augustus Cæsar died was an important point to ascertain. Dr. Jarvis remarks: "To ascertain the year in which Julius Cæsar and Augustus died is to settle two of the most important points in are Chronology." There are no two opinions as to the year of Rome when Augustus Cæsar died, therefore to ascertain the year of Augustus' death is all-important. I shall introduce but one item of evidence on this point. Dian Cassis, the historian, in speaking of the death of Augustus Cæsar, says, "Augustus went into Campania and died at Nola. There was a total eclipse of the sun, and a great part of the heavens seemed to be on fire, and blood red comets were seen." All historians, who speak of the death of Augustus, in particular, record this fact. If we turn to the great work of the learned Benedictines, entitled "The art of verifying dates," we see a calculation of all the eclipses, both lunar and solar, for over 2000 years, made by M Pingre and approved by a committee of the French Royal Academy of Science. We find that in the year 19 A. D., June 21, at 12 o'clock, noon, there was a total eclipse of the sun in Europe, Africa and Asia. There is no total eclipse of the sun recorded by him for ten years prior or ten years after, therefore it proves that A. D. 19 is the year of Augustus's death, which agrees with Usshur that the foundation of Rome is to be dated 748 B. C. There is no reliance to be placed upon any eclipse noted in history unless it is a total eclipse. As Professor Whiting once said, "The eclipse is God's time piece." We shall consider it so in this instance, and as it is a total eclipse it is certain.

Augustus' dying in A. D. 19, the fifteenth year of Tiberius would occur in 34 A. D., Christ being thirty years old, which, according to the law of Moses, was the time given to commence the ministry, and was to be continued until the fiftieth year, Num. iv. The idea that our Lord preached but three or four years only, based upon the number of passovers recorded in the gospels, would seem to be absurd, when we read what John says, "And there are many other things which Jesus did, the which if they should be written every one, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written."—John xxi. 25.

That Jesus, or any other man could fill the world with books in three or four years is not to be believed by any thinking man. I shall endeavor to show by facts that Jesus preached according to law, nearly twenty years. "I have before shown from a quotation from Dr. Jarvis, that historians have decided that it is "utterly impossible" to tell the age of Christ when he was crucified. I shall now introduce the testimony of the fathers as they are called. St. Clemence, of Alexandria, was the most learned of the Greek Church. He wrote about A. D. 194. In commenting on St. Luke iii. 1–23 he says, "And to prove that he (Christ) must have preached" only one year it is also thus written, 'He hath sent me to preach the acceptable year of the Lord.'" He then goes on to show that Jesus came preaching in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar, and was crucified in the twelfth month of the same year. Being a very learned man, St. Clemence's views became orthodox for centuries among the Greeks. Tertullian stood at the head of the Latin Church. He was converted from the Pagan religion, and was one of the most learned men of his day. He was cotemporary with St. Clement. In commenting on Daniel's seventy weeks, he says. "That Christ was cut off after the passion of Christ within the times of the seventy weeks, in the fifteenth year of Tiberius' reign, in the month of March, in the season of the passover, on the first day of unleaven bread," etc. I will now quote from Lactantius, of the Latin church, who wrote about A. D. 300. He says, "It was under the empire of Tiberius Cæsar in his fifteenth year, seven days before the calends of April, that the Jews affixed Christ to the cross." All the Latin fathers with one exception follow Tertullian and Lactantius. They were men that had access to all the Roman archives, and if there had been any records to be found on this point they would have brought it forth. Therefore they must have gained their conviction from some other source. There is no one in these days who would give credit to their testimony.

I will now introduce the the testimony of another Latin father, Irenæus, who was born about the beginning of the second century. He was a disciple of Polycarp and Papis, who were cotemporary with John the apostle, and was his disciple. Irenæus wrote five books on the heresies of his times. His books are now extant. Moshiem calls them "a spendid monument of antiquity." Among the heresies he wrote against was the "Valentinan heresy;" that Christ did not preach but one year, that he came preaching in the fifteenth year of Tiberus and was crucified the same year. Dr. Jarvis gives the arguments set forth by Irenæus, sufficiently for our purpose. He says, "It seems to have been the opinion of Irenæus that after our Lord's baptism, to which he came when he was thirty years old, he must have passed a number of years in retirement, for he adds that he came to Jerusalem when he had obtained the perfect age of a master. This perfect age Irenæus supposes to be between the fortieth and fiftieth years of man's life for (he says) the thirtieth is the first age of the youthful constitution, and it extends, as every one admits, to the fortieth year, but from the fortieth and fiftieth year it declines into the age of seniority. Then on the authority of certain presbyters (Polycarp and Papis), who said they had it from St. John and others, who said they learned the same things from the other apostles, and also from the expression of the Jews, 'Thou art not yet forty years old and hast thou seen Abraham?' Irenæus concludes that our Lord, when he taught, had passed his fortieth and had not attained his fiftieth year. To him who was but thirty they would have said, Thou art not yet forty years old, for it is altogether unreasonable to suppose that they would have added twenty years in their wish to make him younger than the times of Abraham.' Hence Irenæus concludes that he was not much short of fifty, and consequently that he neither preached one year only nor suffered in the twelfth month of that year, for the time from thirty to fifty years (he sarcastically adds) would never be reckoned as one year unless among the Acreons. Their great years are so counted. From this last expression one might infer that Irenæus supposes our Lord's ministry to have continued for nearly twenty years."

Here we have the testimony of one whose integrity for truth has never been questioned. Dr. Winthrop in speaking of Irenæus, says, "Is it credible that that excellent and pious father, with the advantage of being instructed by Polycarp, who was himself instructed by St. John, did not know what the beloved disciple held as to the fact of the second coming of Christ?" I would ask, is it not fully as likely that he would be instructed with reference to his first coming? Who dare accuse Irenæus of telling a lie with reference to this important fact? I say important because he would not have noticed it as a heresy if he had not considered it to be of importance to the church. Suppose all the testimony of the fathers down to the fourth century were placed before a jury against the testimony of Irenæus, would they not decide unanimously in favor of Irenæus? Surely they would. As I have before remarked, if the fathers, who had access to the Roman archives, could not get a correct history of Christ, it is not at all likely that it was anywhere to be found. The reason is that Rome had been burned by Nero, and all the records destroyed. I am well aware of the objections that will arise with those who have made up their minds on this point, and accept the evidence that has been set forth to establish the orthodox theory. The testimony of Irenæus is of more weight than all the conflicting testimony on this point. Hales, in his chronology, says that the epochs of Christ's birth, by eminent chronologists, vary from seven years B. C., to five years after. The question might be asked, "When doctors disagree who shall decide?" One historian, in writing a history of the Emperors, says that Mary the mother of Jesus, died in the sixth year of Claudius, age 62, which he gives A. D. 47, or 48, which would make her eight years old when Jesus was born, if his birth occurred seven B. C., and only twenty years if his birth occurred A. D. 5. Again: some give Tiberius twenty-two years for his reign, while others give him twenty-seven years, and still others more, and when you take the extremes from the death of Augustus to the destruction of Jerusalem, you have from thirteen to twenty years, as is shown by historians.

The question will be asked, Can there be no reliance placed upon Josephus? He is set down by the classics as very unreliable. Gibbons makes this remark about Josephus while giving the history of Claudius Cæsar, the second Emperor from Tiberius. He says, "It is much to be regretted that we have lost the part of Jacitus which treats of the transaction. We are forced to content ourselves with the popular rumors of Josephus, and the imperfect hints of Dion and Luctonius." We see, from this quotation, that Gibbons looked upon Josephus' history as mere "rumors," and therefore unreliable. If Josephus was so well versed in facts, why did he not say something about Jesus and his condemnation, and other things that agitated all Judea and the Sanhedrim? You will say he did, as it is recorded in his Antiquities Book 18, chap. iii. sec. 3. We are told by the classics that this passage is not found in the old manuscripts, and is evidently spurious. It is not my purpose to harmonize historians, much less to put reliance upon "popular rumors." One testimony of Irenæus is worth more than all the suppositions named by these learned orthodox wise men. The question will be asked, does not the eclipse of the moon that took place at the death of Herod, which occurred B. C. 4, make it sure when Christ was born?

By turning to the table of eclipses, by M. Pingre, we will find that he records ten eclipses of the moon in every year from 4 B. C., (except 3 B. C.) to 4 after Christ, on the vulgar era, and in nearly every year two eclipses. In A. D. 3, Oct. 28, at 11 3-4 in the evening, a total eclipse, and May 4, at 8 1-2 in the evening, total eclipse. The eclipse that occurred 4 B. C., March 13, was only partial, 4 digits, and not likely to be much noticed. As I have before stated, to undertake to establish a data from a partial eclise, either lunar or solar, amounts to nothing. There are other objections, but my space does not permit me to notice them at present.

The question naturally arises, What does all this amount to? I answer, if historians who record that a total eclipse occurred in the year that Augustus died speak the truth, then, beyond controversy, A. D. 19 is the year which commences the first year of Tiberius' reign. This fifteenth year corresponds with A. D. 34, Jesus being about thirty years old. And then, if the Irenæus made no mistake, our Saviour was between forty-nine and fifty when he was nailed to the cross in A. D. 53 or 54. These two facts mark the end of the 69 weeks, or 483 years, of the 2300 years of Daniel, 8th chap. The 483 years bring us to the cross, as I understand it, for they were to bring us to Messiah the Prince, and that was when he was exalted to be a "PRINCE AND SAVIOUR," after his resurrection. One week was to confirm the (or a) covenant with many, which was the new covenant. Paul says of Christ, "He is the Mediator of the new covenant." Where a covenant is there must also of necessity be the death of the testator, for "a covenant is of force after men are dead, otherwise it is of no strength at all while the testator liveth." It will be seen by this the covenant could not be confirmed until Jesus was crucified. Jesus told his disciples to tarry at Jerusalem until ye be endowed with power from on high, after which "They went forth and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them and confirming the word with signs following."

Again Paul says, "For if the word spoken by angels was steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense of reward, how shall we escape, if we neglect so great salvation, which at first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him; God also bearing them witness, both with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, and gifts of the Holy Ghost, according to his own will?"

These texts are sufficient to show that Christ made a covenant, and made it sure by his death, and that it was confirmed by his disciples, God himself working with them, according to Daniel, for one week or seven years, which brings us to A. D. 60 or 61, leaving 1810 years of the 2300, which would end in 1870 or 1871, when the times of the Gentiles will end and Daniel will stand in his lot. Amen.

From M. M. Eastman.

BR. THORNE: We watch for the HERALD eagerly, so we can hear from our dear Br. Storrs. The last paper has just come. I hope and pray he may yet live till Jesus comes.

I have often wished I could be with our dear brother and help take care of him; and I have wished I could know of the treatment he was having. When the cause is removed the appetite will come, if wholesome food is given. I have felt as though he must be spared to the cause. Do not hurry him along too fast; let nature have time to recuperate. I have somehow felt as if he must and would live; and I can't give it up. Yet, I would say the will of the Lord be done. It may be that before this reaches you he will be asleep, "Blessed sleep from which none ever wake to weep," but I shall cling for his precious life as long as possible. Should be glad to have you have a rest, as Br. Grim proposed, but we want to hear from Br. Storrs so much. It seems a long time to wait a week even. We did think we would have our dear brother up here another summer, if time continues, and we hope to yet. This was his first Methodist charge.

LANDAFF, N. H., Dec. 13th, 1870.

From David Graffam.

BR. THORNE: I wish to say, through the HERALD OF LIFE, to the servants of the Lord who are scattered abroad preaching the glad message, that we are in want of their help. They will be gladly and kindly received, and compensated as far as lies within our means. We have a place to worship in that is good and will accommodate some three hundred. Quite a number here are Life believers, and there are many others who are glad to hear the truth. My prayer is, Lord send us help by whom thou wilt. Inquire for David Graffam, High street.

How to be Rich in Heaven.

IF it is prudent to provide for the time to come, how much more so to provide for eternity! While to be rich in this world is the passion of thousands, to be rich in the next be mine. An appetite after earthly grandeur, betrays a mean spirit, and a base soul; but an ambition to be great in heaven, is worthy of an heir of God, of an expectant of glory: for it is to the honor of the supreme Potentate, that all his subjects be nobles, be priests, be kings.

In this short life-time is the foundation laid of things of eternal moment, and the wisdom that is from above will teach me to send all my treasures thither. It deserves little or no pity to be poor in this world, but poverty in the other is deplorable beyond the reach of comparison. And yet, according to the capacity of glorified saints, shall that same undiminished fulness be possessed in greater or lesser degree.

"How rich died he?" is the speech of fools at the decease of an acquaintance or friend. But none ever die rich but the saints; for, how can that man be said to die rich, when the very moment of his dissolution robs him of his all?

"Lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven" is the admonition of the dear Redeemer. Let me, then, lay down an imperfect plan to myself, how to be rich for eternity.

1. Then, pre-supposing that I am in a gracious state, I must have a Christian contempt for the world. No man ever filled his coffers with sand; no monarch ever wore the pebble in his crown; so the soul that lays up his treasures in heaven, will not concern himself with perishing trifles. If my affections are not weaned from the creature, and set on things above, I shall be but poor in the world to come.

2. I must be watchful in all things. The man that is anxious to be rich will not waste a penny; so must I watch mine actions, my thoughts, my words. Again, I must watch for God against all my secret sins, and also to reprove the transgressor. A bold and sincere reproof of sin, is a stroke against the enemies of the King, from which a palm of victory shall spring in the world of glory. I must also speak in commendation of the good land, that others may be encouraged to set out for the land of promise. Again, I must watch against carnal sorrow. Should the heir of a crown lament the loss of a feather? What can death do in his family who is the resurrection and the life? It may separate them a little while, but it is only to meet again forever. Worldly riches give their owners joy, but joy in the Lord increases spiritual riches. So I must guard against carnal delight; none of the gay things of time must be objects of affection. It would be mean for a noble personage to be charmed with a stable, who has a palace prepared for him; mean for an heir of God to sit down and feed on the refuse of creation. Again, I must beware of carnal company. These are bankrupts that will spend at my expense, and whatever loss I make by them, yet in their company I shall never be able to add a mite to my celestial treasure. How can I be safe among robbers? They may rob me of a good frame, wound my conscience, and at last leave me with a bleeding heart, which may pain me many days.

3. To grow rich for the world to come, I must study to be heavenly-minded, not by fits and starts, but in one constant, steady, holy frame of spirit. Thus every duty will be my delight; prayer and praise, like my daily food, always pleasant; attendance on the public ordinances like walking in the King's palace garden; reading the Scriptures, like conferring with an old friend; and self-examination, like the merchant from a far country, counting over his rich jewels and precious gems, inspecting his gold and silver, that it have the king's stamp, and so be sterling money; that his graces, his duties, his attainments, are approved by Scripture and conscience.

4. Holy meditation will mightily augment the spiritual riches. To find God in all things and at all times, in all places, and in all providences, will enrich me for eternity. To find his power in this, his wisdom in that, and his goodness in all, will greatly improve my inquiring, my admiring soul. Meditating much, meditating often, meditating with delight, on him in whom are hid the treasures of wisdom, is a noble way to enrich me for a future world.

5. To be rich in the better country, I must heartily study to approve of all the dispensations of Providence; though not insensible when he frowns, or when he smiles. When the Christian, with a filial resignation acquiesces in the conduct of his almighty Father, however cross to flesh and blood, and in his unchangeable love, he takes deep root for eternity; while fear and unbelief toss the unstable, like a rolling thing before the whirlwind. It is proper only to children, not to men, to be peevish for toys and trifles; so let the men of this world lament the loss of worldly things but let the heirs of God, the joint-heirs with Christ, rejoice that the treasures of eternity are theirs.

6. To be rich unto God, and for eternity, I must act strong faith on the Rock of ages; for it is from the spoils of battles won by faith, that I amass riches for the invisible world. Faith relying on a reconciled God in all his attributes and perfections, on Jesus in all his offices and relations, on the Holy Ghost in all his graces and operations, must remove mountains of difficulty, pluck up trees of corruption, pull down strong-holds of sin, wrestle against principalities and powers, and be more than conqueror through her all glorious Author and Finisher.

7. I must also redeem time, and improve time; redeem time from this world, and improve it for the world to come. The man of business will be loth to lose a change hour for any trifling amusement; and the soul that would be busy for eternity, should look on every hour as his last hour, and should avoid excess of sloth and slumber. Vain amusements, impertinent emoloyments, are cruel moths of time; and time is to be husbanded, though worlds should be squandered away. As the jeweller deals with gold, so must I with time; he is careful about the filings, and loses nothing; so should I about the smallest divisions of time, the hour, the minute, the moment. It never made a dying person's bed thorny, that, by a bad bargain, he lost such a sum; but misspent time has made the dying moments of many dismal beyond expression.

8. To be rich in the world to come, I must have an intense love toward God and heavenly things. The men that love the world, pant after the dust of the world, and spare no pains to be rich in the world. A man will never toil himself to gather what he despises; so, unless I prefer heavenly things to earthly, I shall never seek to fill my treasure with invisible excellencies. "He that loveth silver," says the wise man, "shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance with increase." But he that loveth God, shall be satisfied with God, and entranced with the exuberant fullness of the covenant.

9. To be rich indeed at last, I must endeavor to maintain communion with God now. To have fellowship with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ, in all his divine fullness, his glorious perfections, and his gracious ways, is the most enriching course that I can carry on below. Every moment of divine intercourse would be sinking another sum in the bank of heaven, so that I should be wondrous rich at last. He that quits the Indies for Europe, sends his treasures before him; then, though he be poor at his departure from the one country, yet he is rich on his arrival at the other; so well were it with me, if I could detach my thoughts and meditations, my care and affections, my joy and delight, my hope and expectation, from this perishing world, and centre them on that which is to come.—Selected.

Nancy's Secret.

THERE once lived in an old brown cottage a solitary woman. She tended her little garden, and knit and spun for a living. She was known everywhere, from village to village, by the name of "Happy Nancy." She had no money, no relatives, and was half blind, quite lame, and very crooked. There was no comeliness in her, and yet there, in that homely, deformed body, God had set his royal seal.

"Well, Nancy, singing again?" would the chance visitor say, as he stopped at her door.

"O, yes, I'm forever at it."

"I wish you'd tell me your secret, Nancy. You work hard, you have nothing very pleasant surrounding you; what is the reason you are so happy?"

"Perhaps it's because I haven't anybody but God," replied the good creature, looking upward. "You see rich folks like you depend upon their families and their houses; they've got to be thinking about their business, their wives and children; and then they are always afraid of troubles ahead. I haven't got any thing to trouble myself about, you see, 'cause I leave all to the Lord. I think, well, if He can keep this great world in such good order, the sun rolling day after day, and the stars shining night after night, and make my garden things come up the same, season after season, he can certainly take care of such a poor thing as I am; and you see I leave it all to the Lord, and the Lord takes care of me."

"Well, but Nancy, suppose a frost comes after your fruit trees are all in blossom, and your plants out; suppose"—

"But I don't suppose, I never can suppose, I don't want to suppose, except that the Lord will do everything right. That's what makes you people unhappy; you are all the time supposing. Now, why can't you wait till the suppose comes, and then make the best of it?"

She was right. We canker every pleasure with gloomy fear of coming ill. We seldom trust that blessings will enter, or hail them when they come. We should be more child-like to our heavenly Father, believe in his love, learn to confide in His wisdom, and not in our own; and, above all, wait till the "suppose" comes, and make the best of it.

THE BENEFIT OF PRAYER.—The benevolent Raikes, the founder of Sabbath schools, visiting a poor woman one day, found her daughter very refractory. The mother complained that correction was of no avail, and that an inflexible obstinacy marked her conduct. After asking the parent's leave, he began to talk seriously to the girl, and concluded by telling her, that as the first step toward amendment, she must kneel down and ask her mother's pardon. The girl continued sulky. "Well, then," said he, "if you have no regard for yourself, I have much regard for you. You will be ruined and lost, if you don't begin to be a good girl; and if you will not humble yourself, I must humble myself, and make a beginning for you." With that he knelt down on the ground before the child's mother, and put his hands together, with all the ceremony of a juvenile offender, and supplicated pardon for the guilty daughter. No sooner did the stubborn girl see him on his knees on her account, than her pride was overcome, and tenderness followed. She burst into tears, and throwing herself on her knees, entreated forgiveness, and what is still more pleasing, she gave no trouble afterward.

"IT is a great blessing to possess what one wishes," said some one to an ancient philosopher, who replied, "It is a greater blessing still, not to desire what one does not possess."

The Watchman's Report.

Watchman, tell us of the night,
What its signs of promise are!
Traveller o'er yon mountain's height
See that glory-beaming star!
Watchman, does its beauteous ray
Aught of hope or joy foretell?
Traveller, yes; it brings the day—
Promised day of Israel.

Watchman, tell us of the night—
Higher yet that star ascends!
Traveller, blessedness and light,
Peace and truth, its course portends.
Watchman, will its beams alone
Gild the spot that gave them birth?
Traveller, ages are its own—
See, it bursts o'er all the earth!

Watchman, tell us of the night,
For the morning seems to dawn.
Traveller, darkness takes its flight—
Doubt and terror are withdrawn.
Watchman, let thy wandering cease;
Hie thee to thy quiet home.
Traveller, lo! the Prince of peace—
Lo! the Son of God is come.

"The Age to Come."

BY JACOB GRIM.

In the discussion of the above subject there are a few questions necessary to be understood before undertaking it. Among the first, we might ask what are we to understand by the term prophecies. Br. Grim, it is truly said, will not take the ground that prophecies are conditional, for he gave utterance to the following sound definition of prophecy: "I understand a prophecy to be an event that takes place, or is to take place, in which there can be no change or condition." . . . "In prophecy God makes the history of the world as it will be; or, in other words, He shows the prophet the history of the world in advance."

We believe the above to be the true definition of prophecies. The question is asked, "Who can tell us, after all, but what all these prophetic utterances are conditional, and hence uncertain." We have established an infallible rule. Whenever I find a condition in any utterance which my brethren have quoted as an unfulfilled prophecy, I say to myself here is something which contains an "if," or in other words, a condition, and therefore dependent upon the action or condition of some individuals, and they have the power to alter it, therefore it does not come under my rule of prophecy. To illustrate: Jesus said, "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, ... how often would I have gathered thy children together as a hen gathereth her brood under her wings and ye would not." Here was a gathering that depended upon the will of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and they failed to comply with the conditions, therefore the promise of this restoration was no prophecy but a promise. But it is asked where is the promise of the gathering at that time?

John says, in Matt. iii. 2, "Repent ye." For what? The answer is, "the kingdom of heaven is at hand."

The Emp. Dia. reads, "Reform, because the Royal majesty of the heavens has approached."

Mark i. 15 reads, "Jesus came into Galilee, preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and saying, the time is fulfilled, and the kingdom of God is at hand." The Emp. Dia. reads "The time has been accomplished, and God's Royal majesty has approached; reform and believe the good message." Now that John and Jesus meant that the kingdom of God was two thousand years off we do not believe. I am aware the prophet said, "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it: (the kingdom) and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is, and I will give it him."—Ezek. xxi. 27.

Now that this refers to Jesus, the rightful heir, I have no doubt, and that it refers to Jesus at his first advent I have no more doubt. The genealogy and all the circumstances point to Jesus. The record of Luke, by the angel of which so much has been said, "The Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end."

Now that this refers to the second advent of Jesus I should like to have some proof. The same spirit, by Zachariah, says: "Blessed be the Lord God of Israel: for he hath visited and redeemed his people, and hath raised up an horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David." The wise men asked the question, "Where is he that is born king of the Jews?"—Matt. ii. 2. Pilate asked the question of Jesus himself, "Art thou a king, then? Jesus answered, Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice."—John xviii. 37. Jesus answered, "My kingdom is not of this world: if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews: but now is my kingdom not from hence."—V. 36.

Zacharias continues his discourse thus: "As he spake by the mouth of his holy prophets, which have been since the world began: that we should be saved from our enemies, and from the hand of all that hate us." Now we cannot suppose that the Spirit of God in Zechariah made any mistake; still he goes on: "To perform the mercy promised to our fathers, and to remember his holy covenant. The oath which he sware to our father Abraham, (that two thousand years after we are all dead and gone) that he would grant us, that we being delivered out of the hand of our enemies might serve him without fear, in holiness and righteousness before him, all the days of our life." And what of this child, John? "And thou child, shall be called the Prophet of the Highest; for thou shalt go before the face of the Lord to prepare his way." . . . "To give light to them that sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, to guide our feet in the way of peace."

Here Zacharias speaks of a gathering of his people Israel, and said it was spoken of by the mouth of all the prophets, that it should be by a person in the house of his servant David; and he further said that this child, John, was to go before the Lord to prepare the way for him, "And being delivered out of the hand of our enemies might serve him without fear." How long was this to last? Answer: "In holiness and righteousness all the days of our life." Now the question that arises to our mind is, Why was not this fulfilled at the time of the advent of Jesus Christ? The answer given is, it was not intended to be fulfilled until Jesus comes the second time, in his glory. I confess I am unable to understand it in any such manner. There was a time fixed for the kingdom, which was overthrown, to be restored. God said, by the mouth of the Prophet, I will overturn the kingdom until he comes whose right it is, and I will give it him; and when we trace the crown from David we find it running through the families on the male side, according to Matthew; David, Solomon, Roboam, Abia, Asa, Josaphat, Joram, Osias, Joatham, Achaz, Ezekias, Manasses, Amon, Josas, Jechonias, and here the crown ended. The next heir was Salathial. According to Luke, we have David, Nathan, Mattatha, Menan, Melea, Eliakim, Jonan, Joseph, Juda, Simeon, Levi, Matthat, Jorim, Eliezer, down until we reach Zorubabel. In him the two houses or lines meet; then they diverge again, according to Matthew, through Abiud, Eliakim, Azor, down until we come to Jesus; and according to Luke, through Rhesa, Joanna, Juda, Joseph, Semei, until we come to Mary, Christ. Here we have the two families centre in Jesus. And the Prophet said it should be announced, "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: behold, thy king cometh unto thee: he is just, and having salvation; (just what Zacharias said by the mouth of the Spirit) lowly, and riding upon an ass, and upon a colt the foal of an ass."—Zech. ix. 9. Now we have the fulfilment of this recorded in John xii. 15, "Fear not, daughter of Sion: behold, thy King cometh, sitting on ass's colt. These things understood not the disciples at the first; but when Jesus was glorified, then remembered they that these things were written of him." In Luke xix. 35, we have the colt brought to Jesus; and as he rode into Jerusalem, we have the disciples crying out, "Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord: peace in heaven, and glory in the highest." And the Pharisees said unto Jesus, rebuke thy disciples. What answer does Jesus give them? "I tell you, that, if these (my disciples) should hold their peace, the stones would immediately cry out." The Prophet Zachariah had made the prediction and it must have its accomplishment. God's King must be proclaimed. The 37th verse speaks as if the outburst of the disciples was spontaneous; "the whole multitude of the disciples began to rejoice, saying, Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord." And what an opposite effect the sight of the city had upon Jesus. When he beheld the city he wept over it, saying, "if thou hadst known even thou, at least in this thy day, the things which belong to thy peace! but now they are hidden from thine eyes." And then follows the prediction of the judgments upon the city. Now we cannot conceive of any thing plainer than the language of Jesus. He says the then days belonged to Jerusalem. They were the days of Jerusalem's peace, but she did not comprehend it for it was hidden from their eyes. The question, then, comes up, why did not Jesus assume the throne of David, according to his right? And the next thing will be to show that this kingdom was postponed for two thousand years or more. Will some of our friends do it; and show where in the Scriptures, Jesus is to take the throne of David at his second coming and not at his first?

The Restitution Again.

BY JOEL A. SIMONDS.

"Whom the heaven must receive until the times of restitution ot all things."—Acts iii. 21.

Let us briefly consider the words which relate to the doctrine of the restitution.

Restore, To replace, to return, to bring back, or to recover from lapse, degeneracy, declension, or ruin, to its former state.

Restitution, The act of restoring to a former state or condition.

Restorer, One that restores, or replaces, or reestablishes.

The doctrine of Restitution is not one of uncertain signification. It always relates to what has been, for its standard or sample. It never can include a state or condition that has never existed. Restitution is the bringing back, or restoring the thing to which it is applied, to its former state or condition. This is all that it can do. If we wish to describe a new state of things, or something that has never been, we can do so if we please, but it is not proper to do it under the head of restitution; neither is it right to claim for its support that, which is only a promise of restitution.

There are three things, or conditions of things which must be implied in the doctrine of restitution.

1st, The thing to which it is applied must have existed in a good, complete, or perfect condition. It must have been all that can be included in its restitution.

2d, The thing to which it is applied, must have fallen into lapse, degeneracy, declension, or ruin. It must have become disordered, or the idea of restitution cannot apply to it all.

3d, The condition promised in restitution, must be the same as that good, complete, and perfect condition in which the thing originally existed. The doctrine of restitution, then, is very simple, and easy to be understood. It simply promises to restore the things to which it applies, to such condition as they were in before sin entered the world. This restitution is promised in the gospel. The promises of the gospel are glad tidings of the kingdom of God. The restitution, then, applies to the same kingdom, that the gospel pertains to, and is the good news of which it speaks. The world that was made in the beginning was the kingdom that was prepared when the world was made. The world that now is, is the kingdom which is promised to Christ and the saints. The world to come is the same kingdom under the reign of Christ and the saints. The restitution, then, has a natural application to the kingdom which was without the curse once, and which is now subject to the curse, and which is to be restored to an uncursed condition. The condition of the world, and the condition of the kingdom are always the same at any given period in its history.

The Theory of the Restitution is this.

1st, The things to which it pertains, or the world, or the kingdom, (which are the same); were once in a good, and satisfactory condition.

2d, Man sinned, on account of which this good condition of the world was lost, and the curse instead secured.

3d, God purposed in the gospel of the kingdom, that all the nations of the earth shall be blessed, instead of being cursed.

4th, To secure this end, the world must be restored to its good and satisfactory condition. This is the work of Restitution.

5th, The seed of Abraham will be the instrumentality by which this work will be accomplished. This seed, which is Christ, and those that are his must be perfected, by a resurrection from the dead, before the work of restitution can begin. Hence, Christ will be retained in heaven until the times of restitution, when God will send him to do that work. But before Christ commences the work of restitution, he will raise up from the dead those that are his, those that are joint heirs with him, who are to sit down with him in his throne, and have power over the nations. These will be raised incorruptible and will put on immortality, thus becoming the heavenly. They will then be complete in him who is the head of all principality and power. This instrumentality, when completed, will commence the work of restitution. They are not of the world to be restored; they have been chosen out of it, and have been made the heavenly—for the purpose of restoring the world and blessing all the nations of the earth, who are earthy. The world cannot restore itself. If it is restored at all, it must be restored by an instrumentality outside of itself. This Restorer is the seed of Abraham when made the heavenly.

The Midnight Supper.

A married woman was effectually called by divine grace, and became an exemplary Christian; but her husband was a lover of sinful pleasure. When spending an evening, as usual, with his jovial companions, at a tavern, the conversation happened to turn on the excellencies and faults of their wives; the husband just mentioned pronounced the highest enconiums on his wife, saying she was all that was excellent, only she was a Christian. "Notwithstanding which," said he, "such is the command which she has of her temper, that were I to take you, gentlemen, home with me at midnight, and order her to rise and get you a supper, she would be all submission and cheerfulness!"

The company regarded this merely as a vain boast, and dared him to make the experiment, by a considerable wager. The bargain was made, and about midnight the company adjourned, as proposed. Being admitted, "Where is your mistress?" said the husband to the maid-servant, who sat up for him. "She is gone to bed, sir." "Call her up," said he. "Tell her I have brought some friends home with me, and that I desire she would get up, and prepare them a supper." The good woman obeyed the unreasonable summons; dressed, came down, and received the company with perfect civility: told them she happened to have some chickens ready for the spit, and that supper should be got as soon as possible. It was accordingly served up, when she performed the honors of the table with as much cheerfulness as if she had expected company at the proper season.

After supper the guests could not refrain from expressing their astonishment. One of them particularly, more sober than the rest, thus addressed himself to the lady: "Madame," said he, "your civility fills us all with surprise. Our unreasonable visit is the consequence of a wager, which we have certainly lost. As you are a very religious person, and cannot, therefore, approve of our conduct, give me leave to ask, what can possibly induce you to behave with so much kindness to us?"

"Sir," replied she, "when I married, my husband and myself were both unconverted. It has pleased God to call me out of that dangerous condition. My husband continues in it. I tremble for his future state. Were he to die as he is, he must be lost forever; I think it, therefore, my duty to render his present existence as comfortable as possible."

This wise and faithful reply affected the whole company. It left a deep impression on the husband's mind. "Do you, my dear," said he, "really think I should be eternally lost? I thank you for the warning. By the grace of God, I will change my conduct." From that time he became another man; a serious Christian, and consequently, a good husband.

Job.

In the time of Job there dwelt in the land of Uz a prophet of the Lord named Eliud. Joram, Job's friend, came to him, and said: "The ways of the Lord are unsearchable, but why must the righteous suffer so much? Behold, Job has lost all that was his; his children have fallen the victims of death, and they who ought to comfort him, weary him with reproaches and bitter words; moreover, he is smitten with disease, and covered with sores from the sole of his foot to the crown of his head."

"The hand of the Lord is upon him," answered the prophet.

"And yet," continued Joram, "Job is pious, and feareth God more than any in the land. Did he not save the oppressed, who cried unto him, and the orphan, who had no helper? Was he not a father to the poor, as an eye to the blind, and as a foot to the lame? Righteousness was his garment, and whosoever saw him, praised him and called him blessed."

"Blessed is the man whom the Almighty chasteneth," answered the prophet.

"Is not the Almighty also the All-merciful? Why should he be chastened who so lovingly turned the gifts of God into blessings for others, and walked righteously before all the world?"

"That he might be found faithful before God," answered the prophet.

"What more could Job bring as a sacrifice unto him?"

"The hardest and most precious," answered the prophet, "His will."—Krummacher.

I Will Never Leave You.

The wife of a pious man told him one day, that if he did not give over running after the missionaries, a name often applied in the neighborhood where this event occurred, to Christian ministers of different denominations, she would certainly leave him. Finding that he continued obstinate, she on one occasion sent for him from the harvest-field, and informed him that she was about to carry her threat into execution; and that before she left the house, she wished some articles to be divided, to prevent further dispute. She first produced a web of linen, which she insisted should be divided. "No, no," said the husband; "you have been, upon the whole, a good wife to me: if you will leave me, though the thought greatly distresses me, you must take the whole with you; you well deserve it all." The same answer was given to a similar proposal respecting some other articles. At last, the wife said, "So you wish me to leave you?" "Far from that," said the husband; "I would do any thing, but sin, to make you stay; but if you will go, I wish you to go in comfort." "Then," said she, "you have overcome me by your kindness; I will never leave you."

The Translator Converted.—When the Rev. Claudius Buchanan was travelling in India, he obtained from the Jews in the interior of that country, a very singular copy of the translation of the New Testament into Hebrew, made in the sixteenth century. The translator was a learned rabbi, and the translation is, in general, faithful. The design of the translator was to make an accurate version of the New Testament, for the express purpose of confuting it, and of repelling the argument of his neighbors, the Syrians or St. Thorne Christians. But behold the providence of God! The translator became a convert to Christianity; his own work subdued his unbelief; and he lived and died in the faith of Christ. This manuscript is now in the public library at Cambridge, England.

A respectable merchant of London, having been embarrassed in his circumstances, and his misfortunes having been one day the subject of conversation in the Royal Exchange, several persons expressed great sorrow; when a foreigner who was present, said, "I feel five hundred pounds for him, what do you feel?"

Children's Department.

Not Speaking.

Two little children fell out with each other. Addie soon got over her miff, and made friendly advances, but Georgie would not speak to her. It grieved Addie very much. "Georgie wont speak to me," she said to her mother sorrowfully. "Georgie wont speak to me," she said to Sarah and the other girls "I'd rather she'd slap me than not speak." That very day I heard a man complain of his minister that he never spoke to him. "He meets me and does not speak," he said in a hurt tone.

And not long afterwards a woman who had seen better days told me that people who had once visited her would hardly speak to her now, and it made her very bitter.

So it seemed to me that "not speaking" wounded people's feelings more than almost any thing else, making them uncomfortable and unhappy—grieving them.

Well, I thought, this helps us to see how it must wound and grieve the Lord when we fail to speak to him. When he stands at our bedside watching over us through the livelong night, how must he feel when we arise and dress, and carelessly go out of our rooms, without saying so much as "Thank you," for his care. How must he feel when he sees us enjoying the good things which his love has provided for us, and never asking him to be present with us?

How must he feel when we are in trouble, and never tell him a word of it? in sorrow, and never come to him for sympathy? in sickness and never send for him? spending whole days without speaking to him at all. Oh, how it must hurt and grieve him. It is very, very sad to think of wounding our dear Lord so!

Do speak to him. Tell him how much you thank him for his goodness to you. Ask him to forgive your thoughtlessness and help you to grow better for his love. Open your heart to him about the things which interest you most. And I hope, my children, since your little hearts are hurt by the silence of father or mother, or your companions, you will try not to hurt the feelings of your best Friend, the dear Lord Jesus in the same way.

Feeding the Chickens.

"Mother," said a little girl, pressing up to her mother's side one day, and she asked the question in a little low whisper, "what can I do for Jesus?" and I believe it is a question many and many and many a dear child is asking every day all over the land.

"You can love him," answered her mother.

"I do that," said the little girl. "I love him, and that makes me ask."

"How do you know you love him?" asked her mother. She thought a moment, and then said, "Because I feel a cry in my eyes when I think of him, like as I do for my pa off in India."

Ah, the cry in her eye meant loving and longing for her dear father; her mother well knew that. Whenever they talked much about him, Alice's eyes grew moist, and she did not want to say more, only she laid her head on her mother's bosom and went to sleep.

Well, then, what could she do for Him? for we love to do something for those we love.

Why, she could feed the chickens. "They are God's chickens, you know," said her mother. "He made them." Yes, they were God's chickens, weren't they? Alice knew it before, but she didn't think, just as girls at their recitations sometimes say in answer to a question, "I know, but can't think." And feeding them was doing something for Him.

Why, yes. Is it not God's world? Are not all the creatures his? We call them ours. He only lets us take them and use them, and of course he wants us to use them for him.

How happy the thought made Alice. Much as she liked to feed the chickens before it was a great deal nicer now. She loved them so because they were God's. He made their eyes and their feet and their soft down, just as he made her eyes and feet and hair; and he made them "peep, peep," which is their way of talking, and he knows just what they say.

I hardly think a minister in his pulpit feels the greatness of his charge more than Alice did feeding the chickens that afternoon; and she had a taste, small child as she was, of that kind of happiness which comes of linking our common work with Him who gave it us to do.

Bad News.

We have just heard bad news. "James Ashly has blown his brains out!" James Ashly! who could have foreseen such sad ending to life begun like his! He was "dear little Jemmy Ashly" when we first knew him, the only son, but not the only child of parents who loved him tenderly, and who had enough to give him a good start in life.

The first thing we saw in him to be sorry about was the way he spent his evenings—away from home, nobody knew where. He gave a good account of himself when he was asked— that he went to study with some other boy, or to skate on the pond a short way from the house, or to swim, or to hear the band—all innocent ways of spending an evening; but we all thought, in nine cases out of ten, Jemmy had better have been at home.

He grew up and went to college. After two years he suddenly left, or had to leave, I do not know which. "Such a disappointment to his parents!" it was said.

Then James was studying to be a doctor. Would he not make a nice doctor, with his pleasant ways?

But he never got through his studies. Next we heard he was in business in New York. His father set him up with a fine young fellow that knew the business, and could help him on.

A friend met Jemmy in Broadway not long after. He appeared in high spirits. He said he had got into the right place at last. But Jemmy did not look right. "James Ashly is on the road to ruin, else I am mistaken," said the man to his wife. "Oh dear!"

Next, a few years more, and James Ashly had gone out West—gone to try his luck among the miners.

Next, James Ashly had committed suicide —blown his brains out! That was his end, and liquor was at the bottom of it. Strong drink had been his ruin.

Is this the history of only one young man?

SIX SERMONS

On the Inquiry—Is there Immortality in Sin and Suffering? To which is added a Sermon on Christ the Life Giver, or the faith of the Gospel, by Geo. Storrs; with an Introduction defending the Bible and its Author against Infidelity. This work contains double the amount of matter of the origina Six Sermons. Price, in paper covers, 30 cents. Postage, 4 cts.

The original Six Sermons were first preached and published in Albany, N. Y., in 1842. Since then they have passed through many editions and been improved and enlarged as the author received more light; but the last alterations and enlargements were made fifteen years since, and the author has seen little reason to make any material change in the matter since, but will do so when he sees cause, if he ever does.

THE WATCH TOWER,

Or, Man in Death; and the Hope for a Future Life. A Pamphlet of 96 pages. A thorough cure for the modern necromancy misnamed "Spiritualism," which is really animalism. Price 20 cents; postage 2 cents.

This work is one of the first importance, and should allow the Six Sermons in all cases where there is o desire to understand the question of inherent immortality and the state of man in death, as only the knowledge of man's nature and state when dead can prepare our minds to comprehend the work of Christ in our redemption. Let none therefore fail to read this pamphlet.

LIFE FROM THE DEAD,

Or, the Righteous only will Live Again. By Geo. Storrs. Price, 20 cents; postage, 2 cents.

The author believes this subject is one of vast importance. It illustrates the whole Gospel scheme, and shows the mercy of God in its true light, while man is seen to be wholly mortal. It cuts up the modern man-worship, which is hurrying so many on to rank atheism. This work should be read after the two preceding ones, with which it will be seen not only to harmonize, but it is the climax to the doctrine of those works, and is the inevitable result to which they lead. The three works together form the author's "body of divinity" as he understands the Scriptures of truth.

LIFE ONLY IN CHRIST.

This embraces the whole of the three previous named works, and the Tract on Atonement, bound in one volume of 36[illegible] pages, and lettered on the back. It contains a full view of the doctrine of "No life out of Christ," as held by the Editor of the Herald of Life. Price, $1; postage, 16 cents.

This volume has been prepared for the convenience of those who wish to know the author's views on the Life theme, in the order in which they rose in his own mind, and as the subject naturally arises in a thinking mind. 1. Is man immortal? If not—2. What is his state in death? If unconscious in death 3. Who will live again? These questions are taken up in this order, and we do not see how an impartial mind—willing to follow truth wherever it leads—can come to any other conclusion than the one arrived at in these combined works. Examine them and see if this is not so.

MAN'S DESTINY.

Immortality. The Arguments from Nature and Scripture, by Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., St. Louis, Mo., Reviewed by George Storrs. Price, in pamphlet, 30 cents; postage, 4 cents.

The history of this work was this: Rev. T. M. Post, D. D., of St. Louis, Mo., a well known and talented clergyman, was selected by certain ministers and others, in New England, to write a prize Essay on Immortality, for which a gentleman in New York paid $150. It was intended to have it the best that could be said or written in favor of the immortality of all men without regard to their moral character that is, of their inherent immortality.

Dr. Post took up the subject under two heads of argument. First, "The argument from Nature;" and second—"The Argument from the Scriptures. The first of these appeared in "The New Englander" of February, and the other in May, 1856.

The Reviewer followed these arguments in their order. The Review of the Argument from Nature was written before that from Scripture appeared.

The author of the Review wrote it by request, and with the expectation that it would be published with a reprint of the Essay. No one should fail to read it and perhaps nothing better can be placed in the hands of Ministers of any denomination.

THE BIBLE VS. TRADITION.

In this work the true teachings of the Bible is manifested, showing the true meaning of the terms Soul, Spirit, Hell, Everlasting, Eternity, Life, Death, etc. Cheap Edition. Price bound, 70 cents; postage 12 cents. In paper covers, 40 cents postage 4 cents.

This work contains over 300 pages, and is an invaluable help in understanding the Scriptures. Many smaller works have been written by others on the subject; but they are little more than a compilation from this larger and more perfect work, which was the pioneer in this branch of the life views.
